

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR,

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1880.

NUMBER 1.

DUTCH ARCHITECTURE.

THE OLD HOUSE IN BROAD-STREET.

WITHOUT advancing any claims to the honourable profession of an antiquary, either local or general, we still feel it a duty, as a "faithful chronicler of the times," to snatch from the insatiable grasp of oblivion such fast-fading objects as may be interesting to posterity. In a few more fleeting years not a single vestige of the original city of New-Amsterdam will remain! The peculiar style of architecture which characterized the earliest edifices erected on this island, will be unknown to the next generation, except through the medium of history and tradition. We have, therefore, resolved to secure correct views of the few that are yet left standing, like "tottering monuments of good old times," and consign them to the safe keeping of the New-York Mirror; which will, if our wishes be verified, reflect their venerable images down the long vista of distant futurity to the latest posterity.

It is well known that the first settlers of this island were emigrants from Amsterdam, in Holland; and it is reasonable to suppose that they brought with them, to the New World, the same manners, customs, and opinions that prevailed in the land of their nativity. The fashion of their apparel, and the form of their dwellings, in particular, are understood to have been fac similes of such as they had been familiar with in Holland, where gable-fronts, leaden-windows, and sharp-pointed roofs, are characteristic features of both city and village—of the stadtholder's palace, the burgomaster's mansion, and the peasant's hut.

The cottage style, however, was generally adopted by the founders of the goodly city of New-Amsterdam; and most of their buildings consisted of a single story, independent of the sharp-angled roof before mentioned. It is true that some of the more wealthy could boast of a second story, and a few of the higher classes even of a third; but these latter were considered as palaces among the humbler edifices of the commonalty. The walls of these buildings were constructed of small black and yellow bricks, called clinkers, imported for the purpose from Holland, serving as ballast for the ships which conveyed them across the Atlantic. The lime used by the builders was made of oyster-shells, with which the bay and rivers, at that time, abounded; and this mortar is now found, after a lapse of near two hundred years, to be harder than the bricks themselves. In many instances, however, the houses were constructed of wood, with a brick front next the street—a mode of building which still prevails in some parts of this city, where the owners wish to make show at little expense.

In those days, however, whatever might have been the materials or dimensions of the edifice, its gable-end always faced on the street, and generally terminated in battlements, which resembled two opposing flights of stairs, starting at the eaves on each side of the front, ascending with the angle of the roof, and meeting at a little brick turret, which surmounted its apex, and was commonly ornamented with a weathercock or vane to indicate the course of the wind.

The acute angle of the tiled roof was happily calculated to avert the danger to which buildings of a different shape would have been exposed from the heavy falls of snow which were prevalent at that early period. On the gable-front, so often mentioned, were displayed four large iron figures, designating the year in which the building was erected, and at the same time serving the purpose of what modern builders call anchors, irons which secure the walls to the floor-timbers.

As regards the interior of these buildings, the stories were low, and the apartments seldom ceiled over head; but massy oak beams, either whitewashed with lime, or highly polished by frequent applications of the scrubbing-brush, gave strong indications of strength and durability. The windows were composed of three distinct sashes; two of them hung on hinges, and opening on the inside, like little folding doors; while the third, of more narrow dimensions, was fixed horizontally across the top, where it remained stationary. The glass, which was cut into small panes of about two inches by four, was set in lead. Few specimens, however, of this style of glazing can now be found in the city, as the windows of the ancient Dutch houses have all been modernized, by which a principal feature in the real Knickerbocker style of architecture has become extinct. The windows were usually secured by outside shutters, which were hung by hinges at the bottom, and every morning let down to a horizontal position, thus forming a convenient platform for the display of such articles as were offered for sale by the occupant. The fire-places were surrounded with blue and white tiles, on which were rude pictures intended to illustrate some important scripture narratives, or the most striking incidents in Æsop's fables. Here "Tobit and his dog" figured to great advantage, Haman swung conspicuously on his gibbet, and Jonah appeared most manfully bouncing out of the whale, like harlequin through a barrel of fire."

The ascent to the second floor was by a spiral staircase, either directly behind the street door, or else behind the back door. In the language of Washington Irving, (from whom we have quoted above) "the house was always furnished with abundance of large doors and small windows on every floor." The entrance most used, however, was a side door, opening from the yard or alley, which was secured by a gate. "The front door," says the facetious writer just mentioned, "was never opened except on marriages, funerals, new-year's days, the festival of St. Nicholas, or some such great occasion. It was ornamented with a gorgeous brass knocker curiously wrought, sometimes in the devise of a dog, and sometimes of a lion's head, and was daily burnished with such religious zeal, that it was oftentimes worn out by the very precautions taken for its preservation."

The above engraving, which has elicited these remarks, represents a building still standing on the east side of Broad-street, No 41, now occupied as a grocery by Mr. H. N. Ferris. Of its history we know nothing, except that it is a hundred and thirty-two years old, and is one of the few, in that neighbourhood, which escaped the great conflagration of 1776. But whether it was erected by a Stuyvesant, a Hardenbrook, a Schermerhorn, a Roosevelt, or a Kipp, or by one of the numerous Vans of that period, tradition does not inform us. Neither are we able to gratify the reader's curiosity so far as to enumerate the various uses and purposes to which this venerable edifice has been successively devoted. "Could its old walls tell tales," there is no knowing what heart-thrilling secrets of "love and murder" might be collected by a good stenographer. As it is, however, it must suffice that its present occupant is a good citizen, who "keeps constantly on hand a general assortment of first-rate groceries, cheap for cash." Mr. Ferris rents the premises, we understand, from the heirs of a Mr. Quick, who is quick no more, being now numbered among the dead.

As above intimated, it was deemed a duty, (before the footsteps of time had rendered the design impracticable) to rescue from oblivion a few memorials of the architectural taste of our Dutch ancestors, a race eminent for that personal neatness and domestic cleanliness which characterize many of their direct descendants. And if the latter excel them in the advantages of superior education, and a more enlightened system of policy, may they also emulate their simple virtues of frugality, probity, and piety.

Three or four subjects of a similar description with the above, will appear in the Mirror in regular succession. In the mean time, we trust that the reader will not be displeased if we conclude this article with the following appropriate extract from Knickerbocker's History of New-York:

"As to the family, they always entered in at the gate, and most generally lived in the kitchen. To have seen a numerous household assembled around the fire, one would have imagined that he was transported back to those happy days of primeval simplicity which float before our imaginations like golden visions. The fire-place was truly of a patriarchal magnitude, where the whole family, old and young, master and servant, black and white, nay, even the very cat and dog enjoyed a community of privilege, and had each a right to a corner. Here the old burgher would sit in perfect silence, puffing his pipe, looking in the fire with half-shut eyes, and thinking of nothing for hours together; the goede vrouw, on the opposite side, would employ herself diligently in spinning yarn or knitting stockings. The young folks would crowd around the hearth, listening with breathless attention to some old crone of a negro, who was the oracle of the family, and who, perched like a raven in a corner of the chimney, would croak forth, for a long winter afternoon, a string of incredible stories about New-England witches, grisly ghosts, horses without heads, hair-breadth escapes, and bloody encounters among the Indians."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Poetical Sketch Book. Including a third edition of Australia. By Thomas K. Hervey. London: 12mo. 1 vol. pp. 286.

THE London press teems with a class of publications which are by no means common with us. We refer to the collections of light articles in the various walks of literature; and which are so eagerly sought after by those who prefer dallying an hour with the lyrist or the essayist, to the graver communion with the historian or the classic. There is a pleasing variety in the works we speak of calculated for all "moods of the mind." Passion and pathos, feeling and fancy, are invoked by turns, and he must indeed be among his "misanthropic hours," who cannot find somewhat "i' the vein."

There is something too in the manner, as well as the matter, of these exhalations (we mean to be poetical in the use of the word, good reader) from the hot-beds of the London press, that is wonderfully taking to the eye, and pleasing to the fancy of the epicurean in literature. One takes up a work of this kind, with its beautifully engraved vignette and title—and its jet black letters, reposing gracefully upon the hot-pressed and silky paper—with the true relish of the gourmand; and from the first application of the ivory folder, until the "finis" page is turned, there is a delicious languor upon the mind. Whether it is the poetry or sentiment—the delightful sensation of the soft, low, whispering breeze, gently insinuating itself through the Venetian lattice—an atmosphere of elysium in these caloric days—or the exquisite flavour of that last flask of claret, still lingering upon the lip—one knows not; the book is closed—the left foot rests upon the ottoman—the exclamation "beautiful!" escapes one ere one is aware exactly to what it is applied.

A work of the class referred to, and the sight of which has led us thus strangely from our usual vein of sober prose, lies open upon our table. It is a collection of poems by one of the most fashionable of the numerous poets who enlighten the English metropolis at the present day. Many of the pieces have appeared in the English annuals, and of course were transplanted thence into our periodicals. Some are very pretty—a few beautiful—and all are above the mediocre grade of lyrics. We cannot say to you, gentle reader, buy the book, and be amused as we have been. It has not been republished in this country—but we will give you a "taste of its quality" in a few extracts.

There is great richness of language, and splendour of imagery in the following stanzas. They are from a poem entitled "Cleopatra," and are illustrative of a picture by Danby of the Egyptian queen embarking on the Cyndus.

Flutes in the sunny air!
And harps in the porphyry halls!
And a low, deep hum, like a people's prayer,
With its heart-breathed swells and falls!
And an echo, like the desert's call,
Flung back to the shouting shores!
And the river's ripple, heard through all,
As it plays with the silver oars!
The sky is a gleam of gold!
And the amber breezes float,
Like thoughts to be dreamed of—but never told,
Around the dancing boat!
She has stepped on the burning sand!
And the thousand tongues are mute!
And the Syrian strikes, with a trembling hand,
The strings of his gilded lute!
And the Æthiop's heart throbs loud and high,
Beneath his white sash,
And the Libyan kneels, as he meets her eye,
Like the flash of an eastern star!
The gales may not be heard,
Yet the silken streamers quiver,
And the vessel shoots—like a bright-plumed bird—
Away—down the golden river!
Away by the lofty mount!
And away by the lonely shore!
And away by the gushing of many a fount,
Where fountains gush no more!
Oh! for some warning vision, there,
Some voice that should have spoken
Of climes to be laid waste and bare,
And glad, young spirits broken!
Of waters dried away,
And hope and beauty blasted!
That scenes so fair, and hearts so gay,
Should be so early wasted!

There is a touch of feeling in the following lines which we are sure will recommend them to our fair readers—

I think on thee, in the night,
When all beside is still,
And the moon comes out, with her pale, sad light,
To sit on the lonely hill!
When the stars are all like dreams,
And the breezes all like sighs,
And there comes a voice from the far-off streams,
Like thy spirit's low replies!
I think on thee, by day,
Mid the cold and busy crowd,
When the laughter of the young and gay
Is far too glad and loud!
I hear thy soft, sad tone,
And thy young, sweet smile I see;
My heart—my heart were all alone,
But for its dreams of thee!
Oh! like those fairy things,
Those insects of the east,
That have their beauty in their wings,
And shroud it, while at rest;
That fold their colours of the sky,
When earthward they alight,
And flash their splendours on the eye,
Only to take their flight;
I never knew how dear thou wert,
Till thou wert borne away!
I have it yet about my heart,
Thy beauty of that day!
As if the robe thou wert to wear,
Beyond the stars, were given
That I might learn to know it there,
And seek thee out, in heaven!

We conclude our extracts from this enticing volume with a poem different in manner from either of the preceding—it is rich in poetic beauty and classical allusion.

CARTHAGE.

Is it some vision of the elder day,
Won from the dead-sea waters, by a spell
Like hers who waked the prophet?—or a dream
Of burning Egypt—ere the Libyan sand
Had flung its pall above a perished world—
Dreamt on its dreary grave, that has no flowers?
Is it the eastern orphan's ocean-home!
The southern queen! the city of the sea,
Ere Venice was a name! the lofty heart
That battled for the empire of the world,
And all but won—yet perished in the strife!
Now, in her young, proud beauty—the blue waves,
Like vasaals, bending low to kiss her feet,
Or dancing to their own sweet minstrelsy!
The olives hanging round her crested front,
Like laurel-crowns upon a victor's brow—
Beneath her palms, and mid her climbing bowers,
Darts, like a sunny flash, the antelope!
And bound the wild deer, where the severing boughs
Wave forth a goddess!—in her hunter-guise,
She wakes the perfumes of the Tyrian's groves,
To welcome from the waves her pilgrim boy,
And point his tangled pathway to the towers
That to his homeless spirit speak of home!
Alas! the stately city! is it here,
Here, mid this palace pomp and leafy store,
(Bright as some landscape which the poet sees
Faintly, by sunset, on a summer sky,
In hues the dolphin borrows, when he dies!)
Mid all this clustering loveliness and life,
Where treads the Trojan, that in after years
A lonelier exile and a loftier chief,
Sat amid ruins!

We have received the July number of the North American Review; Falkland, Bulwer's first novel, never before published in this country, and several other works, but are compelled to defer any remarks upon them until next week.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE TWO GRAVES.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

A NEAT and flourishing village, containing two churches, a court-house, a bank, and a number of spacious brick dwelling houses, now occupies the romantic spot on the bank of the Ohio river, where twenty years ago stood only the cottage of George Davis, surrounded by the small plantation which his own hand had cultivated in the midst of the forest. Twelve years have wrought wonderful changes in many parts of our country; but no where have they witnessed such rapid and extensive improvements as have taken place along the course of the Ohio river. The progress of that portion of territory now known as the state of Ohio, in particular, has been astonishing. Although not many years have elapsed since the sound of the axe first broke the stillness of the vast forests which spread their almost "boundless contiguity of shade" over that luxuriant region; yet he who passes through that section of our country at the present day will find few things to remind him of the recency of its settlement. "The land is full of harvests and green meads." The mighty, and seemingly interminable woods, whose mingled branches covered the immense territory with a sea of foliage, almost excluding the sun from the soil that now so bountifully repays its smile, have in many places disappeared entirely from the ground which they had shadowed since the beginning of time. The hardy yeomen of the eastern states have poured in upon the footsteps of the receding savages, and the wide land over which but a few years since deep silence brooded, except when broken by the howl of the wolf, or the more appalling yell of the Indian—is now vocal with the thousand happy sounds of a numerous and prosperous population. Where the solitary smoke of the red man's wigwag curled its thin wreath among the trees, a hundred spires are glittering in the sun; and, instead of the frail canoe which, sometimes emerging from a dark inlet, would shoot across the mighty river that watered that beautiful wilderness in vain—the glassy surface of the Ohio mirrors whole navies, bearing to the remotest parts of the valley of the Mississippi the interchanged commodities of every clime. Steamboats, of a size commensurate with the majesty of the stream they traverse, are continually passing to and fro, their glistening paddles breaking the smooth water into the only billows with which it is ever ruffled, and their long column of revolving vapour oftentimes constituting the only cloud in the whole expanse of the clear blue sky. The stranger, as he glides along that liquid highway of nature, and beholds on either side, cities, towns, and villages, almost without number, occupying the green margin—who every where sees evidences of populousness and abundance, of activity and happiness, of refinement and taste—can with difficulty believe that he is really traversing a region just redeemed from utter savageness and solitude. To those of other lands who have not viewed for themselves the gay panorama—the moving, living picture of prosperity and plenty, which the banks of the Ohio present, the details of the merest statistical writer appear like the rhapsodies of romance, and the speculations of one who should attempt to reason from the past to the future, would seem scarcely more entitled to attention than the extravagances of eastern fable.

But twenty years ago, although then "toil linked with art" had begun to explore each savage wild, the shores of the Ohio river presented a very different appearance from that which now greets the traveller through that luxuriant region. For many miles on either side of the little plantation of George Davis, an unbroken forest lined the banks, and the stream before it, instead of being dotted as now, with a gay succession of all kinds of vessels, from the slow-moving and clumsy ark of the emigrant, to the swift and graceful steamboat, but seldom exhibited the handywork of man upon its surface. It is to the introduction of steamboats, indeed, that the fertile region of the west owes a great part of its present advancement. There is, in truth, no portion of our country where the advantages resulting from that great improvement of modern times are not seen and felt. Admirably designed as our country is by nature for internal communication, intersected in every direction by navigable streams which "—through all its members run

Like mighty arteries binding them in one,"

the genius of Fulton could not have been employed on any subject so well calculated to result in immense and general benefit, as that which happily attracted his attention. It is now about twenty-six years since the wondering people first gathered in crowds along the banks of the Hudson to behold the strange spectacle of a vessel—apparently by its own volition—"walking the waters like a thing of life," and moving hither and thither with the rapidity of a shooting star, without asking leave of the winds and waves. In the short interval since that period, what has been already effected by the means of that great invention appears like the result of magic. The eastern story of the palace and gardens conveyed through the air by means of a talismanic lamp, seems scarcely any longer a fable. The firm and thick-set earth has not, to be sure, lost any of "its immutable fixedness," nor do our dwellings rise and float upon the air like so many fibres of gossamer; but by the intermediation of steamboats, whole cities and districts of countries, from being separated by nearly impassable mountains and immeasurable distances, are brought, in effect, into almost immediate juxtaposition. The different extremities of our vast empire are made familiarly acquainted with each other; and already one of the kindly fruits of this extended intercourse has been to awaken feelings of brotherhood and goodwill in place of many of those sectional prejudices and jealousies, which are naturally entertained by strangers, of conflicting interests and pursuits.

This however is digression. Steamboats at the period of this narrative, were of very recent invention, and the echoes of the forests of the Ohio had never been awakened by their now familiar sound. The country, for the most part, lay in the uninterrupted solitude of nature. At Pittsburg, Marietta, and one or two other places on the river, a handful of adventurous men had gathered together in the wilderness, and erected a cluster of habitations. Away from these settlements, the stroke of some hardy adventurer's axe might here and there be heard in the midst of the interminable woods; and in a few intermediate places, along the margin of the stream, a solitary smoke might be seen, and near by a patch of yellow grain, glistening in the midst of a grove of girdled trees, which, deprived of their limbs and blackened by fire, seemed to frown on the attempt at innovation.

It has been already said that the cabin of George Davis stood entirely alone. No other human habitation was within several miles of it, and to the nearest village was a weary day's ride. George was one of those hardy adventurers who are ever to be found on the outskirts of population, a race of men whose characters seem equi-distant from those of the whites and the Indians, and yet partake of the principal features of both. Like the latter, he was migratory in his habits, familiar with all sights and sounds that appertain to wood-craft, and subsisted chiefly by hunting the deer and the elk. He could not bear to dwell near his white brethren; he had heard of cities, but his ideas in relation to them were only gathered from the imperfect accounts of boatmen returning from New-Orleans, and he could not conceive how men could exist thus cooped up together, when they might have the fair woods to wander in, and all that nature provides for her children at their command.

Although society was thus disagreeable to him, and "the hum of human cities torture," yet it was from no want of love of his kind that George Davis shunned his fellows, and kept upon the outward verge of population. Beneath his swarthy skin, almost black from the constant exposure of his way of life, there beat as warm and naturally as gentle a heart as ever tenanted a human bosom. He loved solitude, for solitude had been unto him as a companion from his earliest years; yet now and then, when a party of traders to New-Orleans, or the crew of a returning keelboat, chanced to stop at his lowly cabin, they had ample reason to know that it was habit, not misanthropy, which occasioned the seclusion of George Davis. At the time our narrative commences, he had been several years the occupant of a little hut, which his own hand had reared on the bank of the Ohio. Occasional emigrants, led by that irresistible spirit of enterprise which forms so marked a characteristic of the eastern states, began, few and far between, to break in upon the stillness of the western woods, incited by the reports of the travellers who had penetrated that region concerning the amazing fertility of its soil and the variety of its products. Several times had George's eye of late, as he sat on the edge of the bank which overlooks the glassy and majestic Ohio, beheld the grotesque and then unusual structure, which, under the name of ark or moving boat, has since become so common on the western waters. As they glided along, the questions with which the adventurous and curious emigrants assailed him, were by no means relished by the solitary woodman, in whose breast these signs of approaching population began to create a nameless sensation of uneasiness, lest he should once more be obliged to abandon his home, where he had dwelt so long that he began to love it, and strike still deeper into the forest. Thoughts of this kind were passing through his mind one fine evening in autumn, as he sat on the green brow that impended the margin of the stream, his eye fixed on one of those uncouth vessels that have been named. The shadows of the night began to settle on the forests which covered the banks on either side, imparting their own dark hue to the stream that glided between them. The boat approached the shore near the spot where George Davis was sitting; its inmates sprang upon the beach, and were instantly busied in different ways, some securing their frail vessel, others collecting fagots to kindle a fire, and one who apparently had nothing in common with the rest, straggling along the shore, with a slow and melancholy step, like one whose mind heeded not the objects which were around. A group of children had also issued from the boat, and were already engaged in noisy sports upon the white sandy beach. George Davis paused for a few moments and looked with no pleased eye on this unusual scene; then throwing his rifle over his arm, and calling to his dog in a low voice, he turned with a sigh towards his cabin.

THE STUDY OF MUSIC.

There is one objection to the science of music very grievous to those who make it a serious study, and sufficient to cause persons of an irritable turn of mind entirely to eschew the art. We allude to the melancholy fact, that almost every body who has acquired the least practical knowledge of a musical instrument, no matter what, or has contrived to master the hundredth psalm, "Bonnets of Blue," or any other equally difficult piece of music, straightway believes himself or herself gifted with a sufficient quantum of theory, not only to decide upon all musical points, but to dictate to others. It is really amazing to see the maximum of importance and display of opinion which follows this unhappy minimum of knowledge, and we do not know any other art or science of which the professors are so vexed and troubled. However, they have their occasional consolation under this state of suffering, in the felicity of sometimes witnessing the lucubrations of these illuminati committed to print. "Litera scripta manet," say they, and we are free to confess, that, on such occasions, our spirit doth leap within us, and we fully enjoy the completion of Job's bitter wish—"Oh that mine enemy would write a book."

This it is that renders bad taste prevalent, and gives the impudent and empirical tyro advantages over the learned but more modest professor who has studied the science and proved its depth. In no city is the danger of this unfortunate state of things more apparent than in New-York.—The very aptness and inclination which we manifest for that delightful art, which has suddenly burst upon us in an avalanche of harmony and melody, instead of being instilled into our minds gradually by the habit of hearing it from our youth, furnish arms against ourselves, and cause an evident desire to grasp at, and pretend to, the refinements of the science before we are acquainted with its rudiments. What, for instance, is more ridiculous than to hear persons prate about Pucitta, Mercandante, Carafa and Rossini, who (Rossini excepted) will scarcely outlive their brief hour, when such masters as Sacchini, Pergolesi, Paisiello, and Cimarosa, who can never die, are literally unknown to them!—What, we ask, is more ludicrous than to hear people list admiration of Beethoven, Hummel, Weber, Auber, nay, Mozart, (for Garcia did act Don Giovanni in this city) when Joseph and Michael Haydn, Gluck, Graun, Purcell and Handel are scarcely thought of, and three of them, at least, unknown? What would be said of a schoolmaster who should place Tacitus and Xenophon before a pupil who had not read Cæsar and the Greek Testament?—We rather opine that we should "write him down an ass." The same will strictly apply to an attempt at comprehending and trying to execute the elaborate compositions of the present day without a competent knowledge of the works on which they are founded. Parents, we are sorry to observe, are generally delighted to witness their offspring lunched upon the mysterious combinations and perplexed modulations of such writers as Weber and Beethoven, and smothered in a sea of Rossinian demi-semi-quavers, before their ideas are sufficiently trained to comprehend music which is much more simple. The consequence is obvious, they may, parrot-like, play the notes of these fashionable authors, and they may be made to sing a number of words, included in a bar, all within a given time—but as for taste and expression, they are not to be acquired by such means. On the other hand, had these young persons been first taught the use of the soffeggio; then to understand the music of the old masters, who have adorned the church and the drawing-room for centuries with their simple grandeur of style; from thence progressing to the beautiful melodies of Arne and Mornington, of Sacchini and Paisiello, of Handel and Haydn, how very differently would the authors of the present day be handled by amateurs? The same applies to the pianoforte. Let a scholar, after the elementary studies are completed, commence with authors whose bass is firm, and its progression strongly marked, as is the case with the compositions of the old school, and for which there is no stronger example than Corelli—let Handel, with his equally fine ground-work and glorious fugues follow—Sebastian Bach is the next step. When the works of the above mentioned writers are well impressed on the scholar, the ornamental compositions of the present day; those for instance, of Dussek, Latour, Kalkbrenner and Moschelles stand a chance of being executed with mind and expression. Such was the education of John Cramer, the most expressive of all pianists; and such a course of education as we have described, has produced all the best vocalists and pianists, whether professional or amateur, of the present time. If to this we recommend the constant habit of hearing good music in public, especially in the company of persons capable of pointing out beauties and defects in style, we shall in so doing only follow the example of Velluti, Liverati and Lanza, Welch and T. Cooke, whose professional scholars are sent to operas and concerts as part of their education, and whose amateur pupils are recommended constantly to witness such performances.

BIOGRAPHY.

MR. FREDERIC ALBERT WINSOR.

DIED at Paris, on the eighth of May, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, Mr. Frederic Albert Winsor, with whom originated the application of gas to the lighting of streets and cities. He was the founder of the gas-light and coke company in London, and, of the first gas company which was established in Paris: from his public and persevering efforts arose these and every other gas-light establishment which has since been founded.

It will be recollected, that in 1803, Mr. Winsor demonstrated the use to which his discovery of gas-lighting might be publicly applied, though many men of high scientific reputation denied its practicability. His first public experiments were shown at the Lyceum, in the Strand: he afterwards lighted with gas the walks of Carlton Palace gardens in St. James's Park on the king's birth-day in 1807; and during 1809 and 1810, one side of Pall Mall, from the house which he then occupied in that street. His house was for many years openly shown, fitted up with gas-lights throughout, to exhibit to the legislature and the country the practicability of his plans.

The memorial to his late majesty George the third, for a charter, and the evidence taken in parliament and before the privy council, bear testimony to the indefatigable and unremitting zeal with which he persevered until he overcame the obstacles which prejudice had raised against his efforts, and which threatened to prevent the general adoption of his discoveries and improvements.

In 1812, however, a charter of incorporation for a gas-light and coke company was obtained, and success crowned his labours; but his mind having been wholly possessed with the prosecution of an object of such public importance, he was too regardless of his own pecuniary interests, and omitted to retain a legal power over the advantages which resulted from his exertions: he unfortunately trusted too much for his reward to the honour of the parties with whom he was engaged. To the great object which he pursued he devoted the best years of his life, and sacrificed his fortune; and while he bequeathed an important benefit to posterity, the just recompense of his services escaped from his own hands: thus he created the fortunes of others, whilst he ruined his own and those of his family.

In 1815, he extended to France the advantages which had attended his efforts in England. There, too, he was the first to establish a company and erect gas-works: but rival interests created other companies, in defiance of patent privileges: and these associations, with large capitals, undermined his interests, and he again gave fortunes to others which ought to have been his own reward.

It is thus that a life, which, it may truly be said, has been an honour to England, has been embittered, if not abridged, by cares and ingratitude. After all the services which he rendered to his country and to the world, and the gains which individuals have realized by his discoveries, the founder of gas-lighting has left no other legacy to his family than the remembrance of his virtues, and of those talents by which the present and future generations have been and will be benefited.

The benefits at Drury-lane, says the Literary Gazette, have been glorious—Farren immense, and Harley extravagant; the latter had some pleasant novelties in the way of comic songs and parodies; amongst the pleasantest of which we rank the following laughable version of "Love's Ritonella." We think if Harley had dressed a little more at Wallace, and magnified his Massaroni tuft, it would have told better. However, it took excellently well; and we doubt not, "Real Havana" will be as popular as its agreeable prototype: it is, we understand, from the pen of Mr. Ainsworth.

Real Havana!
Precious cigar!
Gentle as manna,
Bright as a star—
Pleasant at fireside,
Cheery on road—
Best of all perfumes
At home or abroad.
Real Havana!
Puff away care—
Blow my misfortunes
Into thin air.
Real Havana!
O who would dare
Meerschchaum or hookah
With thee compare?
When thy bright tip
Any mortal may see,

Thou art his choice,
And a smoker is he.
Real Havana!
Puff away care—
Blow my misfortunes
Into thin air.
Real Havana!
Primest of stuff,
Sell me no humbug,
Vender of snuff—
Think not on me
You can cut any jokes,
'Tis Toper Thomas
Himself who now smokes:
Real Havana!
Puff away care—
Blow my misfortunes
Into thin air.

The following is from the Niagara Courier: As Mr. Crandal was standing in the street, a few yards from our office, a swarm of bees lit on his hat, covering it completely! At the moment of our writing this he is on his way home with his odd head gear. It would puzzle the ladies, we guess, to "follow the fashion."

Dr. Casper, in an article in the Revue Britannique, states that there existed some time ago in Prussia a club of suicides, composed of six persons, who not only vowed to destroy themselves, but also to make proselytes. They did not succeed in the latter respect, but all gave proofs of their own sincerity. The last of them blew out his brains in 1817. The same writer states that a similar club is reputed to have existed not long ago in Paris. This was composed of twelve members, one of whom was to be selected every year for self-destruction.

M. Couverchel read a paper at the Paris Academy of Sciences on the ripening (maturation) of fruits. He marks two distinct periods. In the first, which comprehends the formation of the principles of the fruit, the direct influence of the plant on the fruit is indispensable. In the second, which comprehends the ripening of the fruit, the acids, favoured by the heat, transform the gelatine into saccharine matter. The phenomena, in this case, are purely chemical; they are independent of vegetative life, and what proves this is that most fruits will ripen when taken from the tree. M. Couverchel has made many experiments with the juices of fruits, from which it appears that wines of inferior quality may be ameliorated without the addition of substances foreign to their nature, and prejudicial to health.

An instrument called "Der Musicalische Improvisator," has been performing for the last two or three days in Piccadilly. By means of revolving barrels with lateral movements, it seems to originate endless variations ad libitum. We have calculating machines, and now a machine which executes fantasies and voluntaries like a master of mind. Men must, ere long, yield to machines! The Improvisator is altogether a curiosity; and, though its imitation of various instruments is, like most imitations, inferior to the originals, it does discourse very pretty music.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES.—NO. XVII.

THEY talk much of Italian skies. We are bound to believe them beautiful. The scenery, too, which they tell of in the old world; the mouldering castles, the stately palaces, the over-arching bridges—I have often regretted that I must travel through the contracted routine of life, and pass away from the earth, without once feasting my eyes and my imagination among those glorious creations. It is provoking to think that the want of a few paltry dollars can shut out the soul from so many high enjoyments. To exist in the midst of splendour—to behold thousands lavished by the ignorant upon worthless gratifications—to feel the millions that are floating around you in society, so trifling a share of which would make you almost wild with happiness, and yet to go on year after year picking up the scanty crumbs like a vile slave, doomed to cast off his galling chains only in the grave!

I could not overcome these regrets as I visited a friend, with whom I had spent many a pleasant hour, on board the ship which was to bear him away. She lay at anchor in the river. I went to bid him farewell. They were all ready for sea—a fresh breeze sprung up—one by one the sails were unfurled—the heavy anchor was weighed—the mighty mass began to move as the sun's disk touched the horizon—a firm grasp of the hand, prolonged a moment—repeated, again prolonged. "These are the moments which men remember," I thought, while, as the golden orb had set, I leaned over the side of our little boat gazing after the huge vessel as her indistinct form passed away among the thickening shadows.

I turned my eyes towards the city. The dark mass of buildings stretched for miles along the shore, studded with lights. Castle Garden was illumined—brilliant rockets rose high in the air, and broke in dazzling fragments, which floated down the azure sea like fishes of gold. There was a burst of music, too, which came softly along the bay, mingling with the sound of dashing oars. As our slight bark broke the sleep of the glassy water, its dark ripples disclosed a rich and snowy whiteness, or sparkled with flashes of harmless fire, and ever and anon meteors passed along the silent heaven.

However accustomed a man may be to mingle with the crowd, the sight of a great city stretched before him is not devoid of interest. Two hundred thousand beings, I thought, are busy beneath yonder shadows, rioting in abundance—pining in poverty—glowing in the warm dance—panting on the bed of death. Our boat touched the shore, and I wandered alone up Broadway. Music again from the open windows, and happy voices. The street was thronged. Every thing wore the aspect of pleasure. Carriages rattled on, bearing home parties of the young and gay: then a wretched cripple crawled slowly along, wrinkled with age, ragged, silent, and solitary. Music again of the mellow flute, melting in with the tones of a rich harp, and a sweet female voice. I paused and listened. She sang of love—everlasting love. A band of riotous young men now crowded by with segars, and broke rudely in upon the melody with hoarse laughter and execrable oaths. I turned away disappointed, and my eyes fell upon the dark abandoned yard of Trinity church, with its half visible, melancholy, and broken monuments, its ancient mounds—its forgotten tenants. I was about to moralize—but, a bright young girl came by, leaning on the arm of a handsome man. As the light from a window suddenly fell on her face, I perceived she was blushing, but not embarrassed; and a quiet smile, a smile of exquisite happiness, rested on her lips, as if it were the very dearest moment of her life. I wonder what her companion was whispering to her!

On I went among the throng. A thousand feet were shuffling over the pavements; and other forms came by with that lingering step, with which the young—the lovely—and the beloved, know how to protract the bliss of a stolen moonlight ramble.

A man stalked by with folded arms, and hat drawn down over his eyes. His face was pale—his lips compressed. He sighed as he passed on. Poor fellow. A rejected lover, I thought; perhaps a stranger, brooding over recollections of his distant home; or some fine high-minded gentleman, struggling hopelessly against the current of the world, and wishing his tedious existence was closed. He entered a hotel. I stopped to observe. He called for brandy and water; swallowed a deep draught; lighted a segar; then screening his dark eyes from the glare of the lamp, and issuing forth again in moody silence, he stalked on.

A crowd had collected. Two men were fighting. Blood gushed from their faces. Their fellow-beings formed a circle and cried out for fair play. A heavy blow laid one senseless upon the stones. I passed on. The fairy theatre shone on my right. In the distance the white walls of the City-hall, where so many ruined wretches had heard their last doom—the dark jail—the disgusting bridewell. What must be the thoughts of its unhappy inmates! The band from Peale's museum struck up a lively air—crowds of strange, queer faces shone in the light, as they gathered to listen. A man arrayed in deep mourning, with a long crape hanging from his hat, walked by without pausing; and a watchman with his club paced his rounds.

I stood leaning against a lamp-post listening to the music with its strain "of linked sweetness long drawn out." The crowd went on in every direction; but although I was in the very centre of this vast and magnificent city, yet a feeling of loneliness crept over my spirit.

Suddenly the various sounds grew more distant, and seemed melting away. A dimness came over the houses and crowd. Then it cleared away, as clouds break in fleecy fragments admitting the soft reviving light. I heard the dash of water—the stirring of many branches—the cries of the crows as they wheeled above me in the air. I stood in a forest; wild, deep, and lonely, as if the foot of man had never violated its green and holy haunts. The lamp-post opposite the museum, against which I had leaned, was a knotted and overgrown oak, which stretched abroad its venerable and gigantic limbs, the monarch of the wood. Around the base of the grassy hill on which I stood, a transparent stream was winding, the noise of whose bubbling waters filled the air. In the distance, I could distinguish the silver bosom of the bay—the swift tide of the East river, and the mouth of the Hudson, as its billows chased each other on towards the Atlantic. A sudden rustling of the bushes attracted my attention. A large and slender deer dashed by me, tossing his wide-branching antlers in the air. His eye was wild with terror. He was in the act of plunging into a thicket, when a winged arrow flew by me and quivered in his bosom, stretching him prostrate upon the grass. A tall athletic Indian sprang from the copse, and with a yell which resounded through the forest, buried his tomahawk in his brain. The Genius suddenly appeared.

"You behold what, on this very spot, I have seen ages before you boasted and magnificent city rose into existence. Before the pale white man cut down the trees, and affrighted the proud savage and the fleet deer back from their busy haunts. Mark yonder barbarian. His eyes are flashing with joyful fire. His bronzed cheek—his brawny shape—his broad expanded chest, speak strength and health. We might converse with this lofty and untaught hunter, with his unbent pride and piercing eye—we might reveal to him those events concerning his tribe, which revolving years have brought to light. But it is my object rather to enlighten thee. Yonder form, which seems to be in thy presence, has long ago been resolved into dust. But if we should display to his sight thy city, even as but now its varied and melancholy splendours broke upon thy sight, he would be lost in wonder, and thou wouldst enjoy his surprise. But this scene shall pass away."

Again I leaned against the lamp-post, with the music and the crowd, the laughter, and the many footsteps.

"Thou hast looked back into the regions of the past," said the voice of the Genius, "let me now anticipate the course of time, when a few more ages shall have rolled away."

The multitude were all gone. There was shadow and silence around. Then a noise like the rushing of the distant sea. The light came. The lamp-post had now grown into a tall column, upon whose summit stood an equestrian statue. The City-hall had given place to a temple of vast dimensions. The old hospital was metamorphosed into a spacious store, and along the street, as far as the eye could reach, were blocks of high buildings. Instead of the few people who had before passed without inconvenience along the way, there were dense crowds in strange garments, with weapons now unknown. I wandered on for miles. Still the same mass of buildings, and dense and ceaseless tide of human beings. Monuments, arches, gardens, fountains, squares and canals—then marble palaces, half hidden by trees, appeared—graveyards with names which I had never heard. Statues of heroes, statesmen, poets yet unborn, and paintings of lovely women now among the things to be. Still there was music and laughter—still the gay and the graceful crowded by. Mourners, cripples and mendicants, were yet mingled with the affluent and the happy.

"And will it go on thus for ever?" said I.

As I spoke, I was alone. The scene had changed. I had wandered on to the suburbs of the city. The starry heavens were over me, and the fresh evening breeze was playing upon my cheek.

"At least," thought I, as I paused beneath the window of a remembered girl, to catch the well known tones of a song which had often pleased me before—"At least I will enjoy the present, whatever gorgeous and romantic things there may be in foreign climes, which I am destined never to behold, and however the world may run on in future ages." AMERICAN FORESTS.

Nature here
Wentoned as in her prime; and played at will
Her virgin fancies, pouring forth more sweet,
Wild above rule or art.—Milton.

In his gayer moments, man is a social being. His heart has a thousand delicate chords whose vibrations are not limited to itself, but pass on with an electric influence, awakening the slumbering sensibilities of other bosoms. Thus is the music of sympathy awakened, and its tones of sadness or of mirth responded with all the truth and precision of an echo. This reciprocation of feeling is the golden chain that links heart to heart, and the only one which the rust of years, and the canker of corroding passions, can neither sully nor dispart. Yet there are seasons in the life of every individual, however social he may be, in which he wishes the chain were broken—hours when his wearied spirit longs to turn away from the idle pursuits, the gilded vanities, the hollow delusive gratifications of humanity—to escape from and, like a hermit, retire to the solitude of his own bosom. The soul, in the consciousness of her high endowments, is assured that here is a sovereignty independent of all earthly alliances. She surveys the wide extent of her resources, and proudly imagines that she can dwell apart from the common brotherhood, un beholden to its ministrations for aught of the means of enjoyment.

With this assurance, she is willing for a season to forego the endearments and the animating scenes of human society, for a closer intimacy with herself. She loves to withdraw alone from the bustling and crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis, to still places beyond the sound or the sympathies of its busy multitudes; where no evil passions intrude, and where earth still wears the charm, the peace, the unsullied beauty of its first creation. We rejoice that such congenial places are abundant in our yet youthful country. We rejoice, that though we have no ivied ruins, nor spectred towers, nor monastic grottoes for the haunts of contemplation, there are not wanting, even around the suburbs of our largest cities, a fit retreat for her peaceful votaries. Aye, here are deeper and more congenial seclusions than art hath ever fashioned for meditation—even the far-reaching and magnificent forests, throughout whose green aisles there reigns a stillness, a tranquillity and a refreshing purity, vainly sought for in the hackneyed resorts of civilized life. Without envy, we leave to other lands their artificial parks and fountains, their gothic abbeys and eternal pyramids, since the revolution of years has left uninjured, within our borders, so much of the primeval beauty and sublimity of nature. While they point with exultation to their delightful gardens, where imagination and taste have united their enchantments, and where every art has lavished its perfections, we may direct their glance to our wide forests—nature's gardens, laid out on her own magnificent scale, whose green alleys are embellished with living statues and flying pictures, and skirted by clear waters, upon whose tranquil bosoms sleep the images of every form of vegetation, from the tiny harebell to the giant oak of an hundred cubits.

The hardy industry of two centuries, however, has gone far to erase this striking feature from the landscapes of the older states, where its place is often supplied with neat villages, golden harvest-fields, luxuriant meadows, and sunny pastures dotted with flocks and herds. This is particularly the fact with regard to New-England. The wilderness, to whose lonely depths the Mayflower committed her stern adventures, has passed away with the red men who welcomed the pilgrim to their wigwam; and, like that fated and down-trodden race, scarce a relic remains of its former grandeur. The axe has let in the pleasant sunlight upon the hill-slope and fertile interval, and the shadows which had there slumbered for centuries upon centuries, are gone for ever. Here and there an Anak of the forest, in the form of a giant elm or oak, has escaped the devastation of the woodman; but even these are not spared, and after the lapse of a few years, the places that now know them will know them no longer.

But he who would behold vegetation in its most varied and astonishing productions, must turn to our western forests, where human industry has not yet trenched on the lonely and wild grandeur of unviolated nature. The scene is worth a pilgrimage to the lover of the beautiful and sublime as here exhibited. After having ascended some commanding height, what a glorious spectacle is presented to his view! On every side nothing is to be seen but one wide expanse of woods—one vast ocean of living verdure, unbounded, and unbroken, except here and there by a lake or river, whose silvery waters are just visible through the clustering foliage. If the winds are abroad, his heart bounds within him as he traces their hurried course from knoll to knoll, and listens to the unearthly and deep music which fills the solitude as with the sound of many waters. But should the gale freshen to a hurricane, as is not unfrequently the case, no scene, not even the ocean in its wildest commotions, can exceed in majesty the prospect around him. Within the whole compass of his horizon not a leaf, not a bough is still—all is one wild surge of vegetation. Ten thousand times ten thousand trees are swaying to the invisible impulse, and tossing their innumerable branches aloft as if exulting in the gift of existence, the thrill of some joyous perception. As the tempest sweeps on, huge oaks are twisted from their gnarled trunks, and pines, at whose "mast head" the sailor boy would grow dizzy, are torn from their rooted moorings and snatched away as by some mighty and mysterious power. Crash follows crash in hurried succession, as the tornado, like the pioneer of desolation, marks its terrible career for leagues through the massed foliage, with a roar that would drown the huzza of an assembled nation. What are the glories of the tournament, the triumph, and the battlefield—what the power of arts—what all human pageants, compared with such a scene? They dwindle to insignificance, and are lost in the sublimity with which nature robes herself to humble the ambition of man.

At all seasons and for all hearts, forest scenery has a charm. Even in winter, when its aspect is least attractive, I have known those who would leave the cheerful fireside and the last novel, for a "communion with the visible forms" of a sylvan and snow-clad landscape. If the day is serene, a ramble at such a season is not devoid of pleasure to a susceptible mind. The air is then like liquid crystal; the earth, paved with the most brilliant diamonds, and the trees, studded to their smallest twigs with frost gems and icicles, present one of the most beautiful appearances that can be imagined. Clumps of evergreen crown the upland path with the verdure of summer; and as the little snowbird chirps cheerily amid the branches, all the pleasant associations of that better season pass gaily before the mind. And then too the deep baying of the fox-hound, and the mellow winding of the hunter's horn, and the wild song of the wood-chopper, as they ring through the echoing glens, are worth all the piano music that has ever saddened a winter parlour since the days of Orpheus. And when the gentle southwest has come back at the voice of spring, it is still more delightful to go forth to the sunny woods. Then he who has wept over the graves of the beloved, and to whom the falling and sear leaf was an omen of his own sad lot, may rejoice in hope as he marks the budding branch and the resurrection of the flowers. Yea, he may rejoice; for shall the leafless bough and the frail forest-flower awake to renewed existence, and the high in heart, the good, the excellent of earth, whose memory is a blessing, sleep on for ever? Answer me, thou booster of annihilation, who wouldst blot out the last star of the future! Shall the winter of inanimate nature be like a lingering and chastened spring, and the winter of the tomb chill, verdureless, and eternal? Still more beautiful is the forest scenery of summer, when the box-wood and magnolia have put forth their blossoms, and the sequestered haunts of faun and dryad are filled with perfume and song. Here you may ramble under the full effulgence of a noonday sun, through shadowy paths and cool retreats, over which the woods have hung their emerald curtain. But autumn—bright, mellow, blushing autumn—is the season in which to visit our forest landscapes. The "russet mantle" which invests the scenery of England during the last months of the year, is here supplied by a bright and many-tinted robe. It seems as if the sun-set clouds of Italy had been transferred by some mighty magician to the sylvan solitudes of the west. The spectator may take his survey from the loftiest eminence, and yet around and far on beyond the limit of his vision, all is one vast assemblage of painted beauty. Every leaf is a prism, and every tree the personification of a rainbow. No scene in nature can present to the imagination a fairer image of Paradise, where

While gazing on such a scene, I have not wondered that the fascination of cultivated society has been found too weak to hold many even of its most polished members, within the sphere of its influence. At that hour, the tales of the roving and half-tamed Indian, pining under the restraints of civilization, and looking wistfully back to the simple joys of his native wilds, are no longer a marvel. I can enter into his stirring feelings as fancy snatches him away to the remembered woods, and sends him bounding on the trail of the panther, or joyously skimming over the sylvan lake. I can hear with him the scream of the mountain eagle, and join in the chase-song, or hymn to the Great Spirit who, as he believes, shall guide him to a yet brighter clime, whose game is nobler and more abundant, and whose leaves are for ever green. Like him too, during the mastery of such feelings, I could, without a sigh, bid farewell to cot or palace, hamlet or city, for the deep recesses of the pathless and uncontaminated forests. Ay, I could forego the endearments and the heart-boarded associations of home itself, to indulge, for a season, in the reveries of the hermit. Yet start not, reader, I am not unsociable or misanthropic. The desire is natural, and we are often willing to gratify it, despite of the pleasures of companionship, and the multiplied allurements with which the world solicits our allegiance. The feeling of solitariness which one experiences in the hushed sanctuaries of the forest, though melancholy, is not unpleasant. The soul is stirred and expanded by the consciousness of being alone with nature in her chosen and untrodden seclusions. Surely the ancients did not err in placing their temples and their altars in the loftiest and most retired groves; for where should the reverence of the worshipper be more sincere than in those awful shades, which superstition taught him were the most fitting abodes of the divinities he propitiated.

Whether the desire and enjoyment of solitude would be permanent to a cultivated mind that had tasted the gratifications of society, is not for me to determine. I once thought they would. It was some two or three years since, during a sojourn at one of the border hamlets of the remote west. While on a hunting excursion at that time, having rambled some miles into the forest, I came unexpectedly upon a sheltered spring neatly walled round with white limestone, from which a beaten footpath led away towards the upland, at a short distance from where I stood. Striking into the path, I soon came to a little opening, in the middle of which I was surprised to discover a small neat cottage almost infolded in the pendant branches of a large elm, in whose shade, on a turf seat, sat an apparently young man engaged in reading. At his side lay a beautiful spaniel, and at his feet a tame deer. Curiosity was excited, and I ventured to intrude upon the stranger's retirement. He received me with the air of a gentleman, and kindly invited me to partake of his sylvan cheer of wild fruits and milk. While enjoying his hospitality, I could not but manifest a desire to know the cause of his singular seclusion.

"The tale is short," replied the stranger, "but it may not be uninteresting. I was the only child of distinguished parents, who gave me every advantage which wealth can command, of becoming learned and accomplished. I studied at our first institutions, and in the universities of Europe my education was completed. My parents' death left me without a single relative, and the master of a princely fortune. Young, inexperienced and aspiring, I came forth into the world; I moved in the highest circles of the metropolis, honoured by the honourable, and surrounded by flatterers. Gold is a wonderful magnifier of genius, and like charity it glides over a multitude of imperfections. But like Aladdin, I was destined to lose the talisman which gave me power. The treachery of a friend made me a bankrupt; the falsity of a woman, a bachelor. My acquaintances grew distant—the sycophant forgot his obsequiousness, and he who had lived upon my bounty, was no longer grateful. I stood alone. With my acquisitions I might have re-established my fortune, but I esteemed the object not worth the sacrifice. I could not descend to the petty and low cunning with which avarice seeks to multiply her accumulations. I could not stoop to the debasing artifices of the miser, that I might win back by affluence the calculating servility of the hollow-hearted.

"Therefore I turned away from the world, and have found quiet and enjoyment in these peaceful solitudes. The trees around my cottage have become as brothers—my books are my society, and my deer and spaniel are companions that never flatter or deceive. Pause ere you condemn my seclusion. Though the world might have profited somewhat by my service, yet the loss of one indigent and incapacitated member, is more than compensated by the removal of a possibly bad example."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

MY COUSIN ISABEL.

BY GEORGE DENISON PRENTICE.

ISABEL was a poetess—one of those strange sweet beings that sometimes meet us here, and seem like stars wandered away to earth from their own beautiful spheres. I knew her not till she was fifteen, and she was then all I knew or could fancy of loveliness. She was ever a glad creature, and the young blossoms that shone like gems on the midnight of her tresses, were not more bright and shadowless than the sweet brow that arched beneath them. Hers was indeed a spiritual existence. She loved the glorious things of earth as an angel loves his own paradise, and her soul would often blend with them, till the fulness of her ecstasy could find utterance but in tears. Poetry was, to her, a familiar dream—a vision of floating loveliness—and she moved abroad in the light of its inspired divinity. I have strayed by her side on a summer evening, and listened with her to the mysterious pine-lutes of the forest, or the deep murmur of the mountain streams, and gazed upon the moonlight as it was tinting the mists, the waves, and the wooded hills, with the bright colouring of dreams, and looked abroad upon the great ocean heaving perpetually as if it were the throbbing heart of the universe, and then her thoughts would have utterance, and her language came like the low music of a twilight wave—the breathing forth of the soul of poetry, that had floated into her spirit from the sky, the flowers, the waters, and all the thousand objects among which she was wandering—and I yielded to the enchantment, till I could have knelt to her in worship as to a glorious vision sent down from a perfect sphere.

Isabel knew little of society. Her home was where she could gaze at will on the lovely and the sublime, the first opening of the blossoms of spring beneath the budding tree, and the stately steppings of the Almighty amid the thunder crags and roaring forests of the mountain. When her thoughts strayed beyond these, it was to hold communion, not with the allurements of society, but with the shining orbs, the bright and spiritual worlds above her. Her thoughts went upward, like incense gushing from a broken urn. The following hymn, which I found in her favourite arbour after a night of peculiar stillness and beauty, is a specimen of her habits of contemplation.

Those burning stars!—What are they?—I have dreamed.

That they were blossoms on the tree of life—
Or glory flung back from the mighty wings
Of God's archangels—or that you blue sky,
With all its gorgeous blazonry of stars,
Was but a banner waving on the winds
From the far wall of heaven!—And I have sat
And drank their gush of glory, till I felt
Their flash electric trembling with a deep
And strong vibration down the living wire
Of chainless passion—and my every pulse
Was beating high, as if a spring were there
To lift me up where I might ever roam
Mid the unfathomed vastness of the sky,
And dwell with those high stars, and see their light
Poured down upon the blessed earth, like dew
From the bright urns of naiads!

Beautiful stars!

What are ye?—There is in my heart of hearts
A fount, that heaves beneath you like the deep
Beneath the glories of the midnight moon!
And list!—your music-tones are floating now
Around me like an element—so low,
So wildly beautiful, I almost deem
That ye are there the living harp of God,
O'er which the incense winds of Eden stray,
And wake such tones of mystic minstrelsy,
As well might wander down to this dim world
To fashion dreams of heaven!—Peal on—peal on—Nature's high anthem!—for my life has caught
A portion of your purity and power,
And seems but as a sweet and holy tone
Of wild star-music.

Blessed—blessed things!

Ye are in heaven, and I on earth!—my soul,
Even with a whirlwind's rush, may wander off
To your immortal realms, but it must fall,
Like your own ancient psalm, from its height,
To dim its new-caught glories in the dust!—
This earth is very beautiful—I love
Its wilderness of spring-flowers—its bright clouds—
The majesty of mountains—and the wild
Magnificence of ocean—for they come,
Like visions, o'er my heart—but when I look
On your unflinching loveliness, I feel
Like a lost infant gazing on its home,
And weep to die, and come where ye repose
Upon your boundless heaven, like parted souls
On an eternity of blessedness!

"This wonderful what changes may be wrought by a few fleeting years in a sensitive spirit. I was alone with Isabel in her arbour on a calm evening of her twentieth spring; and when she chanted, as usual, a sweet and tender air, I could not but contrast the passionate melancholy of her voice with the tone of joyousness with which she had so often delighted me in her girlhood. Isabel was sinking into the grave. Passion had not visited her in any of its fiercer forms, but her heart had sunk down from its starry height, and, like an autumn flower, was casting its life-breath upon the winds. I looked upon her, and her eyes were raised to heaven, and as the moonbeams came down and slumbered in their depths, she shook aside her long tresses that seemed to have caught their wildness and darkness from the storm, and a gush of tears, such as come when the heart yearns for language, bathed her cheek, and she sobbed long and loud. At length, her tone and look were changed to their wonted calmness. "I have been thinking," said she, "that I am about to die—about to go away from this cold world, where every thing is chilled in its blossoming. It should be so. I was once a happy creature—my thoughts were Eden birds, that fluttered and sung in the bright air of heaven, but died when their tender plumage was touched by the earth. A child of dreams, I sought the world—but I am wearied now—and I will break my poor lute and die. Oh, whence are the bright visions, that have shed their broken and momentary gleams upon my spirit, and led me on to seek in vain their beautiful realities amid all the changes of existence! I have often dreamed that we must have lived in some other and more glorious state of being, and that the mysterious glimpses that here linger round our souls are the broken remembrances of that better realm. They are brightest in childhood—they picture a rainbow in every tear—and, in our infant thoughtlessness we imagine them the shadow of the glories that await us in life; but, as we journey onward, they begin to dissolve away; the music with which they come over us, swells faintly and more faintly upon the blast, till at length we awake, and find that all is but a cold and bitter mockery."

In a few days we laid Isabel in her grave. She slumbers in a retired spot, and it has often been my consolation to go and muse alone over her silent resting place. During my last visit, I penciled an unworthy tribute to the memory of the child of song.

Dear Isabel, again I come to linger and to weep
Upon the spot where wild-flow'rs spring to mark thy place of sleep,
And, as I kneel beside thy urn, thy spirit from afar
Comes o'er my memory like the tone, the music of a star

Thou wert the roselight of my morn—the idol of my dreams—
And life, with thee, was like the fall of summer's quiet streams;
And, if a dark cloud ever came upon my visions fair,
Thy love shone o'er the gathering shade, and left the rainbow there.

Thy breezy step is seen no more upon the blue hill's brow,
And beauty's early light has left my darkened day dreams now—
But my lone spirit brightens yet, like that immortal flower,
That sends abroad at eve the rays it drank at morn's first hour.

Dear minstrel-girl—thine was the high, the holy gift of fire,
And beautiful its flashes played around thy glowing lyre,
But it consumed thy heart, for there its centred brightness fell,
And thou art now a thing of dust, my own loved Isabel!

CLERICAL CHIVALRY.

Some years ago the Rev. Mr. C. (of the secession church) having received a number of appointments from his synod to preach the gospel in England, left this country for the purpose of fulfilling them. After taking his seat in one of the stage coaches, he found himself, among others, in company with two military officers, who were indulging by the way in that vice of serjeant-majors—profane swearing. Having a natural, as well as professional, antipathy to such conversation, he, after bearing with them for a while, at length took the liberty of asking them what usage he would receive at their hands, were he to speak against his majesty, their master? They instantly replied that they would turn him out of their company, and the coach together, without ceremony. "And what do you think should be your fate," rejoined the undaunted preacher, "for blaspheming the Master whom I have the honour to serve?" To this no answer was returned; nor were any more words exchanged between the parties, till the coach reached an inn on the road, where the passengers had to stop for a short time. When Mr. C. entered the house, he requested to be shown into a room by himself; which circumstance his two military companions having observed, they sent him by the waiter a written challenge; which, having received and read, he immediately threw into the fire, and told the bearer to inform the gentlemen that he was a minister, and not at liberty to comply with their request. The man having delivered this answer, shortly returned with another message to the same effect as the first, which was treated in a similar manner. Mr. C.'s would-be antagonists now finding that there was little probability of attaining their object without coming into personal contact with him, entered his room with a brace of pistols and swords, desiring him to choose his weapon or be branded as a coward. Little, however, did the military gentlemen know with whom they had to deal. Mr. C., while pursuing his professional studies at Edinburgh, had given diligent (though clandestine) attendance at the Military Academy at the University; and, in consequence, became as great a proficient at handling the broadsword as at elucidating a text. Not caring, therefore, to let his good be any further evil spoken of, he coolly took up one of the swords, and called upon his antagonists to defend themselves. One of them, of course, immediately entered the lists, but was soon most reluctantly compelled to surrender his weapon. Mr. C. now challenged the other to come forward; which, having done, he soon shared the same inglorious fate as his brother. Mr. C.'s adversaries being thus put hors-de-combat, he next seized their swords, and placing their points under his toes, snapped them in pieces one after the other; and then desired the owners to leave his presence, which the urgency of the case compelled them to do; not, however, without manifesting feelings of disagreeable mortification at their own defeat, and of some astonishment at the unexpected science and readiness of their clerical acquaintance.

JAMES NACK THE DEAF AND DUMB POET.

Among the most remarkable instances of precocious talents and acquirements is James Nack, the deaf and dumb poet of the city of New-York. He is now not far from twenty years of age, but as young as he is, he has written more voluminously than any poet among all those I have named. But only one volume of his works is as yet printed, though he has many manuscripts on hand which will probably see the light when he has become more known. This young man's growth has been most wonderful. He was born with perfect organs of hearing and of speech, and retained them until he was nine years old, when by an accident his head was so crushed as to have destroyed his auditory nerves, and by degrees his faculty of speech was lost—a very natural consequence of his misfortune. His father had been unfortunate in business as a merchant in Nack's infancy, and he had no advantages of schooling but what he picked up from his sisters, yet was considered a good reader at four years of age, and he had a passion, a very common one in forward children, of preaching—that is, in a solemn way, muttering over their fancies. A bright and observing child sees the great attention and reverence that is paid to the services of the clergyman, not only by his parents and his brothers and sisters, but by all in the church. He is taught that the speaker is a good man, and in the first awakenings of his mind he attempts to imitate him. Nack had heard the singers in the church, and had caught something of the chiming of words, and once, being without a hymn book, he framed a couplet, for which he was applauded, and this encouraged him to make a few lines every day, and before he was in his ninth year he had a good knowledge of rhythm from a cultivated ear. This he has so completely kept in his memory, that I question very much whether there is any poet living who has a better knowledge of rhyming words in the English language than Nack.

As soon as he recovered from the injury done to his head, as far as he ever recovered, he was sent to the asylum for the deaf and dumb. But it is quite questionable whether the instructors of that excellent institution ever precisely understood the bent and the extent of his genius.

At about twelve years of age Nack wrote a tragedy; this he destroyed; but his mind at that time was in one constant dramatic effort; it was an expedient he resorted to, to get rid of the deep wretchedness he felt at being, as it were, left alone with himself to contemplate his misfortune in losing his hearing and speech. In the regions of imagination he was soothed, and warmed with all the dreamy delights to be found in such fairy land; an expedient that riper minds have resorted to, to soften the agencies of the heart.

The productions of his fourteenth year were numerous, but to use his own words "most of these have perished except two or three small pieces inserted in my published volume. Most of the minor pieces in that volume were written in my fifteenth year, among which, those I am proudest of, are Blue eyed Maid, the Grave of Mary, and the Gallant Highland Rover."

In his fifteenth year he wrote another tragedy. It was written under peculiar circumstances, at the early dawn of morning in the winter season, in the garret where he lodged, without a spark of fire, and only a stump of a pen, and without a table; he stole the moments to write a long tragedy on his knees. He had no sooner finished than he concealed it, and has never suffered it to be seen.

In his sixteenth year he wrote, with many other poems, that beautiful effort of genius, the Minstrel Boy. This came from his heart, and it reaches the heart of every reader. It has a deep tone of feeling, a sweetness of language, and ease of versification, that will secure its immortality.

Until his sixteenth year he had never found any one who was capable of understanding his character, and of giving him advice and encouragement united to friendship. It was then he began to feel the balmy soothings of kindness that came with advice and patronage. It was not until this period that he had found books, except by accident. He now was in the library of a gentleman of taste, who was as kind to him as a father. This situation opened a new world to him. He revelled in fresh delights; devoured books upon poetry, history, philosophy, fiction, mathematics, politics, ethics, criticism, and theology; formed a thousand theories and tore them up, root and branch, for new creations; and these again shared the same fate. He wrote, as well as read on all these subjects, and piled manuscript upon manuscript, which he sometimes viewed with all the rapture of genius, and then with freakish untowardness turned from his numerous progeny with loathing. With all the irritation of wounded sensibility, he grows feverish over his reminiscences, and then again hurries on to perform some new task. He seems to have no dread of any labour, however severe it may be, if it will please a friend, or come to any account for himself or others.

His acquirements, at his early age, in the languages and all the branches of knowledge, ordinary and extraordinary, is superior to that of any young man's of the same age I have ever met with. There are a strength and maturity about his mind not to be found in one who has had the use of his ears and tongue. His criticisms have a sagacity and shrewdness unequalled by those who were critics long before he was born. He acquires a language with the most astonishing facility. No one I ever knew, could do it with the same readiness, except the late learned orientalist, George Bethune English. Nack unites in a most astonishing degree those two seemingly inconsistent qualities, restlessness and perseverance. He reads, writes, and does all things as though he had just breathed the Delphi vapour, and perseveres as though he were chained to the spot by some talismanic power. He is a bunch of delicate fibres, too susceptible for composure; or rather of nerves, jarred to agony, if struck by a rude hand. Poetical beings are often too sensitive when in possession of every natural property and gift; but when deprived of the charms of hearing and speaking, the pulses of the heart seem to beat in our own sight, without even the thinnest skin to hide them; open to every blast of a cold and cruel world. But in a few years he will find things changing around him, and these youthful labors now viewed as useless, will become in his opinion, as the foundation stones of a goodly edifice, in the fashioning of which he has learnt the skill of a literary architect, and acquired the strength to raise a temple of imperishable fame, for his own and his country's glory. THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

The attempt would be interesting to ascertain how far this current phrase is correct with reference to the present times. An elaborate disquisition might lead to conclusions which would startle the great number of persons, who acquiesce implicitly in set terms often repeated, and sententious opinions generally received. There is, assuredly, a quick and broad march of the mechanical arts and processes:—steam accomplishes daily wonders and miracles; locomotive engines, whether in the shape of cars or boats, have prodigiously compressed space and time; physical expedition and productive power, have, of late, vastly and astonishingly increased, and are likely to advance still more.

In our country, along with the success of physical industry and mechanical ingenuity, there is a considerable improvement in the condition and spirit of the classes to which they belong; and in consequence education is more widely sought, intelligence further developed, and the soul elevated and enlarged. The mechanical and inventive philosophy, too, has been stimulated; and genius in that department quickened:—the human faculties are more extensively and efficaciously applied to refine and multiply the conveniences and luxuries of social life; and wherever there is an enhancement of physical comfort and power, there will be some addition of moral force and enjoyment.

In the particulars thus slightly indicated in our second paragraph, we find, indeed, what may be styled a march of intellect: mind and heart gain in vigour and efficiency; and we cannot doubt that when the physical career has been run—(for it must have its limits of velocity and contrivance)—greater facilities and scope would have been created for superior instruction and exertion of the intellectual man as a moral and political philosopher, a writer, an orator, a poet, a scholar, a jurist, a religious being, or a Christian. But so far as the famous grand march relates to those characters, and to the practical morals of mankind,—enlarge the inquiry, and you discover room for skepticism. Education has become more common; but it is really improved in itself! With the exception of the Lancasterian method—which merely renders it cheaper, and opens it to greater numbers,—what has been devised, recently, which betters or perfects the thing? Dictionaries and grammars, upon new plans, are issued weekly: Are they truly superior to those which were studied and consulted at the beginning of the century? Novels and journals are substituted for the former classical books of elegant and popular literature, and Encyclopedias for original and ample treatises: Reference and gustation are now the modes of acquiring knowledge, not application and digestion, as in days of yore. What has been gained? The best universities, colleges, and schools of which we read, or with which we are directly acquainted, are conducted upon the old systems of instruction and discipline;—with some ingrafted subjects of learning, perhaps, and some new manuals, embracing the gradual or sudden accessions to science. The variation of forms, the boasted simplification of methods, the comprehension of topics, the connexion of practical or mechanical with purely literary training, may all be questioned as to their influence on the real march of intellect, though they may befit and gratify the peculiar pretensions and exigencies of the age.

In all the principal kingdoms of Europe, the official records of crime and vice show an increase, beyond that of population. We fear that the case is the same in this republic,—judging from the police reports and the recitals in the newspapers. We would not be supposed to understate the agency of the innumerable societies for the propagation of knowledge and religion, and the prevention or reform of guilt. It may be believed that if they do not occasion morals to be generally better than they were, they avert a far greater deterioration,—they serve in the social world, like the pumps in a leaky ship; they keep down the waters of bitterness, which may gain upon them, but yet cannot mount to the fatal height.

We are more confident as to real advancement of intellect, in the points of political information and sagacity, throughout Europe and America. On these, also, there are grounds of incredulity, and many sensible and benevolent skeptics; but human rights and sound political theory, and national welfare, are, doubtless, more widely and clearly understood and duly appreciated than at any antecedent period: and notwithstanding the repeated convulsions in Mexico and South America, and the continuance of old dynasties and institutions in the other hemisphere, we can distinguish light, energy, and amelioration in details, which must be progressive, and ere very long remove formidable impediments and work the most salutary changes. The schoolmaster may not be abroad to so much purpose as is imagined and proclaimed,—but the potent genius or contagious spirit of republicanism, now moving over the nations, cannot fail to be beneficially operative beyond all common augury or calculation. Intellect will be sternly roused, and fully released from shackles of different kinds, which rendered impossible any rapid or material advance and refinement.

FASHIONABLE BOOKS.

The author of Paul Clifford mentions, in a note, that the poetess L. E. L. (Miss Landon) is composing a novel for the press, the success of which he confidently predicts. The traveller Madden has published a romance entitled The Mussulman, and the traveller Macfarlane, a tale of Constantinople called The Armenians. Thus it is, that when a writer gains public favour in the department of poetry, history or travels, a novel from the same pen is the consequence—a tribute to the peculiar taste or appetite of the times,—a competition for the golden apple. The successful mathematicians and naturalists may soon be tempted to adopt the same plan. In his dedicatory epistle, the author of Paul Clifford asks—“Politics, essays, travels, biography, history—are these subjects on which one is more likely to obtain a decent, a tolerably durable reputation, than by the composition of novels? I fear not.” He adds in a note—

“While ‘The Sketch Book’ is found in every young lady’s dressing room; and ‘Bracebridge Hall’ is still in high request in every country book-club; ‘The Life of Columbus,’ invaluable, if only from the subject so felicitously chosen; ‘The Wars of Grenada,’ scarcely less valuable from the subject so consummately adorned, and so stirringly painted; are the one slowly passing into forgetfulness, and the other slumbering, with uncut leaves upon the shelf? Compare the momentary sensation produced by the first appearance of Lord King’s ‘Life of Locke,’ with the sensation, durable and intense, which, replete, as it is, with the treasure of Locke’s familiar thoughts, it would have produced twenty years ago! ‘Godwin’s History of the Commonwealth,’ one of the most manly and impartial records ever written, lives less upon the memory than ‘Almacks,’ and ‘Cyril Thornton,’ produced some four years since, is in more immediate vogue than the admirable history by the same author—published but the other day. True, that among a succeeding generation, there may possibly be a re-action—lethargic octaves be awakened from their untimely trance, and enlivened quartos ‘take up their beds and walk!’”

The editor of an evening paper observes—“That books have made few knaves, we are ready to acknowledge.” This strikes us as a singular error. Books have made knaves, libertines and hypocrites without number. The examples furnished, the lessons taught, the excitement for the passions abounding in them, are incalculably operative. Literature, or printing, in its broadest application, is, perhaps, the most powerful of agents upon human character and conduct. It most exalts and purifies; or corrupts and destroys. Hence, the importance of the ingredients and complexion of books, particularly the popular or favourite species such as tales and romances.—Hence, we may presume, the zeal of contemporary Christians and philanthropists in spreading the Bible and moral or religious tracts. A deep observer thought the privilege of making the ballads of a nation, the surest means of plastic power.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER.

Paris, May 4, 1830.

A new historical novel, in two volumes, has just made its appearance here, under the title of les Mauvais Garçons. It displays an animated, and, according to the French critics, a faithful picture of Paris during the captivity of Francis I. in 1525. At that time the metropolis of the grande nation was infested by a tribe of nondescript adventurers, broken gamblers, cut-purses, beggars, students, Bohemians, and other marauders, known under the general and characteristic appellation of mauvais garçons. The archers of the watch, like modern charlies, frequently participated in the depredations of these midnight plunderers, whose war-cry was, Vive Bourgogne! à sac! à sac! Such are the data which have furnished the materials of a work possessing much local interest, and some dramatic sketches.

The dilettanti will scarcely credit the fact, that Mademoiselle Sontag has been—(in what vocabulary shall I find a phrase to soften the appalling intelligence?)—that Mlle. Sontag has been absolutely hissed at Berlin! Such, however, is the dismal truth. After a series of successful appearances in the characters of Desdemona, Rosina, and Edile, in the comic opera of Jocunde, the divine Sontag was hissed in the part of Anna, in Mozart’s Don Juan. And this too from a Berlin audience! Horresco referens! The prima donna, little accustomed to such unmelodious sounds, is said to have swooned away at the first intimation of public displeasure. On her recovery, she again ventured to brave the scarcely appeased fury of the storm; and after singing a quatuor in the second act, was so affected by the recollection of the cruel affront, that she again fainted. Another prima donna, who happened to be in the theatre, “quite by accident, as a body might say,” was obliged to finish the part.

“Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer cloud,
Without our special wonder?”

The concert season is fast approaching towards its close. The Parisian dilettanti, unlike their more tonish London brethren, are not sufficiently advanced in civilization to protrude their winter into the dust of June or July, and in a few weeks, the roulades of our drawing-room nightingales will be abandoned for the song, ou naturel, of the lark and the linnet.

Paganini is still at Frankfort, where he continues to give public concerts. His last took place on the 11th ult. A superb medal of Beethoven is now on sale in Paris. On one side is the head of the celebrated composer, with the words “Louis Von Beethoven;” on the other a lyre, surrounded by the following inscription:—“Né le 27 Decembre, 1770, a Bonn; mort le 26 Mars, 1827.”

The greatest beauty in female dress is that which is most simple, and at the same time gracefully adapted to exhibit the natural beauty of the female form. This simplicity should be observed, even in colour; a profusion of tawdry and glaring colours bespeaks a tasteless and vulgar mind, even if the wearer were a duchess. Colour should also always be adapted to complexion. Ladies with delicate rosy complexions bear white and light blue better than dark colours, while on the contrary, sallow hues of complexion will not bear these colours near them, and imperatively require dark quiet colours to give them beauty: yellow is the most trying and dangerous of all, and can only be worn by the rich-toned healthy looking brunette.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Mechanics’ and Farmers’ Magazine of Useful Knowledge.—At the present time, when such an unexampled hue and cry are raised about the education of the operative classes, it is particularly important that well-instructed teachers and competent writers devote their time and energy to the solid improvement and moral safety of this most extensive and interesting portion of our fellow-citizens. Wolves are every where stalking about in sheep’s clothing, seeking whom they may devour, and render a prey to their iniquitous and deep-laid schemes. Freedom, independence, equality, and knowledge are the magic words adopted to influence the minds of the deluded multitude, to render them hostile to the existing condition of society, and thus to open a way for the aggrandizement and supremacy of a few artful and designing demagogues, who are ambitious of fortunes, and see their only forlorn hope in the destruction of the very elements of morality, religion, and order. These words are beautiful in sound, and are identified with the prosperity and perfection of man, but the ideas with which they are in reality, and by the many associated, are far from being those intended by the juggling reformers to whom we now allude. As a proof of what we advance, the following fact may be adduced as evidence. Education is the ever-recurring theme on which these would-be regenerators decant in all their speeches and writings. Without knowledge they maintain that a people are incompetent to govern themselves. And this truism who ever questioned? What, then, propose then to achieve? They should, if sincerely attached to the avowed objects, educate the people first, and then incite them to demand their full share of political rights, which they assert is now withheld from them. This plan, however, is not at all to their liking; it is too slow and tedious in its operation, and they would be reduced to the nothingness to which they are wedded before it could be completed. Power, wealth, and influence would then revert to other hands, hands far different from theirs. What then is to be done? Gain power at all hazards. Inflame the people to assume all that they can get by brutal violence, and then education will come afterwards; and if it does not, what matters it? Their object will have been attained. Every benevolent man must shrink with horror from a sight of the evils which would attend the consummation of such reform, and view with pleasure every effort made to administer real knowledge and useful light to the ignorant. Such an attempt is the one by Mr. Sargent, and we sincerely hope that it will prove successful. There exists no greater foe to political disorder than science. Her panoply is all-potent against the cunning wiles and sophistical declamations of seditious knaves and disorganizers; and is, withal, the most ready source of attraction to all social and moral improvement. “Get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding;” so sayeth the appropriate motto of this neat periodical; and so should every honest lover of the people and the people’s rights say. To no class of men is the acquisition of knowledge more important than to the working classes—not the superficial idle knowledge which can be communicated by female fanatic adventurers and her parasites; but the knowledge of nature, and of nature’s laws, the knowledge of which elevated Franklin, Rittenhouse, Sherman, Arkwright, and Fulton from the humblest sphere of life to be the benefactors of mankind.

The late Adjutant General of this State.—In the death of General Nicholas F. Beck, society has lost one of its brightest ornaments, and the public service been despoiled of one of its ablest and most faithful officers. Respected by all for his unassuming and affable deportment, his incorruptible integrity, his strict attention to the duties of his office, and for the ability and success with which he prosecuted an arduous profession, yet it was more especially by the few, to whom his retiring modesty allowed his merits to be more intimately known, that he was admired for his numerous attainments in literature and general knowledge, his skill and talent as a writer, and his polished conversation and generous disposition as a gentleman and a friend. He had long suffered under the slow and lingering inflictions of that terrible disease, which proves so unsparring and frequent a scourge to the talent, the worth, the beauty, and the youth of our country. He bore his sufferings with characteristic fortitude, and resigned, without a murmur, the most brilliant prospects of life, and the most endearing attachments which could rivet man’s affections to earth. The highest honours were paid to his remains by the civil and military authorities in the Capital, and his memory will long live green in the minds of those who loved his virtues and respected his talents.

My Cousin Isabel.—There will be found in this number a highly pathetic though just sketch, entitled “My Cousin Isabel.” It is from the pen of the editor of the New-England Review. There is a freshness, brilliancy, depth, and vigour of style about the compositions of this gentleman, which rank him deservedly among the first of our poets. It is true that but few of his poetical effusions have fallen under our notice, but those few have riveted our attention, and elicited our involuntary and heartfelt praise. His prose is more familiar to us; and its purity, its singular originality, and its occasionally biting sarcasm, have rendered it universally popular. We boldly predict, that the time is not far distant when this gentleman will assume a most conspicuous station among the writers of our country, which can only be attained by commanding talents and unrelaxing industry.

Female Wages.—A printed circular has been sent to us from Philadelphia, conveying additional information in relation to this important and interesting subject. It is impossible that the efforts of the community, and of the female portion in particular, should not be aroused to action by these repeated and irresistible appeals to their sympathies. The dark gloom which now broods over so fair and large a portion of the operative classes of this country must be removed, and light and comfort administered to their long afflicted hearts. Perseverance will ensure success.

Celebration of the fifty-fourth anniversary of American Independence.—Our anticipations have been realized—our faith in the sobriety, the decorum, and the dignified virtue of our citizens confirmed. The fifth of July was celebrated with pomp and splendour befitting the occasion, and without the occurrence, as we learn, of a solitary event which could call a blush on the cheek of an inhabitant of this thronged and rejoicing city.

FAREWELL, SINCE WE MUST PART.

CON EXPRESSIONE.

Fare-well, fare - well, since we must part, But oft a tear I'll shed for thee, Thy name shall cling a - round my heart, To light the waste of me - mo - ry. To light the waste of me - mo - ry.

2d—Oh! when amidst the gay you rove,
When pleading eyes around you shine
Think of the one who dared to love,
Whose ev'ry pulse was thine—was thine.

2d—Adieu! adieu! perhaps that tear,
Which, trembling, plays upon thy cheek,
Proclaims my name to thee still dear,
And speaks more truth than tongue could speak.

4th—Oh! then if I am still thine own,
Why should my heart with anguish swell?
Alas! from thee for e'er I turn,
We meet no more—farewell—farewell!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

HEBREW.

Jerusalem mourneth.—Jeremiah.

Oh, Judah! thy dwellings are sad,
Thy children are weeping around,
In sackcloth their bosoms are clad
As they look on the famishing ground;
In the deserts they make them a home,
And the mountains awake to their cry;
For the frown of Jehovah hath come,
And his anger is red in the sky.
Thy tender ones throng at the brink,
But the waters are gone from the well;
They gaze on the rock, and they think
Of the gush of the stream from its cell;
How they came to its margin before,
And drank in their innocent mirth;
Away! it is sealed, and no more
Shall the fountain give freshness to earth.
The hearts of the mighty are bowed,
And the lowly are baggard with care;
The voices of mothers are loud,
As they shriek the wild note of despair:
Oh, Jerusalem! mourn through thy halls,
And bend to the dust in thy shame,
For the doom that thy spirit appals
Is famine, the sword, and the flame!

STANZAS.

Written in the common-place book of Miss Margaret L. M. Derrien, of Georgia.

"Elle se promenait sur les gazons fleuris d'un printemps éternel."—Tennyson.

When the earliest birds of the pleasant spring
Are dancing on golden and purple wing,
When the air, music-laden, is blue and bright,
And the new-born blossoms are bathed in light,
When the gale in its freshness goes fanning by,
And its sweet breath floats through the sunny sky,
How the heart, though deep in its prison bound,
Doth leap as if stirred by the tabor's sound!

And who, in the redolent flush of morn,
When a bliss untold in the soul is born,
When the cloud floats on through the fields of air,
Like a spirit's robe in its brightness there—
Oh who, but would feel, in that peaceful hour,
A love in his heart, for that opening flower?
Who would check the flight of the bird or bee,
On their wings of capricious revelry?
Fair visitant! thus, with an earnest heart,
I would this lay to thy page in part:

It is, that the blossom of life is thine,
That thy offerings are laid upon pleasure's shrine!
For thy pathway is sprinkled with pictures bright,
And thy young eye swims in its pure delight;
And as time looks down on thy being now, [brow!
There are pearls on his plume—there is light on his
And oh! if my prayer might avail, to bring
One brighter hue to the radiant spring
That gladdens the young and the fair like thee,
I would pour a voice on my bended knee,
A suppliant voice, that each ardent thought
Which girlhood's promise in glory brought,
Might endure till life's evening had waned away
Into heaven's ethereal and endless day! W. G. C.

A distinguished Winnebago sachem, who died in prison at Prairie Du Chien.

Lonely and low in his dungeon cell
The captive chief was lying,
While the mourner-wind, like a spirit's voice,
Mid the grated bars was sighing.
The full bright beams of the midnight moon
From his wampum belt were gleaming,
But keener the glance of the warrior's eye,
In its fitful wildness gleaming.
No kindly friend at that fearful hour,
By his dying couch was kneeling,
To whisper of that far sunny clime,
Whither his spirit was silently stealing
Pale was the hue of his faded cheek,
As it leaned on its damp cold pillow;
And deep the heave of his troubled breast,
As the lift of the ocean billow:
For he thought of the days when his restless foot
Through the pathless forest bounded,
And the festive throng by the hunting-fire,
Where the chase-song joyously sounded.
And he thought of his distant hut the while,
By the bending hemlock shaded;
And the frowning ghosts of his awful sires,
By his own sad doom degraded.
But ah! the thought of his Indian boy
In his wind-rocked cradle sleeping,
And the wail forlorn of his bosom one,
At his fated absence weeping!
He heard, too, the voice of the shadowy woods
O'er the night-bird's music swelling,
And the jocund note of the laughing brook
As it danced by his lonely dwelling.
He heard those sounds—to his bosom dear
As the dreams of friendship parted,

While a gleam of joy o'er his withered cheek,
Like a flash of sunlight darted.

It fled—for the chill of the white man's chain
O'er its lightning trace came stealing,
And his phrenzied spirit in darkness passed
In the rush of that conquering feeling.

He had stood in the deadly ambuscade,
While his warriors were falling around him;
He had stood unmoved at the torturing stake,
Where the foe in his wrath had bound him;
He had mocked at pain in every form—
Had joyed in the post of danger;
But his spirit was crushed by the dungeon's gloom,
And the chain of the ruthless stranger.

LOVE'S QUARREL.

Upon her lid one tear-drop trembled,
One moment to its fringes clung,
While on her lip, in scorn dissembled,
The indignant answer proudly hung:

"Vain is thy boasting threat to leave me,
"And vain thy taunting words," she said;
"Think'st thou thine absence now can grieve me?
"Love lives not when esteem is dead!"

"Go! far as winds and waves may bear thee!
"To torrid suns, or polar snows,
"Tis easy from a heart to tear thee,
"Which now, at length, thy falsehood knows.

"Go! and when other scenes surround thee,
"Thy sighs to other bosoms borne,
"Forget the idle chain that bound thee,
"As I forget the vows I scorn.

"Why thus thy vaunted flight delaying?
"Thy threat has broke the charm of years?
"No softer wish my heart betraying,
"Will let thee triumph in my tears."

"I go," the lover cries, "in sorrow;
"Thy mandate, lady, is obeyed;
"Far o'er the bounding waves, to-morrow,
"I'll mourn the idle words I said.

"And when in exile, sad and lonely,
"My heart, as ever, turns to thee,
"Its first dear idol, last, and only,
"Thine may, perchance, relent for me.

"Yet, ere I go, if unforgiven,
"Beam from those eyes one gentler ray,
"That, like the guiding star of heaven,
"May cheer me on my desert way.

"Thy tears, no idle triumph lending,
"Might well besem this parting hour,

"And deep repentance for offending,
"Might claim for me their pitying power.

"Thy face averted bids me sever,
"Bereft of hope to exile driven,
"Farewell!" The lady turns, "Ah, never!
"Repented sin may be forgiven.

"Yet proud of speech, bethink thee, ever
"The love which time could never shake,
"Nor peril daunt, nor fortune sever,
"One chilling breath at once may break.

"The loftiest soul is aye sincerest,
"Yet love by no rude chain is led;
"A silken band best suits him, dearest,
"For love and pride are often wed."

ISIDORA

COME TO ME.

Oh come to me, beloved one,
When vexing cares annoy—
And let me also share the sun
That lights thine hours of joy.

The simple joys, the trifles gay,
That have a charm for thee,
And soothe awhile life's weary way.
Are they not dear to me?

The shade of care must often rest
Upon my thoughtful brow,
And happiness, a stranger guest,
But seldom courts me now.

But when I see a joyous beam
Reflected in thine eye,
My anxious thoughts less weary seem,
And dark forebodings fly.

Thy gladsome thoughts and spirit bright,
Which grief as yet hath spared,
Shed round the only ray of light,
Which I with thee have shared.

Then come to me, beloved one,
In life's bewildering maze,
Thou art my only spot of sun,
The blue sky of my days.

FRENCH CHURCH DU ST. ESPRIT.

THIS antiquated building, which is the oldest religious edifice now in the city, was erected in 1704, by the Huguenots, or French protestants, who fled from their country after the revocation of the edict of Nantz. But as some of our readers may never have heard of that famous edict, and must consequently be ignorant of the effects of its revocation—a few words on that subject may not be deemed inappropriate.

The doctrines of the reformation had made much progress in France as early as the year 1545, during the reign of Francis I. Calvin was a native of Noyon, in Picardy, was protected by Margaret of Navarre, sister of Francis, and his "Christian Institutes" were dedicated to that king. But those who embraced the doctrines soon became the objects of persecution. Francis himself, at one period, was desirous of uniting himself with the protestant princes of Germany, against the emperor Charles; but fearful of awakening the indignation of the Roman pontiff, and the prejudices of his people, by his negotiations with avowed heretics, he seized the first opportunity to prove the soundness of his faith, by ordering six of his subjects who had embraced the protestant religion to be publicly burnt! The king himself was present at the execution; and declared with his usual and characteristic vehemence, that if one of his hands were infected with heresy, he would cut it off with the other; and would not spare even his own children, if found guilty of that crime. The spirit of the new religion, however, was increased and invigorated by every act of persecution; and the numbers who professed it were greatly augmented by the massacre of Cabrières and Merindol, and by the executions which were imprudently multiplied by Henry II. Thus at the accession of Francis II. in 1559, Calvinism had gained a firm and wide footing, and could count among its professors several men of great talents and influence. Persecutions, however, still continued until goaded on to resistance, the protestants only waited for a fit opportunity and season to protect themselves by force of arms. They accordingly united with a party attached to the prince of Condé, in the unsuccessful conspiracy of Amboise, which preceded the civil wars in France, and continued with various success until 1755, when Henry III. found himself under the necessity of concluding a treaty with the protestants, by which they obtained the public exercise of their religion, except within two leagues of the court. Party chambers, composed of an equal number of protestants and Catholics, were established in all the parliaments of the kingdom; all attainders were reversed, and eight cautionary towns were put into their possession.

This treaty, as might have been expected, was highly displeasing to the Catholics, and the consequence was that hostilities again broke out in 1581, and France was a scene of strife and confusion until 1589, when Henry was assassinated by a Dominican friar, named James Clement.

Henry IV. commonly called the great, a prince of the house of Bourbon, ascended the throne in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and eight years afterwards caused the famous edict of Nantz to be passed in favour of the protestants. This edict confirmed to them all the rights and privileges which had been granted to them by former princes, and it added a free admission to all employments of trust, profit, and honour; an establishment of chambers of justice, in which the members of the two religions were equal; and gave liberty to educate their children, without restraint, in any of their universities. This decree was passed in 1598, and continued in force eighty-seven years.

In 1684, under the reign of Louis XIV. the protestants were again exposed to a series of persecutions, at once unjust and impolitic, but which did not reach their climax until the revocation of the edict of Nantz, by which liberty of conscience was abolished; all the protestant churches were destroyed; and an order was issued even to take their children from them, and put them into the hands of their Catholic relations. The ministers were banished; and the others were prohibited from leaving that kingdom, in which the law inflicted on them such unjust and cruel persecution. All the terrors of military execution were employed to make them profess the Catholic religion; and such as had relapsed were exposed to the most dreadful punishments. A twentieth part of their whole number were put to death in a short time; and a price was set on the heads of the rest, who were hunted like wild beasts. Above five hundred thousand of the most industrious inhabitants of France were driven into exile by the revocation of the edict of Nantz; and thus the staple manufactures of that country not only declined at home, but were transferred to other nations by these exiles. Many of them fled to America; and those who arrived at New-York, purchased a tract of ground in the county of Westchester, and settled on a spot they called New-Rochelle.

About thirty or forty years previous to the arrival of these persecuted emigrants, the whole of that beautiful and romantic region, now known by the name of Westchester county, had been purchased of the Indians, by an individual named Thomas Pell. This bargain, which was made in the year 1654, gave great dissatisfaction to the Dutch settlers, but was finally confirmed to the "heirs and assigns of the aforesaid Thomas Pell," from whom the exiled Huguenots obtained their grant.

From authentic records, which we have examined, it appears that from their first settlement at New-Rochelle, they regularly attended public worship in the city of New-York! They had taken their land on terms which required the utmost exertions of all the men, women, and children among them, to clear and prepare for tillage, &c. They were, therefore, in the habit of toiling hard all the week, until Saturday night; and then resting themselves, by trudging twenty miles on foot to the city, to attend religious worship the next day! On Sunday evening, they retraced their steps, and were ready to recommence their labours on Monday morning! Amidst all these hardships and privations, they wrote to their friends in France, expressing, in the warmest terms, their gratitude to heaven for the great privileges they enjoyed in this free and happy country! Can our modern skeptics and self-styled philosophers furnish any adequate substitute for such an enviable feeling?

Such were the men who erected the venerable edifice, of which the above engraving is a correct representation. It is built in the plainest style, being constructed of stone, and plastered on the outside, with a very steep roof, and a monastic-looking tower, from which the plaster has fallen in several places. The building, which is seventy feet in length and fifty in breadth, has a southwest aspect, fronting on Pine-street, just below Nassau-street, and the tower is in the rear towards Cedar-street, where a few mouldering tomb-stones are still to be seen in the cemetery, behind the law buildings.

At the time this church was erected, in 1704, the celebrated wall from which our "street of banks and brokers" derived its name, was partially demolished, and the stones of which its bastions were constructed, had been applied to the erection of the new City-hall, just finished, at the corner of Nassau-street, fronting Broad-street, in which ferry-boats came up as far as Garden-street. In the same year, for the first time, "Wall-street was paved, on the south side, from Smith-street [now William] to the English church," in Broadway; the latter not being paved until three years afterwards. The number of inhabitants was now rising six thousand, to whom the luxuries of tea and coffee were entirely unknown. Dull times for scandal parties! At this period the docks and slips rented for twenty-five pounds per annum; and two hundred acres of land were sold by the corporation for twenty shillings the acre! The inhabitants of Harlem were permitted to erect one mill, and no more, provided they did not "hinder the passage of sloops or boats round Manhattan island!" At this time the city was lighted, "in the dark time of the moon in the winter season," by lanterns hung upon poles, projected from the windows of every seventh house—each of the seven paying an equal proportion of the expense; and the city watch consisted of "four sober men." How many have we now?

The church of St. Esprit is opened every Sunday, where divine service is performed in the French language, according to the episcopal form.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Poetical Works of Sir Walter Scott. In Eleven Volumes. Vol. IX. Part I. Essays on Ballad Poetry, and Introductions. Edinburgh, 1830, Cadell & Co.; London, Simpkin & Marshall.

AN animated literary auto-biography, and by Sir Walter Scott. What a mass of interest lies in those few words! from the country book-club, that hurries its bookseller with orders for the last volume of Memoirs, to the London drawing-room, crowding to gaze on the lion of the night, the same passion of individualizing our previous idea of a great man predominates. Whether it is that curiosity inherent in our nature, or to subtilize a little, that levelling spirit which would fain believe that a display of the same weaknesses, passions, hopes, and fears, makes our idol one with ourselves—we have not time to analyze; but certain it is, that the diorama which brings before us actual scenes of the author's life, is one of our most popular exhibitions. Denon's talents for telling a story are said to have been such, that Napoleon was wont to interrupt an unhappy narrator with, "Ah, Denon, contez nous cela!" This peculiar talent—this natural honey-dropping from the lip—Scott possesses in perfection; and the history of his poetical career, as developed in a series of introductions to his various works, makes this a truly delightful volume. But his own account confirms what was always our opinion—that he only (like Wordsworth) wanted some strong passion to have given his pages the last touch of poetical perfection: he has been the Lucullus of literature—he conquered, and then enjoyed; he has led a life of pleasant study and social intercourse; and if his heroes are scarcely ever terrible in the conflict of passionate feelings, it is because these feelings found no original cause, no answering tone, in his own mind. But in all other qualities, how large is his portion! His descriptions are fairy wands, that call up the scene before you; his narrative is dramatic in its power, and—but who ever took up a volume of his without reading, or read without remembering? Like Prospero, we bury our book, and break our rod of criticism, in his favour: let him speak for himself.

Sir Walter Scott's early life.

"My birth, without giving the least pretension to distinction, was that of a gentleman, and connected me with several respectable families and accomplished persons. My education had been a good one, although I was deprived of its full benefit by indifferent health, just at the period when I ought to have been most sedulous in improving it. The young men with whom I was brought up, and lived most familiarly, were those who, from opportunities, birth, and talents, might be expected to make the greatest advances in the profession to which we were all destined; and I have the pleasure still to preserve my youthful intimacy with no inconsiderable number of them, whom their merit has carried forward to the highest honours of their profession. Neither was I in a situation to be embarrassed by the res angusta domi, which might have otherwise interrupted my progress in a profession in which progress is proverbially slow. I enjoyed a moderate degree of business for my standing, and the friendship of more than one person of consideration efficiently disposed to aid my views in life. The private fortune, also, which I might expect, and finally inherited, from my family, did not, indeed, amount to affluence, but placed me considerably beyond all apprehension of want. I mention these particulars merely because they are true. Many better men than myself have owed their rise from indigence and obscurity to their own talents, which were, doubtless, much more adequate to the task of raising them than any which I possess. Although it would be absurd and ungracious in me to deny that I owe to literature many marks of distinction to which I could not otherwise have aspired, and particularly that of securing the acquaintance, and even the friendship, of many remarkable persons of the age, to whom I might not otherwise have made my way; it would, on the other hand, be ridiculous to affect gratitude to the public favour, either for my position in society, or the means of supporting it with decency—matters which had been otherwise secured under the usual chances of human affairs. Thus much I have thought it necessary to say upon a subject which is, after all, of very little consequence to any one but myself. I proceed to detail the circumstances which engaged me in literary pursuits. During the last ten years of the eighteenth century, the art of poetry was at a remarkably low ebb in Britain. Hayley, to whom fashion had some years before ascribed a higher degree of reputation than posterity has confirmed, had now lost his reputation for talent, though he still lived admired and respected as an amiable and accomplished man. The Bard of Memory slumbered on his laurels, and he of Hope had scarce begun to attract his share of public attention. Cowper, a poet of deep feeling and bright genius, was dead; and even while alive, the hypochondria, which was his mental malady, impeded his popularity. Burns, whose genius our southern neighbours could hardly yet comprehend, had long confined himself to song-writing. Names which are now known and distinguished wherever the English language is spoken, were then only beginning to be mentioned; and, unless among the small number of persons who habitually devote a part of their leisure to literature, those of Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, were but little known. The realms of Parnassus, like many a kingdom at the period, seemed to lie open to the first bold invader, whether he should be a daring usurper, or could shew a legitimate title of sovereignty."

An interesting view of German literature follows, and he proceeds to its influence on himself.

German Literature.

"In Edinburgh, where the remarkable coincidence between the German language and that of the Lowland Scotch encouraged young men to approach this newly discovered spring of literature, a class was formed, of six or seven intimate friends, who proposed to make themselves acquainted with the German language. They were in the habit of living much together, and the time they spent in this new study was felt as a great amusement. One source of this diversion was the laziness of one of their number, the present author, who, averse to the necessary toil of grammar and its rules, was in the practice of fighting his way to the knowledge of the German by his acquaintance with the Scottish and Anglo-Saxon dialects, and, of course, frequently committed blunders, which were not lost on his more accurate and more studious companions. A more general source of amusement was the despair of the teacher, on finding it impossible to extract from his Scottish students the degree of sensibility necessary, as he thought, to enjoy the beauties of the author to whom he considered it proper first to introduce them. We were desirous to penetrate at once into the recesses of the Teutonic literature, and were ambitious of perusing Goethe and Schiller, and others whose fame had been sounded by MacKenzie. Dr. Willich, (a medical gentleman,) who was our teacher, was judiciously disposed to commence our studies with the more simple diction of Gesner, and prescribed to us 'The Death of Abel,' as the production from which our German tasks were to be drawn. The puerile style of this author was ill adapted to attract young persons of our age and disposition. We could no more sympathize with the overstrained sentimentality of Adam and his family, than we could have had a fellow-feeling with the jolly Faun of the same author, who broke his beautiful jug, and then made a song on it, which might have affected all Staffordshire. To sum up the distresses of Dr. Willich, we, with one consent, voted Abel an insufferable bore, and gave the pre-eminence, in point of masculine character, to his brother Cain, or even to Lucifer himself. When these jests, which arose out of the sickly monotony and affected ecstasies of the poet, failed to amuse us, we had for our entertainment the innumerable sounds manufactured by a Frenchman, our fellow-student, who, with the economical purpose of learning two languages at once, was endeavouring to acquire German, of which he knew nothing, by means of English, concerning which he was nearly as ignorant. Heaven only knows the notes which he uttered, in attempting, with unpractised organs, to imitate the gutturals of these two intractable languages. At length, in the midst of much laughing and little study, most of us acquired some knowledge, more or less extensive, of the German language, and selected for ourselves, some in the philosophy of Kant, some in the more animated works of the German dramatists, specimens more to our taste than 'The Death of Abel.'"

His friendship with Lewis is another link in his progress: we cannot omit the following extract.

Sir Walter Scott and the Apothecary's Wife.

"I had, indeed, tried the metrical translations which were occasionally recommended to us at the High school. I got credit for attempting to do what was enjoined, but very little for the metre, in which the task was performed; and I used to feel not a little mortified when my versions were placed in contrast with others of admitted merit. At one period of my schoolboy days I was so far left to my own desires as to become guilty of verses on a thunder-storm, which were much approved of, until a malevolent critic sprung up, in the shape of an apothecary's blue-buskined wife, who affirmed that my sweet poetry was stolen from an old magazine. I never forgave the imputation, and even now I acknowledge some resentment against the poor woman's memory. She indeed accused me unjustly, when she said I had stolen my brooms ready made; but as I had, like most premature poets, copied all the words and ideas of which my verses consisted, she was so far right, that there was not an original word or thought in the whole six lines. I made one or two faint attempts at verse, after I had undergone this sort of daw-plucking at the hands of the apothecary's wife; but some friend or other always advised me to put my verses in the fire, and like Dorax in the play, I submitted, though 'with a swelling heart.' In short, excepting the usual tribute to a mistress's eyebrow, which is the language of passion rather than poetry, I had not for ten years indulged the wish to couple so much as love and dove, when, finding Lewis in possession of so much reputation, and conceiving that, if I fell behind him in poetical powers, I considerably exceeded him in general information, I suddenly took it into my head to attempt the style by which he had raised himself to fame."

Glenfinlas and the Eve of St. John were written about this time.

"Thus I was set up for a poet, like a pedlar who has got two ballads to begin the world upon; and I hastened to make the round of all my acquaintances, shewing my precious wares and requesting criticism; a boon which no author asks in vain. For it may be observed, that, in the fine arts, those who are in no respect able to produce any specimens themselves, hold themselves not the less entitled to decide upon the works of authors; and justly, no doubt, to a certain degree; for the merits of composition produced for the express purpose of pleasing the world at large, can only be judged of by the opinion of individuals; and perhaps, as in the case of Molière's old woman, the less sophisticated the person consulted, so much the better. But I was ignorant at the time I speak of, that though the applause of the many may justly appreciate the general merits of a piece, it is not so safe to submit such a performance to the more minute criticism of the same individuals, when each, in turn, having seated himself in the censor's chair, has placed his mind in a critical attitude, and delivered his opinion sententiously and ex cathedra. General applause was in almost every case freely tendered; but the abatements in the way of proposed alterations and corrections were cruelly puzzling. It was in vain the young author, listening with becoming modesty, and with a natural wish to please, cut and carved, tinkered and coopered, upon his unfortunate ballads—every one in vain that he placed, displaced, replaced, and misplaced;—every one of his advisers was displeased with the concessions made to his co-assessors, and the author was blamed by some one, in almost every case, for having made two holes in attempting to patch up one. At last, after thinking seriously on the subject, I wrote out a fair copy (of Glenfinlas, I think,) and marked all the various corrections which had been proposed. On the whole, I found that I had been required to alter every verse, almost every line; and the only stanzas of the whole ballad which escaped criticism were such as neither could be termed good or bad, speaking of them as poetry, but were of a more common-place character, absolutely necessary for conducting the business of the tale. This unexpected result, after about a fortnight's anxiety, led me to adopt a rule from which I have seldom departed during more than thirty years of literary life. When a friend, whose judgment I respect, has decided, and upon good advice told me, that a manuscript was worth nothing, or at least possessed no redeeming qualities sufficient to atone for its defects, I have generally cast it aside; but I am little in the custom of paying attention to minute criticisms, or of offering such to any friend who may do me the honour to consult me. I am convinced that, in general, in removing even errors of a trivial or venial kind, the character of originality is lost, which, upon the whole, may be that which is most valuable in the production. About the time that I shook hands with criticism, and reduced my ballads back to their original form, stripping them without remorse of those 'lendings' which I had adopted at the suggestion of friends, an opportunity unexpectedly offered of introducing to the world what had hitherto been confined to a circle of friends. Lewis had announced a collection, first intended to bear the title of 'Tales of Terror,' and afterwards 'Tales of Wonder,' which last was finally adopted."

The following is the account how he finally decided on pursuing the career of literature.

Law and Literature.

"It may be readily supposed that the attempts which I had made in literature had been unfavourable to my success at the bar. The goddess Themis is, at Edinburgh, and I suppose every where else, of a peculiarly jealous disposition. She will not readily consent to share her authority, and sternly demands from her votaries not only that real duty be carefully attended to and discharged, but that a certain air of business shall be observed even in the midst of total idleness. It is prudent, if not absolutely necessary, in a young barrister, to appear completely engrossed by his profession; however destitute of employment he may be, he ought to preserve, if possible, the appearance of full occupation. He should at least seem perpetually engaged among his law-papers, dusting them, as it were; and, as Ovid advises the fair,

Sil nullus erit pulvis, tamen exerceat nullo.

Perhaps such extremity of attention is more especially required, considering the great number of counsellors, who are called to the bar, and how very small a proportion of them are finally disposed, or find encouragement, to follow the law as a profession. Hence, the number of deserters is so great, that the least lingering look behind occasions a young novice to be set down as one of the intending fugitives. Certain it is, that the Scottish Themis was at this time peculiarly jealous of any flirtation with the Muses on the part of those who had ranged themselves under her banners. This was probably owing to her consciousness of the superior attractions of her rivals. Of late, however, she has relaxed in some instances in this particular; an eminent example of which has been shown in the case of my friend, Mr. Jeffrey, who, after long conducting one of the most influential literary periodicals of the age, with unquestionable ability, has been, by the general consent of his brethren, recently elected to be their dean of faculty, or president, being the highest acknowledgment of his professional talents which they had it in their power to offer. But this is an incident much beyond the ideas of a period of thirty years' distance, when a barrister who really possessed any turn for lighter literature, was at as much pains to conceal it, as if it had in reality been something to be ashamed of; and I could mention more than one instance in which literature and society have suffered loss, that jurisprudence might be enriched. Such, however, was not my case; for the reader will not wonder that my open interference with matters of light literature diminished my employment in the weightier matters of the law. Nor did the solicitors, upon whose choice the counsel takes rank in his profession, do me less than justice by regarding others among my contemporaries as fitter to discharge the duty due to their clients, than a young man who was taken up with running after ballads, whether Teutonic or national. My profession and I, therefore, came to stand nearly upon the footing on which honest slender consoled himself with having established with Mistress Anne Page; 'There was no great love between us at the beginning, and it pleased heaven to decrease it on farther acquaintance.' I became sensible that the time was come when I must either buckle myself resolutely to the 'toil by day, the lamp by night,' renouncing all the Delights of my imagination, or bid adieu to the profession of the law, and hold another course. I confess my own inclination revolted from the more severe choice, which might have been decry by many the wiser alternative. As my transgressions had been numerous, my repentance must have been signalized by unusual sacrifices. I ought to have mentioned, that, since my fourteenth or fifteenth year, my health, originally delicate, had become exceedingly robust. From infancy I had laboured under the infirmity of a severe lameness, but, as I believe is usually the case with men of spirit who suffer under personal inconveniences of this nature, I had, since the improvement of my health, in defiance of this incapacitating circumstance, distinguished myself by the endurance of toil on foot or horseback, having often walked thirty miles a-day, and rode upwards of a hundred, without stopping. In this manner I made many pleasant journeys through parts of the country then not very accessible, gaining more amusement and instruction than I have been able to acquire since I have travelled in a more commodious manner. I practised most equestrian sports, also, with some success, and with great delight. But these pleasures must have been all resigned, or used with great moderation, had I determined to regain my station at the bar. It was even doubtful whether I could, with perfect character as a juriconsult, retain a situation in a volunteer corps of cavalry, which I then held. The threats of invasion were at this time instant and menacing; the call by Britain on her children was universal, and was answered by many, who, like myself, consulted rather their will than their ability to bear arms. My services, however, were found useful in assisting to maintain the discipline of the corps, being the point on which their constitution rendered them most amenable to military criticism. In other respects the squadron was a fine one, consisting of handsome men, well mounted and armed at their own expense. My attention to the corps took up a good deal of time; and while it occupied many of the happiest hours of my life, it furnished an additional reason for my reluctance again to encounter the severe course of study indispensable to success in the juridical profession. On the other hand, my father, whose feelings might have been hurt by my quitting the bar, had been for two or three years dead; so that I had no control to thwart my own inclination; and my income being equal to all the comforts, and some of the elegancies, of life, I was not pressed to an irksome labour by necessity, that most powerful of motives; consequently, I was the more easily reduced to choose the employment which was most agreeable. This was yet the easier, that in 1800 I had obtained the preferment of sheriff of Selkirkshire, about three hundred pounds a year in value, and which was the more agreeable to me, as in that county I had several friends and relations. But I did not abandon the profession to which I had been educated, without certain prudential resolutions, which, at the risk of some egotism, I will here mention; not without the hope that they may be useful to young persons who may stand in circumstances similar to those in which I then stood. In the first place, upon considering the lives and fortunes of persons who had given themselves up to literature, or to the task of pleasing the public, it seemed to me that the circumstances which chiefly affected their happiness and character were those from which Horace has bestowed upon authors the epithet of the irritable race. It requires no depth of philosophic reflection to perceive, that the petty warfare of Pope with the dunces of his period could not have been carried on without his suffering the most acute torture, such as a man must endure from musquitos, by whose stings he suffers agony, although he can crush them in his grasp by myriads. Nor is it necessary to call to memory the many humiliating instances in which men of the greatest genius have, to avenge some pitiful quarrel, made themselves ridiculous during their lives, to become the still more degraded objects of pity to future times. Upon the whole, as I had no pretension to the genius of the distinguished persons who had fallen into such errors, I concluded there could be no occasion for imitating them in these mistakes, or what I considered as such; and, in adopting literary pursuits as the principal occupation of my future life, I resolved, if possible, to avoid those weaknesses of temper which seemed to have most easily beset my more celebrated predecessors. With this view, it was my first resolution to keep, as far as was in my power, abreast of society; continuing to maintain my place in general company without yielding to the very natural temptation of narrowing myself to what is called literary society. By doing so I imagined I should escape the besetting sin of listening to language which, from one motive or other ascribes a very undue degree of consequence to literary pursuits; as if they were, indeed, the business, rather than the amusement of life. The opposite course can only be compared to the injudicious conduct of one who pampers himself with cordial and luscious draughts, until he is unable to endure wholesome bitters. Like Goliath, therefore, I resolved to stick by the society of my commis, instead of seeking that of a more literary cast; and to maintain my general interest in what was going on around me, reserving the man of letters for the desk and the library. My second resolution was a corollary from the first. I determined that, without shutting my ears to the voice of true criticism, I would pay no regard to that which assumes the form of satire. I therefore resolved to arm myself with the triple brass of Horace, against all the roving warfare of satire, parody, and sarcasm; to laugh if the jest was a good one; or, if otherwise, to let it hum and buzz itself to sleep. It is to the observance of these rules (according to my best belief,) that, after a life of thirty years engaged in literary labours of various kinds, I attribute my never having been entangled in any literary quarrel or controversy; and, which is a more pleasing result, that I have been distinguished by the personal friendship of my most approved contemporaries of all parties. I adopted, at the same time, another resolution, on which it may doubtless be remarked, that it was well for me that I had it in my power to do so, and that, therefore, it is a line of conduct which can be less generally applicable in other cases. Yet I fail not to record this part of my plan, convinced that, though it may not be in every one's power to adopt exactly the same resolution, he may, nevertheless, by his own exertions, in some shape or other, attain the object on which it was founded; namely, to secure the means of subsistence, without relying exclusively on literary talents. In this respect, I determined that literature should be my staff, but not my crutch; and that the profits of my labour, however convenient otherwise, should not become necessary to my ordinary expenses. With this purpose I resolved, if the interest of my friends could so far favour me, to retire upon any of the respectable offices of the law, in which persons of that profession are glad to take refuge when they feel themselves, or are judged by others, incompetent to aspire to its higher offices and honours. Upon such an office an author might hope to retreat, without any perceptible alteration of circumstances, whenever the time should arrive that the public grew weary of his endeavours to please, or he himself should tire of the occupation of authorship. At this period of my life I possessed so many friends capable of assisting me in this object of ambition, that I could hardly over-rate my own prospects of obtaining the moderate preferment to which I limited my wishes; and, in fact, I obtained, in no long period, the reversion of a situation which completely met them."

"I remember that about the same time a friend started in to 'heeze up my hope,' like the minstrel in the old song. He was bred a farmer, but a man of powerful understanding, natural good taste, and warm poetical feeling, perfectly competent to supply the wants of an imperfect or irregular education. He was a passionate admirer of field sports, which we often pursued together. As this friend happened to dine with me at Ashiesteel one day, I took the opportunity of reading to him the first canto of the Lady of the Lake, in order to ascertain the effect the poem was likely to produce upon a person who was not too favourable a representative of readers at large. It is, of course, to be supposed, that I determined rather to guide my opinion by what my friend might appear to feel, than by what he might think fit to say. His reception of my recitation, or prelection, was rather singular. He placed his hand across his brow, and listened with great attention through the whole account of the stag hunt, till the dogs threw themselves into the lake to follow their master, who embarks with Ellen Douglas. He then started up with a sudden exclamation, struck his hand on the table, and declared, in a voice of censure calculated for the occasion, that the dogs must have been totally ruined by being permitted to take the water after such a severe chase. I own I was much encouraged by the species of reverie which had possessed so zealous a follower of the sports of the ancient Nimrod, who had been completely surprised out of all doubts of the reality of the tale."

We shall conclude by collecting in a paragraph the various receipts of his poems:

The various receipts of his Poems.

"The work brought out on the usual terms of division of profits between the author and publishers, was not long after purchased by them for five hundred pounds, to which Messrs. Longman & Co. afterwards added one hundred pounds in their own unsolicited kindness, in consequence of the uncommon success of the work. It was handsomely given to supply the loss of a fine horse, which broke down suddenly while the author was riding with one of the worthy publishers. The publishers of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, emboldened by the success of that poem, willingly offered a thousand pounds for Marmion. The transaction being no secret, afforded Lord Byron, who was then at general war with all who blacked paper, an opportunity to include me in his satire, entitled English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. I never could conceive how an arrangement between an author and his publishers, if satisfactory to the persons concerned, could afford matter of censure to any third party. I had taken no unusual or ungenerous means of enhancing the value of my merchandise—I had never juggled a moment about the bargain, but accepted at once what I considered the handsome offer of my publishers. These gentlemen, at least, were not of opinion that they had been taken advantage of in the transaction, the sale of the poem was so far beyond their expectation, as to induce them to supply the author's cellars with what is always an acceptable present to a young Scottish housekeeper, namely, a hoghead of excellent claret."

We find, in spite of our columns, we must extract the account of his own change from poetry to prose—Rokeby.

Sir Walter Scott's change from Poetry to Prose.

"The cause of my failure had, however, a deeper root. The manner, or style, which, by its novelty, attracted the public in an unusual degree, had now, after having been three times before them, exhausted the patience of the reader, and began in the fourth to lose its charms. The reviewers may be said to have apostrophised the authc. in the language of Parnell's Edwin:

'And here reverse the charm,' he cries,
'And let it fairly now suffice;
The gambol has been shown.'

The licentious combination of rhymes, in a manner not perhaps very congenial to our language, had not been confined to the author. Indeed, in most similar cases, the inventors of such novelties have their reputation destroyed by their own imitators, as Actæon fell under his own dogs. The present author, like Bobadil, had taught his trick of fence to a hundred gentlemen (and ladies) who could fence very nearly or quite as well as himself. For this there was no remedy; the harmony became tiresome and ordinary, and both the original inventor and his invention must have fallen into contempt, if he had not found out another road to public favour. What has been said of the metre only must be considered to apply equally to the structure of the poem and the style. The very best passages of any popular style are not, perhaps, susceptible of imitation, but they may be approached by men of talent; and those who are less able to copy them, at least lay hold of their peculiar features, so as to produce a burlesque instead of a serious copy. In either way, the effect of it is rendered cheap and common; and, in the latter case, ridiculous to boot. The evil consequences to an author's reputation are at least as fatal as those which befall a composer, when his melody falls into the hands of the street ballad-singer. Of the unfavourable species of imitation, the author's style gave room to a very large number, owing to an appearance of facility to which some of those who used the measure unquestionably leaned too far. The effect of the more favourable imitations, composed by persons of talent, was almost equally unfortunate to the original minstrel, by showing that they could overshoot him with his own bow. In short, the popularity which once attended the school, as it was called, was now fast decaying. Besides all this, to have kept his ground at the crisis when Rocky appeared, its author ought to have put forth his utmost strength, and to have possessed at least all his original advantages, for a mighty and unexpected rival was advancing on the stage—a rival not in poetical powers only, but in that of attracting popularity, in which the present writer had preceded better men than himself. The reader will easily see that Byron is here meant, who, after a little violation of no great promise, now appeared as a serious candidate, in the first canto of Childe Harold. He was astonished at the power evinced by that work, which neither the Hours of Idleness, nor the English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, had prepared me to expect from his author. There was a depth in his thought, an eager abundance in his diction, which argued full confidence in the inexhaustible resources of which he felt himself possessed; and there was some appearance of that labour of the file, which indicates that the author is conscious of the necessity of doing every justice to his work that he may pass warrant. Lord Byron was also a traveller, a man whose ideas were fired by having seen in distant scenes of difficulty and danger, the places whose very names are recorded in our bosoms as the shrines of ancient poetry. For his own misfortune, perhaps, but certainly to the high increase of his poetical character, nature had mixed in Lord Byron's system those passions which agitate the human heart with most violence, and which may be said to have hurried his bright career to an early close. There would have been little wisdom in measuring my force with so formidable an antagonist; and I was as likely to tire of playing the second fiddle in the concert, as my audience to those subjects of excitation by which youth is agitated. I had around me the most pleasant but least exciting of all society, that of kind friends and an affectionate family. My circle of employments was a narrow one; it occupied me constantly, and it became daily more difficult for me to interest myself in poetical composition:

How happily the days of Thalaba went by.

Yet, though conscious that I must be, in the opinion of good judges, inferior to the place I had for four or five years held in letters, and feeling alike that the latter was one to which I had only a temporary right, I could not brook the idea of relinquishing literary occupation, which had been so long my chief employment. Neither was I disposed to choose the alternative of sinking into a mere editor and commentator, though that was a species of labour which I had practised, and to which I was attached. But I could not endure to think that I might not, whether known or concealed, do something of more importance. My inmost thoughts were those of the Trojan captain in the galley race:—

Non iam prima peto Mæstheus, neque vincere cæto:
Quædam O.—Sed superent, quibus hoc, Neptune, dedisti;
Extremæ pudeat rediisse; hoc vincite, elices,
Et prohibete nefas.

Perhaps the most curious and marked traits in these memoirs of Sir Walter Scott are the total want of enthusiasm in his character, and the strong sense, the clear, worldly spirit of calculation displayed; he was the very man to get on in life. Our copious extracts will be their own excuse; and we can only say, amid our author's many delightful works, this is one of his most delightful. Who is there but will be happy in this admission behind the inner veil of his private life?

The Barony. By Miss Anna Maria Porter. Three volumes, 12mo. London, 1830. Longman.

We never think of criticising, in the common acceptance of the term, any work of the Misses Porter: they come with so many pleasant memories of long summer mornings past under some tent-like tree; of long winter evenings, when our grand annoyance was, that the lamp would need trimming just in the midst of some interesting part; of old romantic fancies, and gentler, but not less touching excitement; that even before we open the book, our good will is conciliated, and our favour ready. The volumes before us, however, might well stand on their own merits, and we are glad to meet Miss Porter on her old ground of historic romance; the time is that of James II., and the principal characters, as usual, stand out the very beau ideals of fictitious perfection; while the attention is attracted and sustained by a most interesting narrative. In the Barony the heroines are particularly well contrasted; and the descriptions are picturesque, even to poetry; a very sweet picture might be painted from the following:

"Never had a day in May been more beautiful than the one now devoted to pastoral pleasure. The breath of actual summer was in the still, glowing air; and its glittering heralds—numerable butterflies—were on the wing, among the flowers of the verandah, and the bouquets of oleander and Spanish jasmine which ornamented the marble walk under that verdant roof. A little removed from that, and arranged as if growing there in native beds, were rich groups of exquisite exotics, loading the air with sweetness, even to lusciousness, and dazzling the sight by the brilliancy and variety of their colours. Still further on, where the moss-green turf sparkled in the sun, as if inlaid with emeralds, stood a single pink thorn, a scarlet chestnut, or a Siberian crab-tree, covered with their carnation blossoms. Under these little tents were pitched, or silken awnings stretched, to protect groups of the maskers; or to cover tables, laid out with refreshments, suited in character to the supposed frequenters of tent, canopy, or hut. Seeing a party of hired minstrels advancing towards one of these, Miss Hungerford turned into a close walk, quite embowered with lilac, hastening to gain one of the paths where the dressed walks ended. Winding after winding of this fragrant labyrinth at length brought her into one; there she slackened her pace awhile to draw breath; then resumed her progress, better pleased the further she got from the sounds of the house. Now and then, however, the nimble bound of a squirrel above her head, rustling the boughs, or the glance of his diamond bright eyes as he darted across her path, stayed her hasty passage, as if to let herself be tempted into delicious sleep by the lulling hum of insects under these deep shades, and the silvery chirping of grasshoppers through the high grass. In one part the trees receded, and opened out a view of a broad and sequestered glade, which, judiciously left to its own silence and beauty, struck Evelyn with that sweet surprise with which we see a lovely landscape for the first time. This green solitude terminated in a beautiful sheet of most transparent water, in which willows, weeping birch, larches, and pendent wild flowers, glassed themselves; and crowding over its extreme point, left it doubtful whether the water were a lakelet or a stream. Miss Hungerford lingered to note the graceful fringes of its miniature banks and promontories, whence her eye ascended to the nobler groves rising behind. There the silver-shafted beech and oak mixed with the dark-channelled stems of alder and the porphyry-like trunks of many an ancient yew, spared less for its age than for its effect. The sad olive of this venerable tree contrasted admirably with the sunny green of livelier foliage. If the lights in this spring-shade were too spangly, the shadows without sufficient breadth, and the tone of colour not of depth enough to suit a mortal's pencil, the gazer felt that one great hand can give harmonious results to every discord; and she looked long at the picture, therefore, without imagining it in summer or autumnal fulness. Meanwhile, the cool air from the water seemed blowing back from her seated sense the richer breath of what was called the myrtle garden and the orange-erie—a breath which fancy indeed only retained; and she stood now, thinking how much fresher, air purer, and exhilarating, was the clear untinged air of heaven than when cumbered unceasingly by accumulations of scents meant only for our passing regale. A solitary swan, white as the dazzling clouds above her head, was alternately plunging under, and as it rising from the clear water in the distance. A nymph bathing, in a landscape by Claude Lorraine, naturally followed, in idea, a moment's admiration of this single little object; and as Evelyn stood musing, she felt that Roshia was beautiful, and might be made a home of happiness."

In conclusion we cannot but commend the beautiful and healthy spirit of that best of morality, the morality grounded on religious feeling, which thoroughly pervades these graceful pages: our only excuse for not illustrating which at much greater length, is the difficulty, amounting to an impossibility, of detaching any accommodable portion from the continuous narrative, to afford an idea of its propriety and attractions. It is sufficient to say, that the work does credit even to the high name it bears.

William and Uncle Ben.—Alicia and her Aunt.—The Blind Farmer and his children.

These are the titles of three additional contributions to the benefit of the rising generation from the effective pen of that amiable and successful author, Mrs. Hofand. The mention of her name is an indisputable passport to success.

THE TOILET.

LONDON FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

BALL DRESS.—A dress of rose-coloured gauze over a gros de Naples slip to correspond. Corsette straps.—Sleeves of the beret form, but shorter than usual. The trimming of the skirt consists of two gauze flounces, which are placed one immediately above the other. They are cut at the edge in lozenges; one end is brought round in the drapery style, above the left knee. A wreath of white roses, with their foliage, is attached to the bottom of the waist on the right side, under the coiffure, and it descends in a bias direction to the flounce, to which it forms a heading. A bouquet, composed of a single white rose, with buds and foliage, is placed on the left side of the bosom. The hair is much parted on the forehead, and dressed in full curls. The hind hair is arranged in bows, which are full, but not high. A bandeau of pearls is placed rather far back on the head, and fastened by a clasp of gold and emeralds. Two long, flat, white ostrich feathers are placed immediately under the clasp in different directions, and three others, arranged en bouquet behind, fall gracefully over the bows of hair. Pearl necklace and ear-rings, the latter composed of several rows, with an emerald clasp. Rose-coloured gros de Naples slippers, en sandales.

EVENING DRESS.—A dress of white watered gros de Naples; the corsette, cut extremely low, is ornamented with an embroidery in white flounce silk, en garbe, and trimmed round the bust, a l'enfant, with blonde de Cambray, set on very full. Beret sleeves, finished with a trimming of the same lace. A very rich and deep flounce, also of blonde de Cambray, goes round the border of the skirt, and is surmounted by a wreath of honeysuckle, embroidered in white silk, and very highly raised. The hair is parted so as to display the whole of the forehead, and dressed in light loose ringlets at the sides of the face. It is twisted up behind in a large nœud at the back of the head; a profusion of ringlets issuing from the nœud, fall as low as the neck. A double bandeau of forget-me-nots, composed of coloured gems, is tastefully arranged among the colours in front and round the back of the head. There is much originality, as well as simple elegance, in the coiffure. Necklace and ear-rings, pearls and sapphires. Carved ivory fan.

DINNER DRESS.—A dress of gros d'été; the colour gros lavande; the corsette cut low behind, but rather high in front of the bust, and partially displaying a white satin corsette worn under it; that of the dress is arranged in folds, which form the shape in a singularly graceful manner. Long sleeves; the extreme fulness of the upper part disposed en beret by a nœud of mingled green and rose coloured ribbon; two nœuds, corresponding with the first, fasten the lower part of the sleeve; one at the wrist, the other about half way to the elbow. The openings of the sleeve show the white satin sleeve of the under corsette. White crape hat, ornamented on the inside of the brim with a coque of white gauze ribbon, bordered with white lace. The trimming of the crown consists of an intermixture of white and black draperies, and white roses. Necklace and

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

IN spite of the warm weather, the theatre has been tolerably well attended. Miss Kelly, one of the latest stars of the season, has played her usual round of characters. On Tuesday we were attracted to the house by the announcement of Mrs. S. Wheatley's appearance after an absence of ten years; and, as we never had the fortune to behold the lady in her early days, we were induced to witness throughout, the performance of play and farce—no small undertaking during this "hot season." The elder Coleman's comedy of the "Jealous Wife," and the musical farce, called the "Prize," were the pieces selected; but as they are both well known to most readers, our business at present is only with the débütante. Mrs. S. Wheatley is that kind of person, and of that time of life, which are often described by the union of the three words "fat, fair, and forty"—in this case we may perhaps omit the adjective in the middle. She appears perfectly to understand the business of the stage, and evidently to have acquired great self-possession. Her portraiture of the tormenting and mischievous passion of jealousy was generally very forcible; in truth, we have seldom seen that unhappy malady better represented, and Mrs. S. Wheatley frequently called to our recollection Mrs. Davison, of Drury-lane theatre, whose jealous wife is the best in our remembrance. Having thus given our meed of praise, as far as we conscientiously can, it remains to add, that Mrs. S. W. failed in blending the high-bred gentlewoman with the impassioned female, in which, we humbly opine, consists the difficulty of the character, and in the last scene, where the opposition of her roused husband causes her to pretend an hysterical fit, she screamed, kicked, and stamped in a most unseemly manner, although much to the pleasure of that portion of the audience which generally awards to noise the applause it denies to sense. Now we cannot dismiss our observations on this part of the performance without remarking, that a frequent recurrence of such a vulgar and ostentatious fit as Mrs. S. W. indulges in, instead of working upon the feelings of a high-minded but somewhat hen-pecked husband, must inevitably disgust him; and we trust that on a second representation of the comedy, she will take into consideration that Coleman's Mr. Oakley was under the dominion of a misguided gentlewoman, and not of a turbulent fish-wife. In the second piece Mrs. S. W. acted the part of Caroline, and with that ease and gaiety which would have pleased twenty years ago; but, alas! that enemy to all vanities, particularly that of the person, old Time, has laid his hand too markedly on Mrs. S. W. to allow her to attempt, with prudence, to personate girls scarcely out of their teens. The song she acted very well, without the necessary quantum of voice to make it effective. On the whole, by a judicious selection of characters, we think Mrs. S. W. will be an acquisition to the theatre.

VARIETIES.

In order to admit a variety of highly interesting articles, put in type last week—such as the admirable auto-biography of Walter Scott, the Barony, a Chapter on Gloves, &c.—we are again compelled to defer the publication of several original communications intended for this number.

A celebrated French improvisatore, M. Eugene de Prodel, is now exhibiting his wonderful talents at Brussels, and has just produced his two hundred and ninth extemporaneous tragedy.

An advertising confectioner announces that he has for sale, "A great variety of superior cakes, suitable for the following stages of life, birth-day, christening, school, wedding, and funeral." The good man's rhetoric surely loses its end, when he terms the funeral a stage of life.

Mad. de Genlis is involved in a dispute with her bookseller, arising out of an imputation by the latter, that instead of composing a new and original work under the title of a Manual for Youth, she had palmed on him a compilation of hacknied matter.

The Geographical Society of Paris has offered its gold medal, value one thousand francs, to the author of the best memoir upon the origin of the race of Asiatic negroes.

A Paris paper contains some interesting details relative to the Polytechnic School of Copenhagen. This account of the establishment states, that it is on the most extensive scale and in a flourishing condition. It is under the superintendence of the celebrated CErsted, and five professors. The students are obliged to have a thorough knowledge of German and French, and are

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM THE CITY.

New-York, July 10, 1830.

DEAR C.—I presume sufficient time has elapsed since your departure from New-York to render "private advices" agreeable; yet I have nothing in the world to say which would be interesting to you except the old hum-drum assurances that "I am very well and hope you are the same," for which valuable piece of information and expression of love, people have been content to pay postage for a very long time. We have had here for a few weeks past a succession of the most pleasant days and nights you ever saw—just sufficiently varied with showers to keep the ground moist, the air fresh and clear, and the grass green. And as for the moon, I vow I believe she has stopped going round the earth, for as far as I can recollect she has been full, clear, and round for three weeks back. The hackney-coachmen are starving, and shoemakers are in a very flourishing condition. Our friend lawyer M. has had a ducking since you left us. He and I sailed out into the bay—he acted as the captain, I as the crew. As long as the wind did not blow much, and while the tide was in our favour, captain M.'s nautical abilities showed to very great advantage. He put "his hand upon the ocean's mane," as poor Byron said, with the greatest confidence and familiarity, but the bay of New-York, like the great sea of human life, is crossed with many changing and obstinate currents, which play the deuce with your young city sailors. Our captain got among some of these, where he was compelled to take short notice of trial, and where errors could not be amended on payment of costs; and though, with the best intention in the world, he put the bow of the boat straight for Staten-Island, he made a point of Long-Island, near the navy-yard, about a mile above that from which he had started. Fortunately being deeply skilled in navigation, he resolved to "tack," which he accomplished in a very scientific manner. I observed, however, by-the-by, that instead of making any headway we had drifted another half mile from the point which we were anxious to reach. Theory and practice, you see, are very different things. Finding all his science thrown away upon these foolish tides, the captain resolved to take down the mast and resort to oars; with this intention he sprang from his seat, the current all the time drifting us up, at the rate of four knots, but in his eagerness to precipitate the operation, he injudiciously trod upon the side of the boat, which nearly overturned. This produced two consequences worthy of notice. Firstly—the oar splashed into the river on one side. Secondly—the captain plumped in on the other, with an expression upon his face as he was falling which induced me to believe he had adopted that course with great reluctance. He had not been long, however, under the water, when, with much ingenuity and presence of mind he made for the surface, a choice which I will venture to assert the most mature deliberation could not fail to applaud. Having reached a situation where he enjoyed the additional convenience of air, he exhibited a decided resolution to resume his place in the boat—a very sensible idea, which he proceeded forthwith to carry into effect, leaving, however, divers bail-pieces, subpoenas, and the like, floating calmly on the waves, and a water-proof hat slowly descending (happily without a head in it) to the graceful sea-weeds and beautiful coral groves which, as I have neither the opportunity nor the intention of investigating the subject, may or may not decorate the bottom of the stream.

He came into the boat dripping like a Newfoundland dog, but rather more out of spirits than one of that latter class of "our fellow mortals" would appear after a similar circumstance. Indeed, on the whole, the captain made for land with a degree of perseverance not extraordinary considering his condition, and, on disembarking from the treacherous element, although he said nothing, he looked as if he were engaged in his own mind in solemnly renouncing all species of practical navigation for the future, and in resolving to devote himself exclusively to his profession.

Your venerable friend K. has also had a dreadful fall. Not out of a third story window, nor off the top of St. Paul's church-steeple, nor into the river—worse! much worse! Poor gentleman, he has fallen—in love. And with whom, think you? You know he "is written down old with all the characters of age. He hath a moist eye, a dry hand, a yellow cheek, a white beard, and a decreasing leg. His voice is broken, his chin is double, his wit single, and every part about him blasted with antiquity." And yet hath he fallen in love! Now run over in your imagination all the damsels on the wrong side of forty, who would be content to take the old gentleman in consideration of his amiable disposition and his hundred thousand dollars, and then understand that it is with dear little—you know who! whom we admired so much one night at B.'s. Would you not as soon expect to see the old reprobate reaching forth his withered and tremulous hand to catch the evening star, as dreaming of that young, fresh, and happy being? I have seen more of her since you went away—she is perfectly beautiful. She has all the charm of firm and glowing health, in addition to the most graceful features in the world. While serious, you deem "nature's own sweet and cunning hand" could not form a mouth more rich and expressive—when she smiles, it surpasses itself. If she rests her eyes upon you, they absolutely make you tremble. If time, and thought, and gloomy disappointment, and weary and protracted care had not given me a kind of reckless contempt for anything on earth that seems like happiness, I should have sunk into a very Benedict. Ten years ago if I had met such a Hebe, perhaps—but no matter. As it is, she is little more to me than a fair landscape—a rose in the morning just burst from its bud—or a beautiful shell—or a piece of sweet music—or a rainbow. She is too old for a child, and yet she is scarcely woman. She knows nothing of the world—its awful scenes—its dark, deep crimes—its wearing and blasting anguish. When I look into her face, I wonder that any thing in nature could be so beautiful, and then I wonder why I waste my time in contemplating it. Sometimes I wish she would take flight—"east, west—I care not whither," so she may no more disturb my sober schemes of business—but then, when I remember the influences of human life upon all things innocent, fragile, and fair, I would have her near me—I would catch her and keep her in a cage, like a rare summer bird, and protect her from the tempests and pestilence which range abroad.

I should like to have seen old K. when he broke his tender secret—and would it not have been worth while to have watched her, when the crimson came over her face at the idea of being bought like a slave "for cankered heaps of strange-achieved gold," and her deeply shaded eyes looked up flashingly, partly with scorn, partly with mirth? By yea and nay, I would not have been in his place to have saved myself from hanging.

Well, enough of this nonsense; let me hear from you soon. I am tied down to the city, and fairly sick to hear something about "green fields." The town is getting dreadfully dull. The heat is coming, the belles are going. All around me are forming the gayest parties to visit Niagara, the Springs, &c. My widest wanderings are to the Battery, and, on grand occasions, to Brooklyn or Hoboken; and yet these are sometimes very agreeable. Much pleasure can be bought for a shilling, if it be properly laid out. We never know how little will content us till necessity has compelled us to the trial. F.

LETTER FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

N—, July 6, 1830.

MY DEAR SIR—You know my peripatetic propensities. I left you with the intention of making a personal acquaintance with the "stupendous Niagara," and of improving my intimacy with the magnificent shores of the St. Lawrence; "but nature will prevail." In all my peregrinations, I have even visited those places directly contrary to my originally proposed plans in starting, and I did so in this instance.

What has occasioned this sudden change in your plans?—Patience, my good sir—I am writing with the thermometer ranging at 82°, and the effects of potent libations, drained yesterday in honour of our happy independence, still floating in my brain. No man should be hurried under such excitements.

To commence my narrative. I called on our friend R. on my way to Albany. I found him on the wing to some (to me) unknown place in the back settlements of our state. R. spoke in raptures of its location, and roused my curiosity by details of the odd collection of characters, who were there congregated—perfect specimens of originality. I eagerly embraced the offer of a spare seat in his gig—found the roads confoundingly bad, and the heat intolerably oppressive. We passed through N—in our journey—the place took my fancy. I ordered my valise to be left at the head hotel—A sorry place by-the-by—Made the acquaintance of the chief magnate of the village, and at length became domesticated in his house, and am now as much at home as if I had been raised in the family. In this transposition of my person lies the "cream" of my adventures. I have, by the merest accident, fallen in with a set of originals, which only the graphic pen of our own Irving, or the satirical crayon of Paulding could adequately describe. "Mine host" is a fat, burly, thick-headed old gentleman, a happy mixture of bon homie and testiness, proceeding from the effects of a naturally excellent heart, occasionally soured by the virago-like disposition of his "ladyo wife." He is a man of consequence in the neighborhood as you may suppose, when I inform you that he has served one session in the state legislature, and has been once nominated a stump member for congress. He is moreover the richest man in the village, possessing an hereditary property of his own, and the undivided wealth of the father of his aforesaid virago, who was the only child of an old Dutch patron reputed to have been a second Croesus, which wealth now gilds the many "bitter pills" my worthy friend is daily condemned to swallow in his matrimonial character. Yet still the lady has her redeeming points—her ménage is regulated admirably—her table liberally provided—well served and better cooked—she is charitable, although somewhat ostentatious in its display—and above all she is the mother of one of the loveliest and best tempered girls you would wish to meet with on a summer's day—a perfect rose in the wilderness. But more of this anon. Madame H—is an aristocrat in her principles, at once amusing and novel. She claims a direct descent from one of the high mightinesses, who, in olden times, ruled the destinies of New-Amsterdam; and I am daily, nay, hourly, indulged with the collateral consanguinity she holds with the most distinguished Vans who are so thickly planted in our parent state. She has two daughters. Elmira, the eldest, is an epitome of mamma's foibles, without her counteracting virtues. A yearly visit to New-York, returns her to her native village laden with fantasies and kick-shaws, (to borrow the idiom of her plain spoken papa) that entirely disqualifies her for domestic life. She is slightly blucish—tags rhymes à la Byron and L. E. L.—makes all kinds of unnameable and useless knick-knacks—keeps albums and scrap-boxes innumerable—fills herbariums that would puzzle Linnaeus to arrange and classify—and has driven the village Æsculapius nearly mad with her endless dissertations on alkalies and gases. At present theology and politics are her main studies, the consequence of her last visit to the city, where she attended the lectures of a famous female philosopher. A worthy clergyman who visits in the family is daily astounded by her bold and daring doubts on all received articles of faith, and as frequently insulted by her openly expressed contempt of the order of priesthood, the inutility of which she is constantly asserting. She overturns all her father's notions of system and propriety, by diatribes on the equal rights of women, and a general community of property. The worthy gentleman groans inwardly at all this folly; but Miss is her mother's especial favorite, he therefore is compelled to digest his venom by a general lashing of liberal principles, and anathematizing the boasted march of intellect, which he designates as the "quick-step" of vice and folly in our free and happy country, and invariably consoles himself with the certainty that his youngest daughter is uncontaminated by these new fangled doctrines. Indeed he may well be proud of this his favourite child. Rosa (for that is her pastoral appellation) possesses a light-hearted innocence, which effectually prevents her from imbibing the principles of her sister—quick and intelligent—she laughs at Elmira's visionary notions of reform, ridicules her follies, and is provokingly sarcastic on her pretensions to science and bas blueism. The maiden aunt is a fine specimen of the antique, whom I should like to transcribe for your amusement, but my paper fails me. You shall hear from me soon with some further sketches of my present associates, for the stock is not half exhausted in this detail. In the mean time, I am yours, &c.

H. I.

P. R.—I open my letter to inform you that my scheme of passing the summer here, bids fair to be overturned. Miss Elmira has received a copy from the city of the last fashionable "Guide to the Springs," and has set her mind upon astonishing the natives there with her acquirements. The laughing Rosa has just broke on my privacy to announce the fact that all is settled for the projected tour, and insists upon my accompanying them. She is quite in the imperative mood on the subject, and I fear will succeed in making me one of the party. The mail is just starting—If I determine upon joining them, you shall hear from me previous to our departure.

Dr. James Wilson, in a paper upon "Affections of the Heart," read some weeks since before the Royal College of Physicians, indulged in the following sweet strain in speaking of an infant's sleep:—"So motionless is its slumber, that in watching it, we tremble, and become impatient for some stir or sound that may assure us of its life; yet is the fancy of the little sleeper busy, and every artery and every pulse of its frame engaged in the work of growth and secretion, though his breath would not stir the smallest insect that sported on his lip—though his pulse would not lift the flower-leaf of which he dreamed from his bosom:—yet following this emblem of tranquillity into after life, we see him exposed to every climate—contending with every obstacle—agitated by every passion; and under these various circumstances how different is the power and degree of the heart's action, which has not only to beat, but to 'beat time' through every moment of a long and troubled life."

THE TONGUE.

Thou art a mighty leveler in sooth,
And in the twinkling of an eye, canst slay
More marshalled foes with thy two-edged sweep,
Than Sampson in a century could fall.—Æneid.

THERE seems to be an inveterate propensity in all the animate creation to be always making a noise during their waking hours. And verily a good portion of said creation cannot remain quiet even in sleep, but in their dreams keep snoring and babbling at such a rate, that a blind man would find it difficult in their society to tell when it was time to go to bed. Whether this continued infringement on the sober propriety of silence be the result of habit, or some mysterious influence operating on the passions, it is not easy to determine. It is not improbable, however, that such a principle exists. We know that gravitation controls and approximates every particle of matter however remote or dissimilar; and why may not the principle of sympathy have a like influence upon every individual mind throughout the universe? Now, on the supposition that this is so, and that the theory of the ancients with regard to spheremusic is correct, which tells us that every orb has its individual and appropriate melody, which, blending with the music of all the others, forms the harmony of creation, we can plausibly account for the said propensity among the inhabitants of this mundane sphere. For man being an imitative animal, and very susceptible of outward impressions, cannot remain silent while all nature is lifting up its voice around him. On the same principle we account for that singular and beautiful accompaniment which we invariably hear at the theatre during an opera. No sooner does the orchestra commence, than presto! every foot of man, woman, and child, whether invested in prunella or imprisoned in three-fold cow-hide, thick set with villanous nails, is drawn up and thrust down again to the floor with all the regularity and emphasis of a triphammer. This is vulgarly called beating time; and I have no doubt that were it not for a sense of propriety, every tongue would be let loose on the occasion in one grand concert, to the utter annihilation of all harmony, and the complete discomfiture and rout of the musicians.

In fact, with respect to sound, there is a sort of ecceitnes imitandi which infests the tongue of every living thing. It is not confined to man alone, but to the lower animals also, and you may notice it whenever you please in the country. It is really delightful to go out into the fields of a summer morning just as the day is breaking. At first all is still except the low dreamy sound of unfolding vegetation, which is for ever stealing forth even in the deepest retirement of nature. By-and-by as the dawn advances, the voice of some wakeful chanticleer breaks in upon the stillness with a clear and silvery cadence, like the first note of a clarinet heard at evening far away upon the waters, and before its last echo has expired, a response comes ringing back from every "harem" in the valley. Presently the robin commences her plaintive but eccentric song, to be answered by her mate in the neighbouring coppice. Bird after bird breaks in, till every grove is vocal with the mingled matin. Crow calls to crow from the distant pine tops, and eagle screams to eagle from opposite mountain peaks. As the east brightens, the flocks collect on the knolls and greet each other from different pastures, while loo answers loo, and neigh responds to neigh on every side, as herd and steed exchange their morning salutations. And then if perchance, two rival trainbands should commence their evolutions with the "march to Boston," or "yankee doodle," accompanied by the merry whistlings of all the rantipole urchins in the village, the concert will be complete.

Now the prime instrument in this grand diapason is the tongue, that apparently most insignificant of all organizations. Place thy mirror before thee, gentle reader, and examine it attentively. Is it not a puny part and parcel of humanity? Verily there appertains to it nothing of the os hominis rublime. It hath neither the rose-tint of the lip, nor the fair beauty of the cheek, nor the fearless bearing of the nose, nor the soul-speaking expression of the eye, nor the princely grandeur of the lifted brow. It is a little squab, brandy-coloured, unsymmetrical and unpoetical personage, without either dignity or comeliness. The novelist gives you page after page about the silken lashes, the radiant orbs, the glossy locks, and the polished forehead of his heroine, but never does he waste a syllable on the form or feature of her tongue. The fact is, it is too prosaic for the dalliance of his imagination; and besides, he is aware that should he throw about it all the charms which fancy can accumulate, the world would set him down as a visionary, and assert outright that though her face may be as beautiful as a peri's, her tongue can be no better than it should be. Being one of those common-place objects which experience has always found insignificant, it cannot be dignified by tropes, nor exalted by high-sounding epithets. Indeed a simile would be utterly lost upon it, if used to illustrate its shape rather than its abilities; for I know of nothing within the whole circle of existence, to which it can be compared with the least shadow of resemblance. In form it is a physical anomaly, a material nondescript, without "kith or kin;" and whoever should attempt to classify it with any known species of objects, would manifest as much reason in the undertaking as the idiot displayed when he set about climbing a sapling to get a better view of the stars. It seems as if nature were ashamed of her work, or why has she taken such pains to hide it from observation? For what other possible purpose than as a concealed place of banishment for this unsightly member could she have formed the mouth, that horrible excavation in the "human face divine," whose abyss has gulphed more fortunes than the Norwegian maelstrom? There she has secreted it, "aqua like a toad," within a double bastion of teeth, and a two-fold curtain of lips; and there, like the sibil of Delphos, invisible and in darkness, it fashions its intrigues and utters its varied oracles. With all these defenses, however, it is the most consummate coward in the world. Though the prime mover of all contentions, it is never found in the van of the battle. Like a puny yet quarrelsome companion, it is ever bringing its fellow-members into jeopardy by its bickering propensities; but the moment they are attacked, it seeks its own safety, and leaves them to get off as they can. Oh, how aggravated will be its reckoning with the nose, for the multiplied mishaps it has occasioned that august personage! How greatly is it indebted to that magnanimous go-between for the claret and carbuncular protuberances, lost and won in its defence! And how striking is the contrast between the bold manly bearing of the one, and the shameful pusillanimity of the other? If the nose offend by a scornful contemptuous corrugation, there is no skulking, no manoeuvring to elude consequences; all is fair, open, dignified. It stands forth undaunted, schooled to suffer with the fortitude and equanimity of a martyr. Not so the tongue. It seems to consider that the glory of a warrior does not consist in the accumulation of scars, but in the multitude of retreats he has effected; and therefore it always makes the most of an opportunity to escape. In this it reminds me of a school-mate of mine, a peevish, impudent, brawling little stripling, who was continually abusing his fellows, but was never known to fight; for if they attempted to chastise his insolence, he flew to his father's door-step, and whenever any of them approached, he whipt in, turned the bolt, and remained secure till the storm had subsided.

Though deficient in the endowment of personal beauty and genuine courage, the tongue is not wanting in utility, the characteristic virtue of the age. It possesses all the essentials of a steam-engine, with infinitely more power to the square inch, and at the same time requires no expense to keep it always in repair. There is no loss by friction; no wear and tear of material. Year after year it runs on uninjured, (would that I might add uninjuring!) with the most reckless and untiring perseverance. The hand and foot, the eye and ear become wearied by continual action, and require rest to recover their exhausted energies; but the tongue never falters or faints from the longest exertion—the most overtasked performance of its functions. It appears to be free from the physical weaknesses of the other members, and to gain strength and suppleness in proportion to the severity of its use. Without this diminutive and apparently insignificant organ, life would be nothing but a pantomime, civilization would retrograde, and in the lapse of a century, I have little doubt but that Lord Monboddo's theory of a tailed humanity would be literally realized. Annihilate the tongue, and sonnets and serenades, novels and tragedies would be forgotten; the memory of glorious Shakespeare would pass away; and instead of real thorough-going sentimental courtships, mankind, like the birds, would have their "pairing time," their St. Valentine's day.

The activity of the tongue is truly astonishing—the rapid flash of the eye cannot be compared with it. If you do not believe me, just listen to the pronunciation of a fluent Frenchman. The words fall from his lips like the quick drops of a shower; so swift and continuous that it is an impossibility to count them. Yet these are all modulated, in some measure, by the tongue; and in Spanish, where almost every letter is sounded, the celerity of movement which this organ evinces, must surpass that of any other muscular action with which we are acquainted. It is related of one of Decatur's battles, that some of his guns were discharged a dozen times during a minute, yet what is this to the glossal ordnance of an offended woman? It is like the snail-pace of the sloth to the lightning speed of the antelope, when compared with the hurried volleys of such a battery. Why, I should rather have been in the front rank at Lodi, than stand in the point-blank of an angry Xantippe's facial artillery.

As an instrument of taste, the tongue stands unrivalled. In this consists its true glory, and on this alone is the immortality of Dr. Kitchiner based. All the French cooks in the world were not worth a farthing, but for this little divinity that sits in judgment upon their incomparable productions. It is the epicure's fortune for which, in his estimation, there is no possible quid pro quo in the universe; and I have no doubt but that he would rather part with the four cardinal limbs of his body—ay, or the four other senses themselves, than with a hair's breadth of his tongue. And what, O shade of the mighty McGrawler, were thy powers of discrimination, "thy perspicacity of goût," when compared with the abilities of this sublimest of critics! As an instance of its delicate acumen, I have heard the following anecdote: Two German gourmands once met over a flaggon of wine. The eldest just tasted the beverage, smacked his lips, and declared there was iron in the demijohn from whence it had been drawn. The other tasted, and gravely asserted that his friend was mistaken, and that instead of iron being in the vessel, it must be silver. A dispute arose and mine host was called; and it was agreed that the demijohn should be emptied for their mutual satisfaction. This was accordingly done, and at the bottom was found an iron corkscrew with a silver handle!

FRENCH LITERATURE.

Translated from the French for the New-York Mirror.

THE RETURN TO VENICE.

FEDERIGO had retired to a saloon of his palace, whose windows overlooked the sea. The apartment was decorated with a profusion of splendour. The gold which glittered on silk and tapestry, the antique but richly wrought chains, and the magnificent Venetian mirrors, which covered the whole length of the walls, all bore witness to the immense wealth of the heir of the counts of Bundelli.

He strode up and down the apartment with fixed look and folded arms, speaking to himself like one labouring with deep thought. "At Venice! In the palace of the Bundelli, and myself Count Bundelli! when but yesterday I was ever doomed to live far from my country, in obscurity, perhaps in wretchedness! What degradation in the two years I have spent out of Italy! And shall I not avenge myself? Yes, by heaven, and that terribly! Now that I am rich and powerful, I no longer fear that villain Strozzi. My uncle! he my uncle! my father's brother—a Bundelli! I will slay him, that he may disgrace the name no longer. Yes, I will slay this Strozzi." And as he uttered the hated name, he clasped his hands on his breast in rage, and stamped fiercely on the magnificent carpet on which he trod.

At last he paused, and drawing near the window to gaze on the sea, he gave himself up to gentler emotions, "O tranquil bay!" exclaimed he, "O waves of the Adriatic, and thou, bright Venetian sky! O my native land! I see ye once again; once more regain a name, a rank, a country!" He was still leaning over the balcony, indulging these pleasing thoughts, when the door suddenly opened, and a young man entered the apartment.

"Will the Count Bundelli permit the humblest of his servants to offer him his congratulations?"

"Rodrigo!" exclaimed the other, and they embraced cordially.

"My dear Rodrigo!" said the count, clasping his hand, "I was sure I should see you ere long. Be ever welcome! he who was true in misfortune should ever be welcome to prosperity."

"Psha! 'tis nothing. I did but what you or any other would have done in my place. When a friend is in need of me, he finds me ready; when I have need of him, I go to seek him."

"No, Rodrigo, all would not have acted like thee. Witness the day when I was forced to fly from Venice, how many of my false friends shunned me like a contagion. Witness that when I knocked at the doors of Colati and Foscarini, they refused to shelter me. May the threat of St. Mark's lion devour them! I shall hardly peril myself to snatch them from it."

"Be persuaded by me, Federigo; think only of enjoying the present, or remember the past only to rejoice at searching the end of your misfortunes. Now that you are safe returned, success to Venice! and away with England, with her wintry heaven and pestilential mists. Behold that clear sky, and those quiet waves which reflect the parting rays of sunset, and tell me if you ever saw a country that could compare with our own!" And in his enthusiasm he led Federigo to the window, and there made him observe the placid beauty of the lake, the gondolas which now began to emerge from the canal in greater numbers, little dark-sided boats gliding over the waves, filled with music, and with fair ladies reposing under tents adorned with silken curtains and magnificent mirrors, and soft cushions, and luxuries of every sort piled on tables of fragrant wood.

"What a lovely evening!" said Federigo, sharing his friend's enthusiasm; "how beautiful that sky! and then those harmonious voices! Who would not be proud of being a Venetian!" He ordered his gondola, and the two friends were rowed across the bay.

Venice is indeed a charming city. What delicious excursions on the water in the long summer evenings, when the light sea-breeze refreshes the languid frame, and the measured stroke of the oar invites to pleasing melancholy, and groups of ladies, coquettishly veiled, flit past us, and the sweet music and rich voices of the gondoliers repeat in turns the noble strains of Tasso; and when all these unite with the mysterious influence of the light that trembles on the water to steep the contemplative spirit in silent voluptuous delight! But Federigo, plunged in gloomy thought, saw nothing of all this loveliness, or rather, as often happens, the contrast offered by nature's peace and beauty served to increase, rather than to soothe, the feverish irritation of his mind.

Rodrigo tried in vain to dispel his gloom. "I must be avenged on the villain Strozzi," was the answer to every question—"Strozzi—thy uncle?"—"What? and was it not he who caused all my sufferings? he who made me a beggar—he who condemned me to exile, and drew down on my head my father's curse? Fool that I am! What now avail me all the wealth and honours that are once more mine? What now avail my marble palace, and the fair Venetian dames, and the doge's festivals, and my seat in the senate? That curse is still heavy on me—what am I but an accursed Cain as long as Strozzi,—that fiend Strozzi,—that cloven-footed devil that sits on my breast in my dreams,—that hideous spectre whose fleshless form haunts my restless nights, lives—lives happy—lives insulting my misery, and flattering with honied words him whom he stabs in secret?"

The two friends were conversing more tranquilly when an elegant barge floated near them, and a voice from within called Federigo by name. "Strozzi!" cried he, gnashing his teeth; "my uncle," he added more mildly. The gondolas stopped; the uncle and nephew embraced affectionately, and Rodrigo scarcely seemed to wonder at it.

"We will doubtless meet at the doge's festival," said Strozzi, as he left them.

"My dear Rodrigo, I have changed my mind. I will go with him to the doge's."

The doge gave a festival, a royal festival, a masked ball, with festoons as it were of lovely women round the ball-room and brilliant cavaliers at their feet, with graceful dances, and illuminations in gardens embalmed in the perfumes of their flowers, and ravishing harmonies of voices and instruments, and in the midst of the fairy scene a mysterious troop of dominos, who came and went and glided like spectres through the joyous groups. A thousand young nobles, senators, and patricians of Venice, crowded with their congratulations round the young Count Strozzi. Federigo was gay, animated, brilliant; the smile of pleasure played round his lips and lit up his eyes. Oh, could those who saw him then but have counted the uncertain, hurried, anxious throbings of his heart!

The ball lasted late into the night, and just before the first dawn of morning a gondola left the gardens of the ducal palace, and flew swiftly along beneath the guidance of a single boatman. Three masks were at one end of the boat, two standing, while the third seated at their feet with guitar in hand, accompanied himself with the words of a pretty little song which the Venetian girls sing at evening when the day's labours are over, and they dance in a round before their dwellings. The singer was unmasked, and the fading light of the moon shone on the features of Rodrigo. His two companions talked of the ball, of the ladies, of the lovely evening on the water, and one would have supposed to hear them that they were two giddy, careless youths, returning from the doge's festival full of the joyous ideas inspired by the honied accents and winning smiles of the fair. But one of them, at least, was a man of ripe age. He spoke with Federigo in the tone of friendship, and could not, he said, be weary of congratulating him on his fortunate return to Venice, for no one had desired it more than he. 'Twas a happy day, and he would soon give a festival to celebrate the joyful event. "My kind uncle!" cried Federigo, seizing his hand, "My kind uncle!"—while with his other arm he struck so deep that the kind uncle whirled round, and sunk at once to the bottom with the dagger buried in his heart! At the same moment, Federigo's manly voice united with the light tones of Rodrigo, and the gondola glided in the shadows of night over the waves, now ruffled by the fresh morning breeze, as gently as though it wafted onward two young and innocent lovers.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

AN INDIAN TRADITION.

THE following Indian tradition of the first landing of Europeans near New-York, is extracted from Heckwelder's history.

"A long time ago, before men with a white skin had ever been seen, some Indians, fishing at a place where the sea widens, espied something at a distance moving upon the water. They hurried ashore, collected their neighbours, who together returned and viewed intensely this astonishing phenomenon. What it could be baffled all conjecture. Some supposed it a large fish or animal, others that it was a very big house floating on the sea. Perceiving it move towards land, the spectators concluded that it would be proper to send runners in different directions to carry the news to their scattered chiefs, that they might send off for the immediate attendance of their warriors. These arriving in numbers to behold the sight, and perceiving that it was actually moving towards them, (i. e. coming into the river or bay,) they conjectured that it must be a remarkable large house, in which the Manitto (or Great Spirit) was coming to visit them. They were much afraid, and yet under no apprehension that the Great Spirit would injure them. They worshipped him. The chiefs now assembled at York Island, and consulted in what manner they should receive their Manitto: meat was prepared for a sacrifice. The women were directed to prepare the best of victuals. Idols or images were examined and put in order. A grand dance they thought would be pleasing, and in addition to the sacrifice, might appease him if angry. The conjurors were also set to work to determine what this phenomenon portended, and what the result would be. To these, men, women, and children looked up for advice and protection. Utterly at a loss what to do, and distracted alternately by hope and fear, in this confusion a grand dance commenced. Mean time fresh runners arrived, declaring it to be a great house of various colours, and full of living creatures. It now appeared certain that it was their Manitto, probably bringing some new kind of game. Others arriving, declared it positively to be full of people, of different colour and dress from theirs, and that one in particular appeared altogether red.* This then must be the Manitto. They were lost in admiration, could not imagine what the vessel was, whence it came, or what all this portended. They are now hailed from the vessel in a language they could not understand. They answer by a shout or yell in their way. The house (or large canoe, as some render it) stops. A smaller canoe comes on shore with the man of red in it: some stay by his canoe to guard it. The chiefs and wise men form a circle, into which the man of red and two attendants approach. He salutes them with friendly countenance, and they return the salute after their manner. They are amazed at their colour and dress, particularly with him who, glittering in red, wore something (perhaps lace and buttons) they could not comprehend. He must be the great Manitto, they thought, but why should he have a white skin? A large elegant hockhack (gourd, i. e. bottle, decanter, &c.) is brought by one of the supposed Manitto's servants, from which a substance is poured into a small cup or glass, and handed to the Manitto. He drinks, has the glass refilled, and handed to the chief near him. He takes it, smells it, and passes it to the next, who does the same. The glass in this manner is passed round the circle, and is about to be returned to the red-clothed man, when one of them, a great warrior, harangues them on the impropriety of returning the cup unemptied. It was handed to them, he said, by the Manitto, to drink out of as he had. To follow his example would please him—to reject it might provoke his wrath. And if no one else would, he would drink it himself, let what would follow; for it were better for one even to die, than a whole nation to be destroyed. He then took the glass, smelled at it, again addressing them, bidding adieu, and drank

* Hudson clothed in red the savages he took on board near Sandy Hook bay. This shows that he had red clothes on board, when he or his mate landed. Hudson himself might have been thus clothed.

the contents. All eyes were now fixed (on the first Indian in New-York who had tasted the poison which has since effected so signal a revolution in the condition of the native Americans.) He soon began to stagger. The women cried, supposing him in fits. He rolled on the ground. They bemoan his fate. They thought him dying. He fell asleep. They at first thought he had expired, but soon perceived that he still breathed. He awoke, jumped up, and declared he never felt more happy. He asked for more, and the whole assembly, imitating him, became intoxicated. After this intoxication ceased, they say, that while it lasted the whites confined themselves to their vessel, the man with red clothes returned, and distributed beads, axes, hoes, and stockings. They soon became familiar, and conversed by signs. The whites made them understand that they would now return home, but the next year they would visit them again with presents, and stay with them awhile: but as they could not live without eating, they should then want a little land to sow seeds, in order to raise herbs to put into their broth. Accordingly a vessel arrived the season following, when they were much rejoiced to see each other; but the whites laughed when they saw the axes and hoes hanging as ornaments to their breasts, and the stockings used as tobacco pouches. The whites now put handles (or helves) in the former, and cut down trees before their eyes, and dug the ground, and showed them the use of the stockings. Here they say a general laughter ensued, to think they had remained ignorant of the use of these things, and had borne so long such heavy metal suspended around their necks. Familiarity daily increasing between them and the whites, the latter now proposed to stay with them, asking them only for so much land as the hide of a bullock spread before them would cover or encompass. They granted the request. The whites took a knife, and beginning at one place on this hide, cut it up to a rope not thicker than the finger of a little child. They then took the rope and drew it gently along in a circular form, and took in a large piece of ground; the Indians were surprised at their superior wit, but did not contend with them for a little ground, as they had enough.† They lived contentedly together for a long time, but the new comers from time to time asked for more land, which was readily obtained. And thus they gradually proceeded higher up the Mahicannituck, (Hudson river,) until they began to believe they would want all their country, which proved eventually the case."

A CHAPTER ON GLOVES.

I envy the man who invented gloves, but I have no such feeling towards him who invented shoes. A glove is an object of luxury, elegance, and refinement; a shoe is merely a concealment, a defence, an absolute necessary of life; and I never could sympathise with those who are reduced to the ebb of inventing mere necessities. In ancient writ, however, much confusion exists between shoes and gloves; for the expressions, "a shoe for the hand or foot," or "a glove for the foot or hand," were convertible phrases. David says, "I will cast my shoe over Edom;" and in the book of Ruth we are told, that men took off their shoes and exchanged them as pledges of faith, and as a testimony in contracts. The Chaldee Paraphrast translates the word into glove, instead of shoe; and Talmud explains the word as "the clothing of the hand." From this explanation the learned Casauban draws the acute inference, that the Chaldees wore gloves. And who can doubt him? Even the patriarchs wore gloves; for Isaac knew his son Esau by touching his hand, and finding it hairy, or, in other terms, Esau wore the skins of beasts for gloves,—"Rebekah put the skins of the kids of the goats on the hands of Jacob." Xenophon reproaches the Persians for their effeminacy in wearing thick gloves to keep their fingers from the cold; but, considering the climate of Persia, we must say of Xenophon, that he was not happy in tracing causes and effects. Cowper says

"I would not number on my list of friends
The man who sets his foot upon a worm."

Nor would I, if he did not wear shoes. The first open declaration of war between man and the reptile insect races, was the wearing of shoes. Sterne tells us, that his Maria travelled over all the flinty roads of Southern France and Italy without shoes or stockings; but I never liked her the better for it. I do not think that homo ever had a local habitation, a domicile,—in short, a seat,—till shoes were invented, and threatened a contact. The Spectator tells us, that the young ladies of fashion of that day always retained in their service

* It is certain that the Dutch sent one ship the year after Hudson's discovery, and it is highly probable that a part of the crew who had been with him, returned with this vessel.
† These Dutchmen (says Mr. Heckwelder,) turned their classical knowledge of Queen Dido to a profitable account.

a set of insignificant beaux, whom they called "shoeing-horns," and who, we suppose, must have known the length of their feet.

But a truce to digressions—a nos moutons—Gloves.

The earliest mention of gloves is by Homer, who tells us, that Laertes wore gloves, that his implements of husbandry might not blister his hands. The most appalling description of gloves is in Virgil, where he describes the boldest hearts quailing at the mere sight of the gloves of Eryx, composed of seven folds of the thickest bull's hide, sewed and stiffened with knots of lead and iron:—

"Obstupuerunt animi: tantorum ingentia septem, Terga bouum plumbo inserto, ferroque rigebant."

Nothing can be more distinct than "putting on the gloves," in the ring of modern pugilists, and putting on such gloves as these. We have seen the mailed gloves of chivalry, "where great iron pikes protect the knuckles," and who has not seen, at the Ashmolean Museum, the famed glove or gauntlet of Guy of Warwick, with its welled scales and studs of metal, trespassing from the legitimate region of the glove to the very elbow. No wonder this glove, when thrown into the ring, was so seldom taken up, for the very idea of lifting such a glove, without a portable steam-engine, would frighten any knight in these degenerate days, not excepting those of city creation.

But the gloves of Eryx, of Guy of Warwick, and of all Homer's and Virgil's heroes, and of King Arthur's to boot, sink into absolute insignificance compared to the monstrous glove of Charles V., who, being born at Ghent, (Gand) declared, in contempt of Paris, that he could put the whole city in his glove (Gand). In contrast to the hands that could wear such terrific coverings, let us take Cleaveland's idea of a lady's palm, made delicate by wearing gloves.

So soft, 'tis air but once removed;
Tender, as 'twere a jelly glove.

Athenæus describes a great gastromome of his day, who dishonestly came to feasts with gloves on, that he might eat his food hotter, and take up more at once than any other guest. If a dish were too hot for the naked fingers, this gourmand would have his Benjamin's portion before any body else dared to touch it; after which, he would coolly say, "now, gentlemen, let's start fair." This reminds us of the late Emperor of Morocco, who, when he did not indulge in the expense of gloves in eating his pilaw and other nondescript messes, kept a negro boy with a fine head of hair at his elbow, in whose locks he was constantly wiping his fingers. Varro maintains that olives gathered with the naked hands were more delicate than those gathered with gloves; but this, we suppose, depended on the relative cleanliness of the hands and gloves. Pliny speaks of his father's secretary writing in gloves, to keep his hands from the cold, at the foot of Mount Vesuvius, although the lava cinders and smoke were annoying all around him, and killing his master.

Reverting to Esau, we are reminded of Musonius, who in the first century complains bitterly of the most unchristian degeneracy of persons, not invalids, wearing gloves, "clothing their hands and feet with soft hairy coverings." Seven centuries after this, the church anathematized glove-wearers, and the council of Aix, in the reign of Louis le Debonaire, prohibited, by an edict, the monks wearing any gloves but of sheep-skin. But all the powers of the councils, popes, and cardinals, could not accomplish this object, and glove-wearing by the monks and other ecclesiastics, is a subject of frequent complaint by ascetics. The council of Poitiers confined the use of "sandals, rings, and gloves, to bishops;" and we find that the abbots took the mere order in high dudgeon.

In different parts of Europe, when "the wisdom of our ancestors" flourished, the transfer of lands, of feudal rights, of the sees of bishops, &c. was by giving a glove, and the form of privation was by taking the gloves off. The earl of Carlisle, in the reign of Edward II. was deprived, inter alia, of his gloves, for corresponding with the Scots.

At the coronation of the kings of France, the ceremony of blessing the glove is still continued, as is that of the champion throwing the glove in the ring at the coronation of England. It is well known, that at the coronation of George II. this was not treated altogether as a mere ceremony, for an unknown gentleman took up the glove, as the champion of the Pretender, accepting thereby the challenge of the champion in defence of the right of the house of Hanover to the throne.

Our judges used to be prohibited wearing gloves on the bench; and it was only in case of a maiden assize that the sheriffs were allowed to present a judge with a pair of gloves. Witnesses at present must not touch the book with the glove on, although some books presented to them are sufficiently soiled to need such a protection.

It was an old English gambol to win a pair of gloves by kissing a lady who was caught asleep, or sitting on the table in company; and it was an ancient custom in France and Germany, to forfeit the gloves if a person entered the stables of a prince or peer without previously pulling them off. These gloves were to be redeemed by a fee to the grooms. In the reign of our Henry II. Simon de Martin gave a grant of his lands for fifteen shillings, one pair of white gloves at Easter, and one pound of cinnamon—an odd association.

We are told that Anne Boleyn was "marvelous dayntie" about her gloves. She had a nail which turned up at the side, and it was the delight of Queen Catharine to make her play at cards, without her gloves, in order that the deformity might disgust the king—the result of her experiment is too well known. There was, on one occasion, much talk at court about a pair of splendid gloves given to Mary, Henry's sister, by Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, that superb champion of England, and successful knight against all combatants, English and foreign, who dared to take up his gauntlet.

Queen Elizabeth, mercenary in other respects, was extravagant, fastidious, and capricious in the extreme about her gloves. She used to display them to advantage in playing the Virginelle, though she put them off when she wished to display her art to excess, as was the case when she took care that the Scotch ambassador should overhear her, and whom she afterwards asked if his mistress, Mary Stuart, could play or sing as well.

In 1759, Lord Arran's goods were sold in London, by auction, and Sir Thomas Denny, of Ireland, the lineal descendant of Sir Anthony Denny, the executor of Henry VII., made the following purchases, at the prices opposite:

A pair of gloves, given by Henry VIII. to Sir Anthony Denny.....	38	17	9
A pair given by James I. to Edward Denny.....	22	4	0
A pair of mittens given by Elizabeth to Sir Edward Denny's lady.....	25	4	0

After these mighty relics of the mighty dead, we can scarcely condescend to notice the kids of our modern dandies.

Let us observe that Napoleon took all decent occasions to be without his gloves. He had in the palm of his hand, that complaint which infested poor Abelard, and which Voltaire said our Shakespeare attributed to Cassius. Napoleon's however, was not the cacoethes auri, the itch of gold; for, by his own account, it was caught of a gunner, whose ramrod he snatched up as the man was torn to pieces by a cannon-ball at his side. A punster might say "palmam qui meruit ferat," but let us merely observe, that whatever was the matter with the palm of Napoleon's hands, the outer side was exceedingly white, compact, and well-formed, and he was fond of pulling off and leaving off his gloves, that people might witness "this good point" about him. He was not in the habit of boasting colloquially, but he used very often to say that he had "an aristocratic hand."

Immediately prior to that great revolution which overturned thrones, kingdoms, dynasties, and all distinctions of dress, gloves worn by gentlemen were spangled and very richly worked. But with the throne fell laced clothes, bag-wigs, hair-powder, ruffles, swords, and embroidered gloves; nay, the little muffs worn by all Frenchmen in the streets disappeared with the monarchy.

When the volunteer mania pervaded Ireland, and the whole country had an enthusiasm of nationality—amidst the absolute furor patriæ that pervaded all classes, the spirited little bishop of Derry, (Lord Bristol) obtained as much celebrity for his embroidered white gloves with their gold fringe, long gold laces and tassels, as he did among the ladies by his six plump little ponies, or among the gentlemen by his radical, bonnet-rouge politics. When will such eras be seen again?

We must conclude this chapter with an anecdote which brings the history of gloves down to our own day. When the present B—l H—s was in the glory of his dandyism, he had a room in his town domicile entirely devoted to gloves, where a table was always laid out with "all the delicacies of the season" in the way of gloves, and where his friends were at liberty to help themselves. He himself never used to put on a pair of gloves twice.

AN EXTRACT.

How fearful is the very life which we hold! We have our being beneath a cloud, and are a marvel even to ourselves. There is not a single thought which has its affixed limits. Like circles in the water, our researches weaken as they extend, and vanish at last into the immeasurable and unfathomable space of the vast unknown. We are like children in the dark; we tremble in a shadowy and terrible void, peopled with our fancies! Life is our real night, and the first gleam of the morning, which brings us certainty, is death.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Falkland.—Much censure has been cast upon the publishers of this novel on account of its supposed immoral tendencies, and it has been decried with a fierceness and a zeal which might almost prove the immaculate purity of the critic, and the unredeemed impiety of Bulwer. This charge has often been alleged against this singularly-gifted writer, and matter-of-fact people are constantly identifying him with the villains and the rousés, the robbers and unprincipled men of fashion whom he so graphically and justly depicts. This is unjust. We do not intend to indicate the absolute propriety of presenting to the public too accurate images of vice, and its seductive scenes and thrilling incidents; but we do contend that the representation of human nature, when accurate, which must always possess interest, is not necessarily productive of the extreme evil in the minds of those admitted to its examination which is so gratuitously assumed; and that it by no means implies the residence of vice and corruption in the breast of the painter. With respect to Falkland, we acknowledge that its publication might have as well been let alone—it was not needed to fill up the sum of Bulwer's fame; and on some weak minds it may, perchance, produce no very favourable impression.

Atlantic Souvenir.—We are happy to learn that the proprietors of this interesting annual feel so well pleased with the encouragement they have received in its sale, that they intend to continue the series, and to get up the next volume in a style even superior to its predecessors. C. Rolls, of London, has been engaged to furnish a superb frontispiece; and twenty other engravings will embellish the work. The contributions of native talent are solicited; and as the highest compensation is afforded for literary labour, they will undoubtedly be furnished. The mere statement of these facts will ensure the attention of literary men.

Our Village.—Looking over our late files of the London Literary Gazette we perceive that a further volume of this series of popular sketches has appeared in England. It must, of course, be re-printed by some one or other of our numerous enterprising publishers. It is thus announced in terms peculiarly appropriate to the expression of praise for its most fascinating author:

"We welcome Miss Mitford as we would welcome the golden rain-fall of the laburnum; the opening of the thousand small flowers that form the fragrant clouster of the lilac; the first gooseberry tart, that happiest union of sweet and sour; or, as we would welcome violets, happiest union of sweet and sour; or, as we would welcome as we cream, cheese, &c.; in short, we give her the same welcome as we would to all the sweet signs that tell of present spring and coming summer. This little volume is the fourth of a very delightful series; and it has all the arch humour, the exquisite bits of landscape, the light but true touches of character, that made its predecessors so popular."

The Jail.—The question respecting the jail appears to have been at length decided in a way directly contrary to the wishes of our citizens. It is to be fitted up "in a fire-proof manner for the purpose of keeping the public records!" There seems to be a settled determination on the part of the Common Council totally to disregard the desires of their constituents. The public have long since voted the nuisance down, but we fear it will remain for their posterity to demolish, unless they take the law in their own hands, and tumble it about the ears of our city sages. We should be sorry to recommend such a course; but if a public meeting should be called for the purpose, we would not answer for the consequences.

Strangers.—We are requested to state, and we do so with much pleasure, as the object entirely meets our approbation, that a free emigrant office has been established in this city, in the Sixth Avenue near Sixth-street, for the purpose of affording intelligence, advice, and employment to all foreigners coming to this country. The advantages of this must be obvious. In a metropolis like New-York, where almost every fresh arrival adds hundreds to our already dense population, it is of the utmost importance that there should be some place where strangers may rely upon receiving correct information. The gentleman who is thus exerting himself appears to be influenced solely by benevolent considerations, as his services and advice will be dispensed gratuitously.

New Music.—We call the attention of our musical readers to the much admired song, "Mi Pizzica mi Stimola," published by Bourne. The piece is got up with much care and attention, and ornamented by a vignette of Mrs. Austin in the character of Marian, in the popular opera of Rokeby. The costume, figure, and scene—a gothic chamber—are finely delineated, but the general effect is more striking than the likeness.

The Two Graves.—The author of this tale not having furnished us with the second and concluding chapter in time for the present number, we are obliged to defer it until our next.

FAREWELL TO MY HARP.

AS SUNG BY MISS GEORGE, AT THE PARK THEATRE, WITH THE MOST UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE—THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY C. E. HORN.

ALLEGRETTO.

SECOND VERSE.
The roses of life all their sweetness have shed,
Well-a-day! well-a-day! well-a-day!

From the sunshine of hope all the brightness has fled,
And grief on my path her dark shadows has spread.
The roses, &c.

THIRD VERSE.
Farewell—my last song to its close hastens on,
Well-a-day! well-a-day! well-a-day!

Yet it cheers my lone spirit to think there is one
Who will fondly remember the bard when he's gone.
Farewell, &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO AN ORPHAN.

LAST scion of a withered tree!
Left early desolate;
Tears fill mine eyes, as mournfully
I think upon thy fate:
Thou—thou perchance unconscious art
Of all which yet may wring thy heart.
Sweet bud! though many a storm of grief
Hath visited thy bower,
Thou wear'st the freshness of the leaf,
The beauty of the flower,
Though many a blossom from the bough
Which shelters thee, hath vanished now.
No fears thy bosom yet molest,
Thou art not yet aware
How much a mother's tenderness,
A father's guardian care,
Are needed in a world like this,
Oh! blest is thine unconsciousness!
But yet methinks that sweet face wears
A shade of pensiveness,
And not the joy of childhood's years
Thy frequent smiles express:
A heart made prematurely wise
Speaks in thy mildly mournful eyes.
The very beauty of thy face,
Thy cheek so purely fair,
Where scarce the rose has left its trace,
Thy light and silken hair,
The veins on thy transparent brow,
Like violets buried under snow—
Doth not this fragile loveliness
Hint at thy parents' doom,
And even in its rich excess
Speak darkly of the tomb?
Yet hope, fond dreamer, vain would see
A vista of bright years for thee.
The spirit of thy gifted sire,
Thy mother's truth of heart,
The light that flashed but to expire,
The love that could impart
A joy to death—shall we not see
Them shadowed forth again in thee?

Yes! from the depths of those blue eyes
Thy father's soul looks forth,
And in thy smile a promise lies
Of all thy mother's worth;
Even now the germ of thought appears
In thee beyond thy tender years.
Sweet child! sole relic of the dead!
Link of a broken chain!
The looks, the smiles from earth long fled
In thee revive again:
And there are those who ever see
An image of the past in thee. THEYSA.

TO A SPANISH LADY,

On hearing her express an intention of re-entering a convent.

Young heart without a stain!
Why mid the convent's melancholy gloom,
Wilt thou, forgetful of the world, again
Thy blessed wealth entomb?
It is no fitting place
For one to whom so much of worth is given,
And dark-eyed beauty, and the winning grace
Of thoughts which tell of heaven.
Ye, o'er whom virtue's spell
Has been a thread of gossamer—a hair—
Whose haunted breast remorse has made a hell,
Ruled by the fiend despair:
Ye, who have felt the frown
Of disappointment blight what promise gave,
Have seen the last, best bosom friend go down
Unto the voiceless grave:
Ye, in whose future sky
No cheering star of kindly hope appears;
Along whose desert path all springs are dry,
Save those, alas! of tears,—
Fly from the world apart
To mercy's shrine—the habitation of prayer,
And, with a humble and repentant heart,
Seek rest and refuge there.
But thou, whose buried years
No shade of guilt, no spectre-thought attends,
With every charm that virtue's smile endears,
Glad home and circling friends—
Why court the cloistered shade
Where undeplored love's richest blossoms fall?
Thou, whose bright spirit was in kindness made
To grace the courtly hall!

Are thy heart's wounds so sore,
So deeply laid, so fully fraught with harm,
That Hope hath not within her healthful store
For them a healing balm?
And heaven-born Hope replies,
"Child of the stricken soul, believe it not:
I have a solace for its deepest sighs,
Peace for its darkest lot."
"Though clouds are o'er thee now,
And down thy pale, fair cheek unbidden steal
Gushes of secret tears, and on thy brow
Stern care hath set his seal,
Clear skies shall yet be thine,
Serene and bright as beamed on Eden's bowers,
And chastened joys from feeling's holiest shrine,
Shall cheer thy coming hours.
"Sweet words from friendship's tongue
Shall round thy heart like seraph-music play,
And many a flower from pure affection sprung,
Breathe fragrance on thy way;
And many a beacon light
Far o'er thy future path shall cheering dawn,
And guardian ministers, by day and night,
Unseen, shall lead thee on."
O then, fair future maid,
Wilt thou not list affection's, pleaded prayer?
And seek not in the convent's withering shade
Peace, vainly sought for there!
Stay for the social hearth,
The festal hall, where woman's charms regale;
She that hath smiles to make a heaven of earth,
Should wear no shrouding veil!

MORNING.

I know not whence the emotions come
That thrill like sunbeams in my heart,
When night folds up her shadowy plume,
And bids her sombre train depart:
But, when the morning's rosy glance
Comes flashing through the orient skies,
I feel a blest inheritance
As dreams within my spirit rise.
How like a throng of living flowers
Gay thoughts spring up and float away,
As morn unfolds her golden hours,
And bids their streaming splendours play
Each field, and grove, and stream, and tree,
Is deck'd in beauty from above,

And rich in viewless melody,
The air is redolent with love!
At such an hour earth's heartless throngs
Are like the ephemera of a day;
I hear the birds' rejoicing songs
And feel as glad and free as they!
I mark the blue suspended dome
In its uncolumned grandeur rise;
The outspread earth is made their home,
Theirs the wide palace of the skies!
Give me the welcome smile of morn,
The evening's starry coronet,
Within whose kindling spells are born
The gems in fancy's garland set!
These are the treasures—priceless, rare,
Beyond barbaric pearl or gold
That ever flashed upon the air,
Or glittered where old ocean rolled.
And link'd with these unsullied spells
In high mysterious union,
Within the inmost spirit dwells
A ray unsullied—a pearl unwon!
Oh, how the poor delusive show
Of sublimity love or power,
Withers before the radiant glow
Of morning's smile, or sunset's hour!
Ask not the frivolous, the vain,
Thou child of thought, to share with thee
The kindling raptures that pertain
Unto thy glorious destiny!
It is enough that thou canst find
A charm surpassing gold or love:
The transport of the undying mind,
The soaring of the soul above!

Above!—there's magic in that word!
It speaks the free, unfettered thought;
The seraph-voice of fancy, heard
When grovelling spirits are forgot!
It is a proud boon thus to be Indifferent to the plodding train:
To list aerial melody
In nature's wide and pure domain! EVERARD.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1880.

NUMBER 9.

Drawn by A. J. Davis—Engraved by A. J. Mason.

THE TILED COTTAGE.

THE romantic reader who may feel a desire to visit the antiquated establishment, of which the above is a faithful representation, need not be deterred from his or her purpose by the dread of fatigue or the fear of expense. The "Tiled Cottage" is neither in Westchester, New-Jersey, nor on Long-Island. Even the highly-favoured mortals who live in the vicinity of the Battery and the Bowling-Green can walk to it in less than two minutes! One hundred years ago it was in the heart of the city. It still forms the north-east corner of Broad and Beaver streets.

Like most modern corners in these degenerate times, it is occupied as a grocery, by Mr. J. W. Carpenter, who hires the premises of Thomas Gardner. The projecting windows, on the extreme left, in Broad-street, light the shoe-store of Philip Daily, and the foliage in the rear is the top of a luxuriant vine, which is creeping up the gable-end of an adjoining house of modern construction.

Of the history of the "Tiled Cottage" we are profoundly ignorant, not even knowing whether it was ever the temporary residence of Charlotte Temple, or some more recent heroine, immortalized by Brown; but several respectable house-keepers in the neighbourhood assure us, that it is at present famed for tea, sugar, and liquors, of superior quality.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THIS successful pioneer in American periodical literature promises, under its "new administration," (it is that of the Everetts,) to preserve its high character for sound doctrine in morals, liberal and enlarged feeling in politics, and correct taste in criticism. We always regard the history of this quarterly journal with pride and satisfaction. It was commenced at a period which was by no means propitious to the success of so arduous an undertaking in this young republic. We were then at war with Great Britain, which held in her iron grasp the dominion of letters, with a power and a might second only to that with which she rode on the mountain wave, and proudly claimed it for her home. On the continent of Europe, where the great struggle against her dominion was carried on, the very name of the United States was little more than a fairy vision which might haunt the reveries of a disciple of Plato, or warm the heart of a secret worshipper of Tell or Brutus. In our own country there was little enthusiasm cherished for letters. The all-absorbing theme, the engrossing interest was politics. Napoleon and the British navy—democracy and federalism—these were the subjects which agitated the minds and thrilled the hearts of every American. To attempt a quarterly review at such a crisis—to aim at promulgating doctrines, and propounding the law on matters connected with men and books, when all opinions were unsettled, and all deference was conventionally and undisputedly paid to transatlantic authority, was indeed a difficult, a doubtful, and a bold enterprise. Its success reflects equal honour on the sagacity of its projectors, and on the spirit and truly magnanimous patriotism of the people of this country. Notwithstanding the established reputation of the two great quarterlies of London and Edinburgh, which were regularly reprinted here, notwithstanding their sneers at the literary capabilities of this degenerate commonwealth, the North American Review at once, and without serious opposition, rose into influence and favour. And this influence and this favour have gone on increasing, in spite of occasional errors and lapses which had better been avoided. Its character is now fixed—and foreign civil or domestic enmity will in vain seek to lessen its popularity or cripple its power.

The last number for July contains a number of excellent and well written articles, all of which will reward perusal. The political condition of Mexico is ably and knowingly handled. The notices of Byron are well written and happily conceived. But there are two points on which we are sorry to see this excellent journal volunteer its powerful aid. We allude to the American system, as it has been called, a political question, about which the less a literary journal is concerned the better. The other is a useless and idle warfare with British periodicals, about the literary eminence of our writers. Their own reputation is their best defence, and will outlive all foreign envy and domestic neglect.

TALES AND SKETCHES.*

We have been favoured by the publisher with a few sheets of a work bearing the above title, and which is now in press in this city. The writer is evidently one who has travelled much, and noted with an observant eye the "form and pressure" of the passing scene. The tales comprised in the first volume are mostly illustrative of Scottish life, and in descriptive power and correct delineation of character may challenge a comparison with many of those works which have made the "Mountain Clime" a classic land. We have been much pleased with a perusal of "The Dapper Gentleman's Story," it is a picture true to nature, and will find its prototype in every community. We rank this tale upon a par with the best of Mr. Galt's, and regret that our limited space prevents us from more than alluding to it. The extract which we make below is an episode in a sketch entitled the "Tent." Our readers will agree with us that it possesses a great deal of that tenderness of thought and expression—of subdued and holy passion—so touchingly depicted in "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life." The traveller is wandering listlessly in a graveyard, listening to many a village legend from the lips of a casual companion. In reply to the remark, "Here is a grave, so new, that the grass is not yet green above it; whose tomb is this?" he receives the following narration:

"Do you observe that youth, with pale and melancholy look, standing a few steps from it, and gazing so intently, yet, with such a heart-blinded look, as if his eye could penetrate the clod, as doubtless in imagination it does? O! he could tell of the lovely flower so early faded, and so lowly laid."

"It is a young girl's grave then, and that fair-haired, hapless one, her brother?"

"No, sir, her lover."

"Was there anything peculiar in the circumstances of her death?"

"To those who knew her, every thing connected with her was interesting—she was a poor peasant girl; bonny Marion Gaham! I remember her well: she was the prettiest lass in the parish."

"I know not why it is, but the fate of a young and beautiful girl is always interesting; every heart is delighted in her joy or touched with her grief; but let any chance befall those who are either ugly or old, and we are more apt to be amused at their misfortunes, than to feel for them—we scarcely admit that the homely can have feeling. Beauty is indeed a powerful spell."

"I will merely glance at the story of bonny Marion, for by that name she was universally known. On a pleasant gloaming of last autumn the villagers were assembled on the beach. The maidens sang with artless note their favourite melodies, and the hardy men tuned the droning bagpipes—their untutored music floated along the surface of the sea, and echo, borne on the wings of the zephyr, returned a sweet and mellow tone. Bonny Marion was the most conspicuous in the groupe, both for loveliness and worth; she was the especial favourite of the pious minister; if other proof than her artless and innocent demeanour were wanting to commend her to general esteem, that insured her the respect of the whole parish. She was regular in her attendance at church, she listened with undivided attention to the words of truth, and in her private hours no one was more devout than bonny Marion. Two wherries were expected to return that evening from Glasgow, whither they had sailed a few days before, laden with fish. While the villagers were thus engaged, a bark-stained sail was seen far in the distance, impelling gently over the scarcely ruffled wave, one of the expected boats. Each villager hoped that the approaching wherry contained the one dearest to her heart: the wife longed to embrace her cherished husband, the mother to kiss her loving son, and the blushing maiden, to steal a glance from the bright eyes of her faithful lover. Bonny Marion sat in breathless anxiety, expecting every moment to greet the kindly look of Dugald Cameron; they had been reared from infancy together, and but a few weeks before had plighted their vows of eternal love. This voyage was the last that Dugald contemplated to make, before, at the altar, his heart and Marion's were linked in one. The wherry approached the shore; all hurried to the beach to welcome the comers, save bonny Marion, whose heart was throbbing in her bosom, as she kept her place on the green banks, her eye eagerly searching, but in vain, to catch the welcome glance of Dugald Cameron; it was not his wherry that had just arrived. On that gloaming I stood by her side, but conscious of her anxiety, I spoke not a word. I gazed on the meeting of friends, I saw the embrace, the kiss—the hearty shake of hand and hand, and I heard the loud and happy tones of congratulation. Suddenly the scene of joy was changed to one of grief. I heard the sobs of the women, I saw the weather-beaten hands of the men, wrung as if their hearts were overflowing with sorrow, and every eye at intervals turned a pitiful glance on bonny Marion. I also gazed upon her lovely face; what a look she cast upon me. I shall never forget that look! Her heart seemed over-fraught with the anticipation of some dreadful event. Her cheek flushed redder than the rose, and in a moment grew paler than the lily. She spoke not, but gazed intently, watching each motion of the groupe that was still lingering on the beach. I felt all impatience to know the truth at once, and hurried to the water's edge. I soon learned the cause of that sorrow, which to me had before been a mystery. Dugald Cameron was drowned! His wherry was boarded in the Clyde by 'the press-gang,' and Dugald, in hopes of escaping the strong arm of power, which would have doomed him to a life worse than that of a galley slave, plunged into the river; he gallantly buffeted the waves for a while, and at length sank, but no eye saw him rise again! How was this melancholy news to be communicated to bonny Marion! Fearful that some of the villagers would too rudely break it to her, I resolved on the instant to be myself the bearer. I spoke not my intentions aloud, but made a motion to all; they understood me, and alone, slowly I advanced to the place where bonny Marion still sat mute and motionless, more like a piece of excellent sculpture than a living being. Her eyes were fixed on me, but not a tear was in them—her lips were firm, but not a sound escaped from them. My heart melted at the mournful sight! I had not the power of utterance to tell the tale. I believe I must have looked all that I would have said, for in a moment bonny Marion exclaimed, in a frantic tone, 'drowned?' I murmured, 'yes.' I wish a painter could have seen the look that I saw then: it was agony personified. She now covered her face with her hands, and her head bowed down as it were by the weight of her sufferings, seemed buried in her lap. The villagers at a signal from me approached. A young maiden took hold of either arm of bonny Marion; they raised her on her feet, and at their motion, passive as a very child, she moved onwards to her dwelling; still neither moan nor tear betrayed her agony of mind. Her eye was fixed on vacancy, and each feature of her lovely face was motionless as marble. How deeply every heart was pierced with this appalling spectacle of woe!

In an arm-chair, that graced her father's 'ben,' bonny Marion was placed. The silent sorrow of her gray-haired sire, and the violent outbreaks of her doating mother's grief, added so heavily to the load on my heart, that I could not refrain from tears. I know it is unmanly to shed a tear, but if the masterdom of the world had been offered to me, I could not at that moment have controlled my feelings.

"I know not exactly how long it was after this—hours perhaps—that a gentle tap was heard at the cottage door, and in a moment after, with a joyous step, Dugald Cameron bounded amongst us; bonny Marion uttered a piercing shriek, and fell prostrate on the floor; her streaming eyes and sobbing bosom gave us assurance not only that she lived, but also hope, that the violence of her grief would shortly pass away. Her own eyes had seen him, who but a moment before, she thought was divided from her for ever, by the impassable gulph of death. Dugald knew not then what could have occasioned this heart-rending scene. I begged her parents to put bonny Marion on her pillow, and I entreated Dugald to follow me from the cottage. 'I was obeyed. We strove to the beach together—it must have been near midnight; not a star twinkled in the heavens—dark clouds overhung the face of nature like a pall. I told Dugald as we paced alone, yet in the midst of terms, all that had transpired. I begged him to have no fears for his betrothed, and assured him, that in the morning she would greet him with as kind and healthy a look as ever. His feelings were calmed. I now asked him to relate by what chance he had so unexpectedly re-appeared. His story was to this effect:—When, to avoid impressment, he plunged into the river, a thought struck him that he would be pursued and overtaken; he therefore feigned to be exhausted, and sank as if struggling for life. The moment he was beneath the surface, he swam swiftly under the keel of a smack, which at the time was passing down the river, and rose, unperceived by the 'press-gang,' on the larboard side. He was immediately taken on deck, treated kindly, and at his request, when opposite the Hill of Ardmore, was safely landed—whence he walked to his native village."

"The clouds of that night found vent in rain, the morning sun came forth in a clear unshadown sky—and all nature seemed refreshed. Bonny Marion rose that morn: the flood of tears which the evening before presaged would have dissipated the gloom that hung over her mind, gave not the expected relief—she was a maniac. The sun of reason never more dawned upon her mind. O, that was indeed a sad day for her parents, but a sadder for Dugald Cameron."

I once saw Hamlet acted in a theatre; a pretty maiden in that play, I think they called her Ophelia, becomes deranged; she looked for all the world so like bonny Marion, that I could not help thinking of it. Bonny Marion would sit for hours upon the beach, at the same place and with the same look, as on that hapless evening. If she saw a sail approaching, she would laugh with very joy, and cry that Dugald was coming—the sail passed, then she would sigh, and half upbraid her lover's tardiness. It was a pitiful sight to see. She had a thousand fancies; at times she would roam about the fields, singing snatches of old songs, sometimes to a gay, sometimes to a melancholy air. She had a sweet and silver voice. Again she would wander through the woods, or bound over the lawns, gathering each pretty flower that met her eye—the sweet-brier rose, the daisy, the rowan-blossom, the hawthorn bloom, and the prickly thistle; sometimes the dock, the fern, the brechan, the nettle, and the heather, and with these would she fantastically decorate her long auburn tresses, or twine them around her humble apparel. There were an innocence and simplicity in all she did, that even in her dark moments was charming. Every heart hoped she would recover! though days sped fleetly on, and no outward token denoted a change, still the villagers hoped that the cloud which overshadowed her reason would yet pass away. She never knew Dugald Cameron, though he was very kind to her, and watched her as though she were a child. O how he wept, as he gazed upon the ruin of his cherished Marion:

"A few weeks ago she was found dead; it was upon the beach at her usual watching place. There is her grave, and that youth is Dugald Cameron."

We have seen this work ascribed to the pen of James Lawson, Esq.; whether justly or not we do not know; and the author forbids us to inquire, in the following quaint motto from Burton:—"So that the contents please thee, what concerns it if the man in the moon be author. I would not willingly be known."

MADDEN'S TRAVELS.*

It were needless for us to enter upon a formal review of these delightful and picturesque notices of the eastern world. The newspapers have teemed with extracts, which are not sufficiently satisfactory, because they did not embody the whole work. Dr. Madden is a man of accurate observation, impartial judgment, fearless intrepidity, and agreeable powers of description. The regions which he has visited possess uncommon interest at the present juncture. The book will form a standard work on the subject of which it treats.

THE OXONIANS.†

Another novel from the pen of the author of "The Roué," has just made its appearance in England. We concur so heartily in the following abstract sentiment, suggested by this work, that we hope we shall be spared the pain of indulging our own criticisms against it by its republication here. We have had too much trash of this sort palmed off upon us already.

"We remember a story of an Italian priest, who, while confessing an ostler, questioned him closely whether he ever greased his horse's teeth to prevent their eating their due allotment of oats; the man assured him he never had; and absolution was granted. But when the period of confession again came round, this fault was the very first to which the ostler pleaded guilty. 'I thought,' exclaimed the surprised priest, 'you told me, that of this fraud at least you had never been guilty?' 'I never had,' replied the man, 'till you put it in my head.' Much upon this ground do we object to the volumes now before us; we object to them as introducing scenes, persons, &c. whose very existence it is matter of prudence and even virtue to keep out of sight; matter of prudence certainly, for it is to be more than doubted whether the description of luxurious enjoyment will be more likely to attract than the late after-consequence to deter; and the common-place bits of morality—those gratuities of cant to propriety—which are every now and then thrown in, seem something like peace-offerings, which enable the author to say—'How can you call a book in which there are such excellent sentiments immoral?' The writer has mistaken his forte; it is not that of deep insight either into man or woman's character. It is a common but most mistaken idea, that knowledge of vice is knowledge of human nature, and that to depict crime is to be profound. It would be ridiculous to bid the novelist avoid the darker picture of vice—the bad as well as the good are his property; but we see no great moral advantage in having the words libertine, passion, seduction, always before us, while a warning is held out in the shape of sudden death or violent repentance, which, in nine cases out of ten, never happens in real life. In a literary point of view these volumes do not call for severe criticism; they are made up of the remains of the Roué, who again figures on the scene; story there is none, and the dénouement is not such as we can approve."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

JURY TRIALS.

THERE is a positive absurdity in demanding of a man whether he is guilty or not, when the court is assembled to try that very fact, and when, if he deny his guilt, he is not believed, but the trial proceeds just the same. I remember being present, some years ago, at the assizes in a city in the west of England, where a simple looking fellow was put to the bar, upon an indictment for sheep-stealing. The usual question was addressed to him, and his answer convulsed the court with laughter. "I am not going to tell you any thing about it, gentlemen; you must find it out, if you want to know." It was from pure simplicity he made this reply, thinking, no doubt, it was a hard case he should be a witness against himself; and hesitating, I suppose, to declare a falsehood by denying his guilt; for when he was instructed how he should plead, and did so plead, there was sufficient proof for his conviction. But if it be, as I contend it is, absurd to require of a man that he should say he is not guilty, as a sort of legal defiance to his accusers, to prove him so, what can be urged in defence of the tenfold greater absurdity of compelling him to deny his guilt? Or, if not absolutely compelling, at least exhorting and persuading him? And this, too, for the avowed purpose of inducing him to take his chances of escape in the lottery of justice. Let us consider for a moment the relative position of the parties in such a scene as frequently occurs in our courts.

We will suppose a man indicted for forgery. He knows he has committed it, and that the proofs of his guilt are irrefragable. Or we will discard the latter circumstance altogether, as a motive. We will assume only, that being conscious of his crime, he either disdains to deny it, or is reluctant to burden his conscience with the additional crime of falsehood. In fact, it is of no consequence for my argument what are the reasons which impel him, when arraigned, to plead guilty. It is enough for me that he does so plead, to show all the monstrous perversions of law and morality that follow. The judge no sooner hears his plea than he employs every argument and entreaty to prevail upon him to retract it. In other words, he earnestly beseeches him to tell a direct and deliberate lie; and if the prisoner (as was actually the case at the last summer assizes, on the northern circuit) ventures to remonstrate against these entreaties, upon the ground that he cannot deny his guilt without telling a lie, the judge feels it his duty to explain, by a species of forensic casuistry not very edifying, that it is telling no lie at all, in a moral point of view, to say he is not guilty of the crime laid to his charge, though he knows he is! And for what purpose is all this machinery put in motion? Not to save an innocent man, for the man himself says he is not innocent; but to give a guilty man, a criminal by his own confession, the benefit of that "glorious uncertainty of the law," which is its opprobrium; to enable him, as I have already said, to take his chance of drawing a prize in the lottery of the law; to secure him advantages which ought not to exist, the contingent probability that evidence may fail in some technical point, that some technical flaw may be discovered in the proceedings, or that a capricious jury may disbelieve him, and upon their oaths declare he is innocent in spite of himself! Ay, and be it remembered, these chances are not altogether illusory. One case I distinctly remember, (and I have heard of others) which occurred at the Old Bailey about fifteen years ago. A man who was actually indicted for forgery, pleaded guilty, was induced to retract his plea, stood his trial, and was acquitted, owing to some informality! Now, all this was very agreeable to the poor wretch who thus unexpectedly slipped his neck out of the halter; but what a burlesque was it upon our criminal jurisprudence, and what a mockery of the principles of equal justice! DIURNAL DUTIES.

Under the title of Sure Rules for obtaining and securing the preservation of Health, the enjoyment of life, and the attainment of a good old age, we are presented by a contemporary writer with the following admirable directions for the occupations of a day. By a large class of the community they are capable of being strictly complied with; and we are fully persuaded, that whoever will put them in practice will very soon experience their effects in an augmented amount of health and cheerfulness.

From March to October rise with the sun; in this there should be no deviation or interruption; no morning must be missed on any consideration. Immediately after leaving your bed, and washing with pure spring water, get into the open air, and, if residing in the city, make your way on foot or on horseback, as far into the surrounding country as your time will permit. The purity and invigorating quality of the air early in the morning greatly exceeds that of any other part of the day. Breakfast about eight o'clock, and as your appetite will be created solely by exercise and pure air, you will experience an eager desire for the first meal of the day, which you may indulge in freely, taking care, however, that it be not to excess. This meal should consist of light wholesome food. After breakfast you will of course devote yourself to the business of the day, but if you have no direct occupation, employ yourself in exercise in the open air. Upon the time selected for dinner, will entirely depend the necessity of refreshment previous to the second meal. If the dinner-hour be any time before two o'clock, luncheon is not required, it would be even hurtful. If, however, it be protracted until four, five, or six o'clock, some nourishment ought to be taken at an equal distance between breakfast and dinner; but nothing substantial—a cracker, a crust of bread, a draught of milk, or a custard, is all that nature requires. If your employment be sedentary, it is almost as essential to the preservation of health that before you sit down to your dinner you should again take exercise, as it is that you should take any dinner at all; if your time, therefore, will allow ample opportunity for walking, be as particular in taking it as if you depended upon it for your subsistence.

Thus prepared by air and exercise, you need not fear to yield to the natural impulse of the appetite in the enjoyment of your dinner, taking care, however, that you do not approach to excess, much less indulge in it. For dinner, any thing may be eaten that is in season and not rendered pernicious by the refinements of modern cookery. Water is the most wholesome beverage to be taken at this meal; to wine in the extent of two or three glasses, we know of no very forcible objections, but more than this is decidedly injurious; malt liquors should also be drunk very sparingly, and distilled spirits should be entirely abstained from. It may be here observed, as we have hinted on a former occasion, that persons in sound robust health, procured by exercise and general temperance, require a greater amount of food, and a more nutritious quality than those who live a life of indolence and indulgence. Common sense will point out to them the propriety of selecting such kinds of aliment which experience has taught them best agrees with them—and reason, guided by their own feelings, ought to indicate the bounds which nature has fixed as to its quantity.

In three or four hours after dinner, exercise in the open air should again be taken, provided time will allow; afterwards you may take tea, but as you value your health and a peaceful night's rest, do not take green tea, neither let it be strong. Should you dine early, with the amount of exercise here directed, you may perhaps require a little supper; in general it is better, however, to omit this meal entirely—when taken, it is all-important that it be perfectly light, and very limited in quantity. Retire to bed by ten or half-past ten o'clock at the very latest; sleep on a hair mattress, in a room with a chimney in it, or otherwise well ventilated, without fire, or curtains to the bed. A striking difference will be experienced by any one going out of the fresh air into a close bed-room early in the morning, which clearly demonstrates that the atmosphere of the room becomes during the night impregnated with unwholesome exhalations. The only way in which the injurious effects of such an atmosphere can be obviated is by keeping up a free ventilation in the room, and by the strictest cleanliness.

A LESSON ON GOOD MANNERS.

The regulations of the steamboats on the Mississippi forbid gentlemen from entering the ladies' cabin. On his voyage up the Mississippi river, Captain Basil Hall, having accompanied his wife into the ladies' cabin, was apprised of the regulation, and requested to retire. To this hint (although a sense of decorum ought to have sufficed without any hint) the captain paid no attention, and continued to repeat his visits to the ladies' cabin. At the request of the husbands of the other ladies, the captain of the steamboat at length interfered, and coolly, but positively, ordered Captain Hall not to go into the ladies' cabin, intimating at the same time that the order must and should be obeyed. Captain Hall probably thought it necessary to show that a post-captain in the British navy did not take orders from a backwoods captain of a steamboat, and accordingly repeated his visit to the ladies' cabin. As it was late at night, nothing farther was then done. At sunrise the next morning Captain Hall appeared on deck, and was summoned by the captain of the steamboat to get his baggage ready to go on shore. The steamboat was then somewhere between the mouth of the Red river and the Chickasaw bluff, with a very pleasant canebreak on each bank, and from two to five hundred miles from any settlement. Under these circumstances, going on shore is no joke. Captain Hall could scarcely believe the intimation serious, but soon heard the orders given to one of the hands, to "bring forward the English gentleman's trunks, as he was going to be left when the boat stopped to wood." A Kentuckian immediately stepped out from the engine room, very little over six feet three inches high, of a complexion considerably lighter than sole leather, and with a pair of fists closely resembling, in all their properties, the vice at which he had been working, and moved along about seven feet at a stride (as he was obliged to mince his steps among the bales and casks on the deck) towards the pile of Captain Hall's trunks. Not a word was said, but in two seconds half a truck load of baggage was on the Kentuckian's shoulders, and all ready for Captain Hall to be left at the next wood yard; where, as there were no hospitals, schools, nor navy yards to visit, the captain would not be pestered with having sights and shows "crammed down his throat." Notwithstanding this, Captain Hall (strangely enough) was rather unpleasantly affected with the appearance of things. He tried to argue, coax, and wheedle, but all to no effect. He did not happen, on this occasion, to talk loud nor bustle, which was fortunate for him, and at the last moment, on the intercession of the husbands of the ladies, on whose retirement Captain Hall had intruded, the captain of the steamboat relented, on condition that Captain Hall should "learn better manners for the future."

BROADWAY.

The day has its successive scenes, as life its seven ages. The morning opens with servants sweeping the pavements—the pale seamstress hastening to her daily toil—the tormented dyspeptic sallying forth to his joyless morning ride—the cry of the brisk milkman—the jolly baker—and the sonorous sweep—the shop-boy fantastically arranging the tempting show, that is to present to the second sight of many a belle her own sweet person, arrayed in Flandrian's garnitures, Marquand's jewels, Goguet's flowers, and (oh tempora, oh mores!) Manuel's "ornamental hair work of every description."

† By the author of the "Roué." Three vols. 12mo. London, 1830.

Then comes the business hour—the merchant, full of projects, hopes, and fears, hastening to his counting-house—the clerk to his desk—the lawyer to the courts—the children to their schools, and country ladies to their shopping.

Then comes forth the gay and idle, and Broadway presents a scene as bustling, as varied, and as brilliant, as an oriental fair. There are graceful belles, arrayed in the light costume of Paris, playing off their coquetties on their attendant beaux—accurately appareled Quakers—a knot of dandies, walking pattern-cards, faithful living personifications of their prototypes in the tailor's window—dignified, self-complacent matrons—idle starers at beauties, and beauties willing to be stared at—blanketed Indian chiefs from the Winnebagoes, Choctaws, and Cherokees, walking straight forward, as if they were following an enemy's trail in their own forests—girls and boys escaped from school thralldom—young students with their backs turned on college and professors—merry children clustering round a toy-shop—servants loaded with luxuries for the evening party, jostling milliners' girls with bandboxes—a bareheaded Greek boy, with a troop of shouting urchins at his heels—a party of jocund sailors from the "farthest Ind"—a family groupe of Alsace peasants—and, not the least jolly or enviable of all this multifarious multitude, the company of Irish orangemen stationed before St. Paul's, their attention divided between the passers-by, their possible customers, and the national jibes and jokes of their associates.

DRESS OF SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

To the attractions of a noble figure, Raleigh studied to combine those of a graceful and splendid attire. Many of his garments were adorned with jewels, according to the richest fashions of the day, and his armour was so costly and curious that it was preserved, for its rarity, in the Tower. In one of his portraits he is represented in this armour, which was of silver richly ornamented, and his sword and belt studded with diamonds, rubies, and pearls. In another he chose to be depicted in a white satin pinked vest, surrounded with a brown doublet, flowered, and embroidered with pearls; and on his head a little black feather, with a large ruby and pearl drop to confine the loop in place of a button. These, it may be said, were no extraordinary proofs of costly expenditure in dress, in days when it was the boast of Villiers duke of Buckingham, to be "yoked and manacled" in ropes of pearl, and to carry on his cloak and suit alone diamonds to the value of eighty thousand pounds.

LAUGHING TURKS.

A gentleman who loves a laugh himself tells a good story about Turks laughing. He was at the town of the Dardanelles with another English traveller; while loitering about, he all at once lost his English servant, a humorous creature, worthy of such a master. After some search, H— was found in the bazars, dancing a minuet with a tall tame pelican; no ways disconcerted at their approach, he finished his dance, and then with a ball-room bow, he took his partner by the wing, and, with a mincing gait, led her to take refreshments at a neighbouring kibaub shop. The solemn Turks almost died of laughter, and the roar that arose from the bazar could be inferior only to that of the Dardanelles battery, when Baron de Tott fired his great gun!

A DISAPPOINTED SUITOR.

A certain titled gentleman is said to have lately refused a young lady (his junior by about twenty-four years) under the following circumstances:—The parents of the lady in question not having an idea, from the gentleman's superiority of years, that an attachment subsisted between them, very naturally and very innocently, encouraged his visits to their house as an agreeable friend. At length he made his proposals, which were accepted, as it is averred; but Sir E— D—, after having put the first important query to the lady of his choice, thought proper to put a second, and, as it will be seen, to him an equally important one, to her father, which in plain English amounted to this:—"How much is your daughter to have?" "Ten thousand pounds now," replied the gentleman, "and ten thousand more upon my demise." "Is that all?" cried the elderly inamorato, with a look in which astonishment and disappointment struggled strongly for pre-eminence. "All, I assure you," said the father—"I can give her no more." "Well, then," replied Sir E—, "that being the case, I have only to say, that we can proceed no further in this affair; for a girl with only twenty thousand pounds will never suit me!" The friends of the young lady inveigh bitterly against the disappointed gentleman; who, it is said, recrim-nates by "wondering" amongst his male acquaintance "how the girl could presume to encourage him, knowing her fortune to be no more twenty thousand pounds, and his own—nothing."

GUITAR PLAYING.

The guitar seems, at present, as favourite and fashionable an instrument with British amateur vocalists of all ranks and ages, as with the Spaniards. It is fair to presume that the Peninsular war has brought into vogue, of late years, this continental instrument, as well as the beautiful melodies adapted to it. Many officers in the army patronize the guitar, both in their own persons and in their families; and, amongst these, Lord S—n is, we understand, a distinguished performer on this instrument.

LARGE FORTUNES.

Sir Robert Peel has been elected high steward for the borough of Tamworth, in the place of his late father. It is said that the late Baronet allowed his eldest son twelve thousand pounds sterling per annum, his second son six thousand, his other sons three thousand pounds each, and his daughters one thousand five hundred each, and this immense property is to be divided in these proportions. He is said to have died worth two million five hundred thousand pounds. The will was proved on Friday in Doctors' Commons, and sworn to exceed one million, which bears the highest probate-duty (fifteen thousand pounds). The present Baronet is said to have come into possession of six hundred thousand pounds in landed property by the death of his father.

LADY SOUTHAMPTON'S JEWELS.

These jewels which were stolen about three months ago, have been discovered and returned to her ladyship in a singular manner. One day last week, Lord Southampton's gardener was digging in the shrubbery, and his spade struck against some hard substance. He carefully took up the mould, and actually found the whole of the valuable stolen property, with the exception of two finger rings of no considerable value.

DIAMONDS.

It is expected that diamonds, especially small ones, will shortly become less scarce, and consequently proportionably less valuable, since the late Burmese war has, it is said, put into British possession some rich mines of these gems, equal in hardness and water, and superior in size, to any that have yet graced the public or private collections of bijouterie in the kingdom.

LENDING JEWELS.

Some idea may be formed of the prevalence of the custom of letting out, or lending jewels for hire, and of the profit accruing from this mode of proceeding, by the following fact:—A lady, viewing a few days since the magnificent display of plate and jewellery appertaining to one of our principal metropolitan jewellers, observed, amongst other splendid articles, a diamond necklace worth seventy-five thousand pounds sterling. On inquiring whether a purchaser was likely to be found for this extensive trinket, the person who shewed the jewellery, replied: "No, madam; we cannot hope for such a thing; but our money is returned to us, and with interest too, and by merely letting out articles like these, which the first nobility in the kingdom cannot be ashamed to hire, because their purchase would employ, for almost each, a fortune!" 1b.

GAITIES OF THE COURT OF GEORGE III.

The consort of George III. had an almost insatiable love of diamonds and lace. I remember that for years after the court given upon her wedding day, nothing was talked of but her majesty's diamond tiara and her diamond stomacher. A tiara at that day required almost a mine to ornament it; for ladies then wore toupets and "systems," or a frame work of hair, compared to which a grenadier's cap, in point of size, is as a wart to Ossa! On the Monday following, their majesties, in chairs, a splendid cavalcade, went to the theatre. The queen wore this much celebrated stomacher, the diamonds of which had cost fifty thousand pounds, and the centre brilliant alone had cost ten thousand pounds; an enormous sum considering the relative value of money at that period.

Then came the splendid fête given in the park by Miss Chudleigh, afterwards the too-famous duchess of Kingston, and the duke of Richmond's masquerade, and the illuminated fête of prodigious cost, with which the queen so suddenly surprised the king, that it was not until two scenes were thrown back at ten at night, and exhibited the illuminated gardens, bridge, and temple, that he had any idea but that of passing a domestic evening. But the grand coup that evening was an illuminated dessert, which appeared almost like magic after the supper.

When the king recovered from his first mental disorder in 1766, the queen's favourite, the countess of Northumberland, gave a fête at the Mansion, at Charing Cross, beyond what modern times can imagine. Pyramids and columns of spiral flames rose among the trees, and there was a diamond necklace of lamps suspended from two lace columns, or obelisks of flame, whilst little bands of music, dressed in every species of costume, were fantastically interspersed in every direction. Count de Guernsey, the French ambassador, tried to rival this exhibition, and his plan was to stud the whole front of his spacious mansion in Soho Square as thickly as possible with lamps.

I faintly recollect the great ball given by the queen to the king of Denmark, when her majesty "kept it up" to four in the morning, and the king frolicked with us lads and lasses with a heart revelling in young delight. And then, only a fortnight after, the king of Denmark gave a splendid masquerade to "the nobility and gentry of England" at the Opera House. The queen had a prejudice against masquerades, and would not be present, nor would she suffer her royal consort to go; but the king was gay of heart, and cunning, and he contrived to accompany his two brothers and sister, and by sitting in a box enclosed with shutters, he enjoyed the scene to his heart's content without his presence being known. How he accounted to the queen for this breach of discipline and obedience I know not, but it occasioned many quizzical jokes amongst us "youngsters." This juvenile fête was the happy prelude to many more at the palaces, and to many imitations of them by the nobility.

It was, I think, (for I am growing old, and my memory begins to fail me,) but I think it was in 1789, that her majesty gave a grand gala in honour of the king's recovery. The cards to the young sporting nobility prescribed that they were to be dressed in the Windsor uniform; but some hoaxer persuaded the grave Lords Camden, Mansfield, Loughborough, and other old and learned lords, that the Windsor uniform was indispensable to all; and when their majesties saw Lord Camden enter with a dress so outré for his age and learned profession, they could scarcely contain themselves. "What, what, what! Camden, Camden, leave the law and turn Nimrod!" cried his majesty, joking the old lord. Lord Thurlow was not to be hoaxed, and he appeared in his old brown coat and wig, and speckled stockings.

The king and queen visited the nobility familiarly, and were at the grand fête given by the French Ambassador in Portman Square, and at the still more superb gala given by the Ambassador of Spain at Ranelagh. At this entertainment, the Rotunda was lighted by magic flames issuing out of innumerable gold filigree baskets, whilst two hundred footmen, superbly dressed, waited on the company. The world spoke much of her majesty's diamonds. Many magnificent presents of them had been made to her, particularly by the Turkish Ambassador; and the celebrated present of diamonds to the king by the Nizam, exceeded any thing known in Europe. These were the days of parure. Dresses were more varied and elaborate, and better adapted for the display of costly jewellery. Her majesty, on some occasions, seemed a stream of liquid light, dazzling all beholders.

But the devices of the table were then more ingenious and beautiful. There was a mode of making running streams of pellucid jelly, with coruscations of light from the bottom, reflected by floating objects, that was very beautiful, though it has been laid aside.

The last, or nearly the last royal fête I was ever at, was the memorable and splendid one given by his late majesty in 1806, on his taking up his permanent residence at Windsor. There was the new service of plate, which had just cost thirty thousand pounds sterling; and there were the curious silver candellabras and chandeliers, with the silver tables, which had been saved from Hanover at the invasion of the French; and, to match these, were the silver tables of William III. and Queen Anne, and a great deal of the old plate of Henry VIII. About five hundred persons were present. The king's table used nothing but gold plate, whilst only silver was permitted at the side tables. Between two hundred and fifty and two hundred and sixty dozen of silver plates were used on this occasion.

NIGHT.

Day follows night; and night
The dying day.—Young.

THERE is a beauty, a marked benevolence of design in the alternations of the seasons. If man's years were all summer, all sunshine, all flowers, his mind would become languid and enervate, and the energies which spring from his nobler passions, would no longer set him apart as the lord of creation. If the desolation of a lasting winter prevailed, he would grow gloomy and unsocial; his sympathies would become less active and endearing, and the sweet buds of affection would rarely, if ever, put forth their blossoms. The monotony which would accompany the continuance of any one season, would render life more a burden than a blessing. So singular is the constitution of humanity, its strange blending of contrasts, the union of material inertness with the ever-restless activity of mind, that an enduring state of tempest or tranquillity would be insupportable. In the one case we should sink down from listlessness, in the other from excitement. Another kind provision in the revolution of the seasons is the guarded and preparatory change which takes place in their succession. In this there is no abruptness. Nature is not taken unawares in any of her departments. So nicely graduated is their approach that the transition from one to the other is almost imperceptible. Spring turns from the winter like an affectionate child from the arms of a stern, yet endeared parent, lingering and looking back with tears and smiles, till at last she is folded from sight in the embraces of summer. In the lapse of a few weeks the leafy gorgeousness of the latter season attains its perfection, and then a change as of decline steals over the voluptuous paradise, till at length its blossomed beauties are gently supplanted by the more substantial decorations of autumn. These, in their turn, are destined to wax and wane and pass away; and winter shall fill their places with his rude, yet not unpleasant creations. Still in all this variation from one extreme to another, there is, as I have before hinted, no broad line of demarcation. The months, as it were, run into one another, and their union forms an unbroken circle, within whose boundary the "busy hours" reveal their magic and their spells. In fact it would be impossible to draw such a line, for we cannot precisely determine when one season terminates and another commences; and therefore their divisions must be rather arbitrary than natural. But suppose the year were divided into four uniform periods—suppose that upon the tender and half-opened buds of April the sunshine of August should descend in all its withering effulgence, or that the chilling blasts of February should follow immediately on the warm serenity of one of our Indian-summer afternoons—and how melancholy would be the result!

The same regularity of concurrence accompanies the interchange of day and night. First darkness, then the gray dawn, then the rosy-tinted morning, and by-and-by, succeeds the full rich radiance of noon; then, as the sun declines, the light lessens in intensity, till the crimson twilight, the shadowy evening, and, at last, the over-brooding night again reveal their individual glories as they pass in review before us. Beautiful, very beautiful is the "coming on" of day and night! But though there is a similarity in the imagery they present, the feelings they awaken in the spectator are widely different. As he looks to the brightening east, a thrill as of gladness comes over him; for there is something animating in the reflection that around him a world is rising from its slumbers to renew its multifold and varied tasks—something stirring in the thought that presently he has to rush to its thronged arena to struggle with the bold and the haughty, the crafty and the powerful, for whatever prize ambition shall proffer as the recompense of the victorious. So reckless is the pride of his nature, that he can rejoice in the prospect, and exult in the approach of the tumult in which he is about to mingle. Not such, however, are his sensations when the day's commotions are ended, and he watches the setting sun as he sinks down like a dying monarch upon his couch of crimson and gold. The excitement of the morning has vanished, and, perhaps, his heart is now drooping from disappointment and the sickness of "hope deferred." He beholds in the gorgeous and fading clouds the likeness of those visions which at dawn showed so winningly, and whose brightness, experience now teaches him, shone but to mock his credulity. Yet he withdraws not his gaze, for the melancholy which accompanies it is not unpleasant, and the memories awakened by those passing glories, like dreams of recovered treasures, are not without their solace.

I have read of the beauties of Italian skies, but I cannot believe that they surpass our own. What, for instance, could be more charming than the sunset which we here witnessed about a year since, when, for nearly an hour, the whole western half of the horizon was one arch of the brightest crimson? Though such a scene is rather rare in our immediate vicinity, yet in the interior, and particularly in the mountainous districts of New England, it occurs almost every day. At Williamstown, the Chamouni of Massachusetts, scarcely an evening sets in without the most beautiful accompaniment of rainbow-tinted clouds. I never marked the changes of their forms or colouring without calling to mind the following lines which I have somewhere seen, and which, though fanciful, are nevertheless descriptive of those beautiful creations:

Bright are its skies and waters, rich its clouds
In all the tints of light, superbly rich;
And oft in trance of thought by fancy charmed,
While gazing on their gorgeous minarets,
I've deemed that dimly through the blue serene
Heaven's radiant palaces of glory shone;
Or that angelic architects, to please
The good with visions of their future home,
Those mansions emblematical had reared.

There is a tranquillizing influence in the scenes which usher in the approach of evening. The vesper notes of the birds exhibit less of the vivacity of joyousness, and fall upon the ear with a plaintive and sweeter cadence. The flowers fold up their delicate petals—the clouds lie listlessly along the horizon, and the air, which the bustle of day has filled with strange noises, becomes hushed as if for sleep. Now and then a sound interrupts the general quiet of the scene as the milk-maid or the homeward-bound reaper strikes into some familiar household song, or the zephyr rustles the leafy branches, or freights his wing with the low music of the distant water-fall; but the continuance is momentary, and serves as a pleasing contrast to the deepening stillness. At such an hour it seems as if universal nature were drawing her curtains for a dreamy and deep rest. Then is the season for contemplation—the time to turn aside from the haunts of mirth, for those purifying enjoyments which solitude alone can minister. Ye in whose bosoms still linger the stormy and unhallowed passions which day has excited, come forth to the shadowy twilight, and a portion of its serenity shall fall like a heavenly influence upon your spirits. The stern necessities of your lot shall for awhile be forgotten amid the soothing images which evening gathers around you. Ye shall no longer feel the weariness of toil—no longer groan under the stern tasks of morning or mid-day—no longer remember the harrowings of scorn, or contumely, or oppression, for evening bath an "oblivious antidote" for all your sufferings. Yea, come forth to the moonlit lawns and the forest dells, and the tranquillity which reigns throughout their seclusions shall again be yours.

For myself, the night has more charms than all other seasons united. Immure me in a dungeon—shut from my view the beauties of morning—the "pomp and circumstance" which attend the glorious sun through all his course; but do not, oh! do not deny me the free enjoyments of the blessed night. Starry and stilly night! for me thou hast a solace and a spell, and I welcome thy return as the weary and heart-sick slave hails the return of the Sabbath, whose hallowed recurrence frees him for a season from the scourge, and bondage, and loathsome presence of his task-master. Would that I had the wings of a spirit, that I might circle with thee the revolving earth, and dwell for ever in its far-reaching and "shadowy cone." Thy presence hath for me a Lethæan influence, and as I gaze upon the mysterious decorations of thy peaceful domain, the anxieties which the bustle and turmoil of day have gathered to my bosom are banished as by the visitation of an angel. The peacefulness of life's morning hour steals over me again while musing on thy magnificent, thy sublime presentations. The spirit forgets her humiliating alliance with the sordid and inert dust, as imagination snatches it aloft, and on, far on

"Beyond the planets and remoter spheres,
And orbs that in their blue abysses gleam,
Like ocean diamonds brightly, yet unseen,
Till earth's wide globe gleams out, a little star,
And, in the deep'ning azure, fades away.
There on ethereal plains, mid mingled hosts
Of cherubim and seraphim that strike
Their golden harps around th' Eternal's throne,
She bends in silent awe, till half assured,
She catches the high strain and asks a lyre." PROTEUS.

WHAT IS LAW LIKE?—Law is like a country dance; people are led up and down in it till they are fairly tired out. Law is like a book of surgery—there are a great many terrible cases in it. It is like physic too, they that take the least of it are best off. It is like a homely gentleman, "very well to follow;" and like a scolding wife, very bad when it follows us. Law is like a new fashion, people are bewitched to get into it, "and like bad weather," most people are glad to get out of it.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

July 10, 1830.

DEAR SIR—The unusual heat of the weather, during the last week, having put my ideas somewhat in confusion, I concluded to exchange the dreary associations of my closet for the purer air and sublimer scenery of Schooley's Mountain. Bundling up, therefore, a scanty wardrobe, sufficient for the excursion, I was soon on my way.

It was late in the afternoon of a sultry day when I arrived, by the usual rout, at "Belmont Hall," which stands by itself upon the very summit of the mountain. Having determined to remain a few days, I ordered a room and some refreshments, and after the sun had abated somewhat of his fervour, took a stroll towards "Budd's lake," to enjoy the freshness and cloudless beauty of the evening. It was an old and favourite spot; and when a man is thrown, either by chance or design, into solitude, he loves to choose his trees and shades; and even the stones upon which he reclines become objects of emotion to him, and contribute to his enjoyment. The last rays of the sun yet lingered upon the mountain top. At intervals there was a faint yellow light upon the bosom of the waters, but it was rapidly dying away; and in the distance, the winding shore began to be lost in the gathering twilight. There was something strikingly beautiful in the thin veil in which nature had shrouded her boldest works, enhancing, by the very obscurity in which she had wrapped them, the value of their attributes. Suddenly the measured sound of an oar fell on my ear, but it was long heard in the stillness before I could determine from whence it proceeded. At length a little boat entered the cove, and came alongside the rudely constructed pier upon which I stood, when those whom it had brought leaped joyously ashore. Some trifling civilities which it was in my power to render them, soon made us acquainted, and we proceeded together to the hall. The party consisted of a lady and two gentlemen, the former being sister of one of the latter. They were natives of the south, and were, for the first time, enjoying the wild and untamed scenes of nature which abound in these regions. Their conversation soon enabled me to perceive that fortune and respectable birth were to be considered as among their least valuable possessions. But the lady! "she was a thing of morn," sparkling with all the light and life of early spring. Seldom have I seen a step so elastic, a form so beautiful, and a face so radiant with the uninterrupted play of soul. It is needless to talk of all "the lesser graces" of a lovely woman; these may constitute parts of beauty, but we could as easily form a conception of the appearance of a watch by looking at its wheels, as of the human countenance from a description of its individual features. I "have long loved pretty women with a poet's feeling;" and it is enough for me to say that Caroline W. was the first being who ever taught me to suspect that the colourings of romance—the gay picturings of a sunny imagination, might not always be too highly overwrought. If, by chance, this letter should ever fall under her eye, she will, perhaps, for a moment recall the stranger who was so accidentally thrown in her way, though I am sure she will not thank him for the portrait he has here drawn of her.

My new friends had intended to visit the excavations which are going on upon the line of the Morris Canal (taking a peep at the bones of the mammoth, on the way) the next morning; but hearing of my resolution to see the sun rise upon a romantic cascade in the neighbourhood, and witness the beautiful rainbows which are formed in its spray, they entered largely into the same views, and after an early supper we retired to rest, having previously settled that we should set out together by daybreak. We slept soundly, notwithstanding the sultriness of the weather, until awakened by the servant, upon whom it had been enjoined to call us at four. Rising immediately, I hastened to the breakfast parlour. Caroline was already there, and it was not long before her brother and his friend joined us, and the guides, who were to accompany us, were waiting without.

"We have a pony for the lady," said the landlord of Belmont Hall, bowing, as we descended the stairs, "if she would like to ride down the hill. The road is somewhat rough, but Kate is sure-footed as a dog."

"Had you not better accept his offer," said her brother. "Oh! fie on you, Charles! you will positively spoil all. Can you really suppose I have so little of the heroine about me as to be carried over this glorious mountain on the unpoetical back of Kate? See! the sky is brightening in the east, and we delay too long: we shall miss the sight."

It was in vain to urge her further, and we left Kate in the stable, to dream of green grass and butter-cups, unmolested.

and were soon on our way with buoyant steps and merry hearts. We rested only twice in our progress—once at the spring, whose clear water gushed out from a fissure in the rock, and again upon a natural seat, which is made by the branch of a half uprooted tree. As we proceeded, the rapture of my southern friends knew no bounds. The morning was remarkably favourable, and we could see every thing in its clear and mellow light. Until we reached the summit "where the proud rush of waters meets the sky," the dashing of the stream formed the principal object of attention, except that now and then we were able to catch a glimpse at the valley of the Muscongonk, studded with hamlets farm-houses, and the substantial evidences of comfort and independence. Indeed we pity the man who can

"—on that mountain stand,
Nor feel the prouder of his native land."

But when we gained the eminence, the omnipotence of nature burst at once upon the enraptured soul! How can my pen describe that unutterably sublime amphitheatre of towering and terraced mountains, rising, one behind another, in endless perspective, till the eye, by resting upon them, becomes bewildered and confused with a reverential awe of the majesty of nature—or by gazing on the dashing of the water-fall, shuts out the material universe from the mind to make room for the vast and mighty conceptions of "Him who weigheth the mountains in a balance," and "measurcth the waters in the hollow of his hand?"

We returned to the hall, and in a few more hours we parted, as if we never had met. I saw the beautiful girl and her young lover enter the carriage together. She waived her hand to me as I stood upon the piazza, and I watched the vehicle till it wound round a point which concealed it and the fair lady from my view, perhaps for ever. I thought, though it might be only fancy, that a shade of melancholy occasionally gathered on her brow; but she had mingled much with the world, and why should I wonder that sorrow had visited her bosom? I am alike ignorant of her story and her fate; and I think of her only as an image of loveliness which has crossed my path, and which, having seen, I shall never forget.

In closing this letter, I am in duty bound to say to such of your friends as contemplate an excursion this summer, that I know of no place of amusement preferable to Schooley's Mountain. Health and recreation are to be enjoyed there to the fullest extent; and it is due to Mr. Bowne, of Belmont Hall, to observe that his guests were greatly pleased with the order and attention which predominated at his mansion, and the assiduous attention of Mrs. Bowne to her female boarders. At Belmont Hall, as early in the season as it is, I found the throng of fashion fast gathering, and I was not long in recognising the bright eyes of many a fair belle to whom my willing heart had erst paid obeisance in Broadway; and there too were several of your gayest bucks, and the choice spirits of the day. And no wonder, if good society, a generous table, choice wines, fishing, and sporting of every kind, spacious and airy rooms, and a studious desire to satisfy one's wishes and pleasures, superadded to magnificent and romantic scenery, pure and elastic air, and the chalybeate waters of the spring at Schooley's Mountain, are appreciated.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE TWO GRAVES.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

THE cabin of George Davis was constructed in the rudest style of back-woods architecture. It was composed of unhewn logs, placed together at the ends, after the manner in which children build their houses of jackstraws. The door consisted of a few oaken shingles, or clap-boards, fastened together with wooden pins, and suspended on hinges of the same material; and the roof, composed of similar clap-boards, was kept in its place by long and heavy logs, placed lengthwise of the building, and at short intervals from each other. The inhabitant of the more stately and convenient edifices of cities, who has never witnessed the privations and discomforts of the modes of frontier life, may smile at our brief description of George Davis's abode; but in such rude and simple dwellings thousands of their fellow-creatures in the western states reside, and find their narrow and unartificial habitations amply sufficient for the great purpose of existence—happiness. The truth of the hacknied line of Goldsmith, "Man wants but little here below," is beautifully illustrated by the lives of many of those back-woodmen, who show how very little may suffice to administer to the real necessities of "unaccommodated man."

The family of George Davis consisted of a wife and an only child, a girl now verging on her eighteenth year. The latter, without being positively beautiful, possessed a rare combination of charms. Her unsophisticated and artless manners, which plainly indicated the seclusion in which she had lived, were formed from nature's teaching, and were not the less attractive on that account. The tinge which her cheeks, originally very fair, had received from exposure to the sun, rather enhanced than diminished her beauty; and her large black eyes, which usually glowed with that kind of brightness which has been aptly termed the sunshine of the heart, gave great animation to features of otherwise rather a pensive cast.

George Davis, on the evening to which our story alludes, had been sometime returned to his cabin, and his thoughts had wandered into a more agreeable channel than that which was occasioned by the sight of the arrival of emigrants near his secluded abode, when he was suddenly startled by a low tapping at his door, which directly after opened, and disclosed to him one of the party he had lately seen upon the beach. The stranger was the same whom he had noticed wandering apart from the others, and there was something in his appearance and deportment which drove back the scowl that had begun to settle on George Davis's brow. He was a young man, apparently not more than twenty-four or twenty-five years old. His countenance was prepossessing, and except that it was darkened by an expression of deep melancholy, was of a high character of manly beauty. His dress, to a more practised eye than the backwood-man's, would have denoted him to be a nautical man; and from his erect carriage, a certain air of command, and other indications, it might have been inferred that he was an officer of the navy. On throwing open the door he apologised for his intrusion, and in a few words explained its cause.

"In yonder boat at the beach," said he in a low tone, and with a voice in which a nice ear might have detected a faltering, notwithstanding that he evidently strove to speak with calmness and composure—"In yonder boat a young female, in whom I have the deepest interest, lies at the point of death. I came to crave from you the shelter of your cottage for her, that means may more effectually be applied to restore her, or, at least, that she may die in a place of greater quietness than yonder boat with its noisy crew affords."

Before the stranger had half finished his appeals George Davis was on his feet, and ready to accompany him.

"It's a poor sort of shelter this cabin of mine," said he, "and I'm fearful you will find Alice and Mary but poor nurses, for, thank heaven, they haven't been necessitated to have much experience in that way; but if kindness can do the poor woman any good, she will not lack it at their hands, and, at any rate, you are right welcome to what you ask. So let us to the beach, and see what way we can bring the sick lady here."

The female, concerning whom the stranger appeared thus anxious, was a young creature, scarcely more than nineteen, though sickness had already so worn her lovely countenance that even that estimate might have been too great. She had been seized with a fever descending the Ohio river, and the disease had been accelerated and augmented by the exposure to which she was subject in the miserable vessel. A heavy rain had occurred in the previous night, from which the roof of the moving boat afforded but a very inadequate defence, and the water had dripped through its crevices, and found its way, despite of all the anxious care of her companion, into her birth. From the time that she was first taken sick, the stranger had never left her bed-side, except occasionally to look along the banks of the river, in the hope of seeing a habitation, to which she might be transferred. The persons with whom she was descending the Ohio river were rude emigrants, who had nothing in common with himself; he had merely taken passage with them, and they already began to tire of the bargain, which subjected them to the inconveniences and restraints necessarily incident to their having a sick female in their cabin. It was with pleasure, therefore, that they had heard the stranger announce his intention of leaving them at the first habitation they should reach, and their eyes as well as his dwelt often on the banks of the river, in the hope of decrying some human abode. The smoke of George Davis's cabin was the first that had saluted their sight. The discovery was quickly communicated to the stranger, who was wandering, in a state of mind but little to be envied, along the beach; and, on hearing it, he immediately hastened to the door, to make the application which we have recorded.

The suffering female was conveyed with all possible care to the lowly abode, and placed on a bed in an inner apartment of the hut, which had hitherto been occupied by the daughter, whom we have faintly described. Mary hovered about her couch, and assiduously administered all those little and valuable attentions which are naturally suggested by the delicacy of a female mind. She wiped the flushed cheek and high pale forehead of the patient, whom fever had rendered delirious; shaded her large blue eyes, bright with unnatural lustre, from the light of the lamp which had been placed in the apartment, and strove, by every method in her power, to alleviate her situation. George Davis himself, throwing his rifle, his constant companion wherever he went, over his shoulder, and whistling to his dog, set off on a narrow trail through the woods towards the cabin of his nearest neighbour, where he proposed getting a horse, and riding to the distant village for medical aid. But medical aid in the case of the delirious female was destined to be of no avail. Through the whole of the night her fever continued with unabated fury, and, from time to time, low whisperings, half murmured sentences, and once or twice a slight laugh, followed by weeping and broken speech, as of one earnestly imploring some boon, indicated that the mind of the sufferer was wandering far away from the realities of her situation. Towards morning her fever subsided, and she fell into a short and quiet sleep. Her dreams, if any she had, seemed of a happy nature, for a sweet smile played on her wan lips, and just before she awoke one of those softly-modulated sighs, which sometimes escape from a heart overfraught with felicity, stole from her bosom. As she lay thus, in the feeble light which the lamp threw over her pale countenance, the rich clusters of her dark hair rendering her cheeks still more pale by contrast, and her delicate form already much attenuated by the wasting sickness which was consuming her, she scarcely seemed like a being of earth, but rather an inhabitant of that spiritual world, on the very confines of which in truth she stood. The stranger sat all night by her bed-side, and gazed upon her with an eye that never wandered from her features for a single instant. By one skilled in reading the human countenance unutterable things might have been traced in the workings of his features; but by no word or sigh or sign did he betray to those around him the character of his emotions. It had been taken for granted that his relation to the sufferer was such as to warrant his remaining continually at her side; but whether he was her husband or brother, had not been asked. The western country people have but a small portion of that curiosity concerning the personal affairs of others, which so strongly distinguishes the inhabitants of the eastern states, and which, indeed, is one of the causes of that dislike to those whom they denominate Yankees, that even at the early period of our narrative had begun to display itself. It was seen that the fate of the female, in whatever relation she stood to the stranger, was a matter of the deepest interest to him; and, in the wanderings of her mind, the word most frequently on her lips, sometimes coupled with endearing epithets, was evidently the name of him who remained so anxiously by her couch.

The light of the rising sun was on the tops of the highest trees, and the ten thousand birds of the forest were hailing his approach with their matin song, when the female awoke. The delirium had passed away with her slumber, and as her eyes now wandered around the cabin, and rested for a brief moment on each of its inmates, she seemed at once to comprehend the circumstances of her situation. To Mrs. Davis, who with motherly solicitude was smoothing her pillow, she extended her wan hand, and by a faint smile communicated the thanks she was too weak to utter; and Mary, the interesting daughter of the back-woodman, also read in a glance the acknowledgment that was due to her kindness. With the quick eyes of female delicacy she saw, or thought she saw, likewise, in the look that then rested on the stranger, a desire to be alone with him, and withdrawing her mother from the apartment, they both busied themselves for a considerable time in the outer room of the cottage. During a great portion of this period a low murmuring sound, as of the faint voice of the female, and an equally low but shriller voice in reply, as if of the stranger answering in whispers, met their ears. After a while total silence succeeded, which was in a few moments interrupted by a deep groan. They both hurried into the apartment. The sight which then presented itself was distressing in the extreme. The female stranger was no more. Her spirit had apparently exhaled without a sigh, for her features were as composed as an infant's in slumber, and a sweet smile still lingered on her wan lips, which were slightly parted, as if life had passed while some word of love was just leaving her tongue. Her companion, who had been kneeling by her bed-side, seemed wholly unconscious of the intrusion of the family of the honest back-woodman. His cheek was ashy pale; his eyes, distended and tearless, were riveted on the breathless object before him, whose hand was strongly clasped in his; and his whole appearance denoted the most absorbing mental agony. The good matron and her daughter stood for some moments silent spectators of the scene, not daring to interrupt the awful silence with what they felt would be their vain attempt to comfort the bereaved individual, who had probably lost the dearest, perhaps the only dear object in the world. At length the stranger, apparently restored to consciousness, started to his feet, and made a strong effort to regain composure. He turned with a mild look to the two females, who, with a mingled feeling of awe and grief, stood aloof, and seemed afraid or unwilling to approach more nearly; and in a subdued and gentle voice, which still, however, quivered with irrepressible emotion, bade them draw near, and behold the lifeless form of one who, while living, had no equal in the world.

"Cold, cold already," said he, as he wrung the attenuated hand which now, for the first time, returned no answering pressure; "cold, cold already; and in a few brief hours the form which I have so loved to clasp, the eyes on which my eyes have gazed, as if they could look through them into her very heart; and they could, for her soul was ever in her face. The lips on which my lips have been pressed so oft and so fondly, all will be laid to rest within the bosom of the earth. Oh, while I had thee by my side—thy voice to cheer, thy counsel to guide, thy happiness to care for, the world, bleak and barren as it is, had charms enough. What was poverty to me? Thy lips uttered no complaint. What was disgrace? Thou still confided in my honour. What was the scorn of the proud and the hate of the prejudiced, while thy smile always greeted me, and thy unchanging love more than compensated for the enmity of the world. What art thou now?" (And, as he spoke, the hand which he had hitherto continued to hold dropped heavily down.) "Nothing, nothing! The earth-worm will soon banquet on those dear features—the clod soon press those delicate limbs, and the rank grass of this lonely and vainly luxuriant region wave above thy narrow bed. Approach," said the stranger, turning again to Alice and Mary, who comprehended him rather by his tone than his incoherent language, and who still stood somewhat aloof, intimidated by his glaring eye and quivering lip; "approach, and do the last offices of kindness for the most peerless of her sex." As he spoke thus he rushed out of the cabin, and striking deep into the woods, was soon lost to sight.

LIGHT READING.

FROM THE NEW-YORK AMERICAN.

We give the following characteristic note, with the accompanying document, exactly as we received them; for, even if disposed to "demur" at the broadness of some of Mr. Pettigrew's partner's jokes,—as the lady says in Vivian Grey,—"how can one refine, when the thermometer is at ninety?"

Editor of the New-York American.—Sir—Upon turning over a piece of foolscap this morning, upon one side of which I was drafting a war, I found that my partner had drawn up the enclosed bill of particulars on the other. By way of punishing such a departure from legal usages, I send you the draft without giving him an opportunity of engrossing a fair copy. So, if there should happen to be any thing in it to which your fastidious taste demurs, you must even amend it for yourself. I am sir, your obedient servant,
VALENTINE PETTIGREW.

DIARY OF A HEATED ATTORNEY.

MONDAY MORNING, FIVE O'CLOCK A. M.—Half awake—some inclination to get up; bed feeling as if it were warmed like Will Waddle's, by a baker's oven; endured the genial warmth an hour longer in spite of milkman, baker and patent-sweeper, who were performing a trio in the street under my window.

SIX O'CLOCK.—Hotter and hotter. Agreeably entertained by the buzzing of a score of blue-bottles, and most amazingly titillated by their lighting ever and anon upon my nose. Tried desperately to annihilate one or two, succeeded in blacking my own eye. Mortal could no longer stand or rather lie it, forced to be up betimes, rose, with a ——— at the insects and phe—w, felt as if I had been dribbled through a pipe-stem.

SEVEN.—About half dressed, awful work. Mem.—I have to make a call this morning; looked for a collar with double starch, found one which a man might have broke his shin over—determined that it would, at all events, last out the morning.

EIGHT.—Breakfast—toast and salmon—coffee, steam and flies. Mem.—Butter all gravy and flies not cooked—queer, which is worst, the pestering insects or the labour of whisking them?—finished half a cup—sat half an hour to cool—pulling on boots terrible. Mem.—to buy boot-hooks with long handles—ready to go out—all out of the window looking like the inside of a steam boiler—made my mind up to the attempt—last peep in the looking glass. O Venus! my collar all dicky, pendant over my stock like a wet towel hung over a fence to dry.

NINE.—Arrived at my office—windows shut—atmosphere gives a very good idea of the interior of the crater of Vesuvius—let out a little of the heat and darkness, as Pat says—quills, wafers, dust, parchment, and pigeon holes—pretty prospect, but not quite so refreshing as that from Cattakill mountain—at least just now. Three letters to write and a bill in chancery to finish—letters to be carried two miles to the gentleman who has undertaken to forward them—partner out of town, and no postponement possible—rare anticipation—gives one some idea of the feelings of a heretic on the eve of an auto-da-fé.

ELEVEN.—Hotter and hotter—peeped at thermometer, ninety-two—tried portwine and water as a cooler—unsuccessful, came through the pores of my skin as if I had been a canvass bag. Bar-room crowded, steam rising in more ways than one. Standing near the post-office, felt an unusual warmth in my left shoulder, turned to ascertain the cause, and found myself almost in contact with an old gentleman whose nose was redshot—removed from such an inflammable neighbourhood in all haste.

TWELVE.—Set out on my walk. Vulcan protect me—thought of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, and compared myself to Bonaparte in Moscow. Saw a scorched bird's wing lying in the gutter—poor creature, no doubt it had been consumed in its own element, and perished on its rapid course like a moth in a candle. Felt my hat crisping into a cinder, and watched my shoes smoking like slow-matches.

ONE.—Found my friend at home—Sorry I had endured so much trouble; had changed his mind, and was not going—Knew a friend who was; lived only a mile off—pleasant consummation: no remedy, however—comfortable reflection. On my return, saw several people gazing at a large puddle of water; inquired and learned that three young ladies and their fat mamma had just melted away: how lamentable—Thought of Arethusa and the sisters of Pheton—Mean to compose a sonnet on the subject when the weather cools.

TWO.—Thermometer ninety-two and a half. Spent an hour in trying to find the coolest corner of the office—couldn't find it. Took off coat and stock; found my collar all gone: curious effect of heat. Looked out of the window, and saw two little boys fighting for a fan. Wondered if it were any cooler on the water; wished I dare venture out to try. Tried to cool myself by thinking of Alpine scenery, islands of ice, sleigh riding, the North Pole, and Miss ———, whose presence would now be a desirable thing; I never would have believed it before; for she would be an excellent refrigerator: but "who can hold fire in his hand by thinking of the frosty Caucasus!"

THREE.—Dinner: horrible idea. Sat down to the task like Hercules to his labours: meat too rare: took a slice, and found before I could eat it, that it was thoroughly done. Like to died of thirst, not being able to drink as the liquid turned to steam before I could swallow it. Every body at table looking as if they as well as the joint, had just come out of the pot. Asked to wine by ———: inadvertently took brandy: never discovered the mistake except by the smell—found my corporeal substances so thoroughly imbued with caloric, that the mustard and pepper lost all taste to me. Dedent, an attempt at ice-cream, vastly like a raw custard—custards of the consistency of crumbled cheese, the liquid part having evaporated. Tried to say a civil thing to Miss ———; couldn't do it; broke down in the middle—reception of my compliment the first cool thing I had felt all day.

FIVE.—Nap—dreamed I was a great snow-ball in a thaw; awaked by a gentleman wanting to see me—gentleman proved to be a dealer in old coats; ——— him out of the house; tried to sleep again—wouldn't do. Thermometer down to eighty-eight—finding the weather grow cool, changed dress, "went out a walking;" visited Blood—found the female part of his household fanning themselves—told me that they had used up fifteen fans a-piece during the day.

SEVEN.—Tea did the business for my second shirt collar. Chat, scandal, and claret and water—thermometer falling—found the end of my nose dry and growing pale—good sign.

NINE.—Hour of love—felt as if no additional flames were necessary—kept civil and cool.

TEN.—Thermometer down to eighty—found myself gradually drying—ventured a tiff of Bramin, and an idea of water, and went home, wondering whether or no the devil had not been during the day making one of his permitted peregrinations to and fro on the face of the earth, or whether the expected comet's tail had not been sweeping over us like a fly-broom, or whether the sun had not caught fire, or Captain Symmes's internal world been consumed—and whether to-morrow would be any cooler.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

AMERICAN CUTLERY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the sneers of invidious foreign critics, the artists and mechanics of the United States may be safely pronounced equal if not superior to those of all other countries in the ingenuity of their inventions, the usefulness of their designs, and the excellence of their manufactures. Daily proofs of this are furnished, and many more would be forthcoming, were it not for the peculiar condition of our scattered population. An instance of this lately occurred in the development of the fact, that the Roskell watches, which have gained so much reputation and wealth for the English manufacturer with whose name they are identified, were actually the invention of an American, who accompanied Perkins, and who had not the means to succeed in making use of his own designs. Roskell accidentally saw the specimen of the American's manufacture, copied it, and has made his fortune by it. This, we hope, will not always be the case. We have lately seen some of the most perfect and ingenious products of the art of cutlery ever before exhibited in this country. They are the contrivance of Mr. Samuel J. Pooley, a native of this city. A small glass case contained a box, measuring four inches in length, two and a quarter in breadth, and one and a half in depth, in which were deposited about two hundred pieces, tastefully arranged, consisting of two complete dinner sets of knives and forks, one-third of a set with patent knife-sharpeners, a great variety of miscellaneous articles—a pen-knife, having ten different parts, and yet weighing only three-tenths of a grain—scissors, razors, and surgical instruments, &c. with pearl handles. There is a silver plate on the box, representing an eagle protecting the arts, commerce, and agriculture, enriched with thirteen stars, and bearing the following inscription:—"The pleasure I took to honour and advance my country."—Pliny. "If sceptic Europe is not lost to shame, the blush will be apparent." The whole is valued at twelve hundred dollars. Mr. Pooley leaves this city for Boston in a few days, and intends to establish his business there. He will, we are happy to hear, offer a public exhibition of his ingenious manufacture before his departure.

MUSIC.

In presenting to our musical readers the beautiful melody with which the Mirror of to-day is adorned, we have the pleasure to add the following remarks, by a friend well read in such lore:—Purcell, the British Orpheus, as he has been called, was a contemporary of Locke, who set the music of Macbeth. In Pepy's Memoirs—an admirable work, which throws much light on the times in which it was written—that gentleman, in his usual quaint manner, makes mention of a delightful evening spent in the society of Purcell, Locke, and other musicians of celebrity, in which he had the pleasure of hearing a variety of charming music executed in several different languages. How one longs for some kind "Little Genius," to usher him to the presence of such a soirée! Purcell has adorned the cathedral service of the church of England with music of the most sublime character; and his works of a dramatic description—for instance, his "Indian Queen," "Arthur and Emmeline," "The Tempest," &c.—are all extremely beautiful. His songs and cantatas are not less so—three pieces of the latter description are as fine as any compositions ever attempted at any period. I allude to those which describe the wanderings of insanity; one, entitled "Mad Bees," for a soprano voice; another, called "Mad Tom," for a bass voice; and "From Rosy Bowers," for a soprano. The last was written during the illness which ushered Purcell to the grave; and, like poor Weber and Mozart, or the fabled swan, his dying notes were the sweetest. He died young. The melody selected for this number of the Mirror, "Come unto these Yellow Sands," is perhaps as fine a specimen of the "multum in parvo," as any composer ever invented. The modulation is of the most simple kind, being little more than a change from the harmony of the tonic to that of the dominant and back; but a more beautiful invitation to parta e of song and dance was never conceived—and it is an invitation such as "the gentle Ariel" alone could offer to his mates; it precludes all possibility of pirouettes, jigs, jumps, or any species of tarantula-like motion; it demands a dance of Vestris-like attitude and refinement. In the London theatres during this song certain graceful sprites are introduced in the back ground of the scene, but at the Park theatre the stage-manager has, with excellent taste, left to the imagination that which he could not supply to the eye, preferring to give Ariel sole possession of the stage, chorused by invisible spirits, to the introduction of two or three hopping children, or cow-like Coriippes, who would be certain to mar all effect.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

Mrs. S. WHEATLEY has been acting and singing frequently since our last notice of theatricals. Romeo and Juliet has likewise been produced. The characters of Romeo and Mercutio by a Mr. Field and an amateur!

We decline criticism: on this occasion it would be much too warm work, with the thermometer at ninety. If young gentlemen have not the fear of offended propriety before their eyes, and if the lesson so admirably given by our predecessor C. has lost its effect, what can we add? But we are threatened with another "gentleman's first appearance on any stage," &c. This is too much. We must give Mr. Simpson a hint on the subject.

The Park theatre we consider our own proper place of recreation and amusement. There we expect sometimes to be excited to mirth, and occasionally to melancholy, by excellent representations of comedy and tragedy, for the worthy manager has an excellent company.

In the name of indignant Thespia, then, why allow his theatre, sanctified as it is by talent and taste, to be made the arena for every infatuated young man who wishes to expose himself? Can he find an example in either of the great patent theatres in London for such proceedings? We believe not. About three or four years ago there was an instance of a "gentleman" being so lost in admiration of himself, and so satisfied that he could do that on his first appearance which men of real talent strive to attain by the labour of years, that he gave to Mr. Price, the lessee of Drury-lane, several hundreds of pounds sterling, to bribe him, to allow an assault to be made on the English audience. Behold, the night arrived, the "gentleman" proved himself no actor, and after a fair trial he was lamentably, but properly, hissed off the stage. The affair did not rest there. The stage-manager, Mr. Wallack, was cited before the enraged people, and ordered to make an apology for the insult offered to the public; this Mr. Wallack in a manly manner refused to do, as calculated to injure the feelings of the individual, but he pledged himself that the public should not be so vexed again. Now be it understood, that out of consideration to the individuals we abstain from criticism, but our duty to the public calls upon us to point out to the manager the necessity for confining the first appearance of adventurous and stage-struck young gentlemen to proper places, where their studies and exhibitions may not usurp the place of the regular drama. The Bowery is without a tenant, let them take that house, and practise for their own amusement and the pleasure of those who may desire to witness their performance, but at least give the public one theatre in which they may be certain of a well acted play.

The philosophic Barnes took his benefit on Monday, and collected a more numerous audience than has been seen for some time. He did not make his appearance on a goose's back, as before; but still it is apparent that his great mind dwells on aquatic subjects, for he erected a fountain in the pit, thus providing for the cooling of his warm friends. We understand he contemplated at one moment an entire aquatic entertainment. In the first scene he was to have appeared swimming his goose to Handel's water music, in the last he proposed to appear in the character of Neptune, mounted and splashing on the great Newfoundland quadruped which belongs to the theatre. But it is necessary to be provident even in pleasure, for the most refined and intellectual amusements will weary the most intelligent and classical audience by repetition—however, we doubt not to see Barnes well rewarded at a future time, for a series of well-executed aquatic gambols.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Preface to Rokeby.—We have lately enjoyed a laugh with some of our friends of the sock and buskin, at the preface attached to the opera of Rokeby upon its first delivery to the manager of the Park theatre. We unexpectedly came across it in overlooking some old papers, and, recognising the hand of our favoured correspondent C., we devoured it without delay. It discovers the same original turn for drollery, the same dry humour and happy familiarity with language, which have characterized the rest of his productions. We present it to our readers as a little morceau, calculated to call up a smile; and they who are personally acquainted with the author will find in it much to bring him to their recollections. We may add that the slight value which he sets upon his own works will not lessen them in the public opinion. By the very richness of his materials he has been rendered often negligent of their arrangement and careless of their fate.—Notwithstanding Mr. C.'s estimation of Rokeby, and although it was thrown off without much effort, it is a piece of great merit.

"Encouraged by the number of good decent dramas that have at various times been 'damned,' and by the countless quantity of execrable ones that have succeeded, to believe that the public are no very profound judges of these matters, the author has committed the following pages. The plot, at least, (not being his own) he hopes is interesting, being taken from the celebrated poem of Rokeby, by Sir Walter Scott, (the great furnisher of the raw material for the present race of dramatic manufacturers.) The author has interspersed the piece with a few songs, in the shape of new words to old popular melodies, after the fashion of Rob Roy, Guy Mannering, &c.; though in this respect he has been rather sparing in his efforts, well knowing that should this drama ever be performed, and good singers appear in it, they will introduce just such songs as suit their taste and voice, without any regard to plot, dialogue, or propriety. On this head, however, he is not at all sensitive, and, should the lady who plays Matilda happen to be a favourite with the public, she may, if she pleases, introduce 'Nid, nid, noddin' as a prelude to her papa's execution. In other respects he is equally liberal, and if the piece can be carried through with success by the aid of scenery, machinery, bustle, singing, or any thing else, he professes the utmost indifference to the means so that the end be gained. And seriously, (allowing of course for the partiality of a parent towards his first born) he really thinks he has seen worse pieces, with the help of similar adventitious aid, go off with considerable eclat. Wherever the dialogue flags, a little fashionable swearing can be introduced ad libitum by the gentlemen of the sock and buskin, who have great judgment and experience in such matters."

Howard.—We do not intend to speak of the illustrious philanthropist who threaded the mazes of prison and lazar houses in Europe, nor of his namesake with a green coat, personated by the witty and facetious surveyor of this port, nor of him who owns the flour mills at Baltimore, nor yet him of the Howard House in Broadway—but simply of our old favourite vocalist of the Park and Chatham theatres. If success in the composition of a single piece of poetry can immortalize a writer, why should not Howard's inimitable and unique execution of that exquisite melody, "Oft in the still night," render his name and name permanent? His success in this pathetic song is beyond all competition, and those who doubt it may be agreeably undeceived by a visit to Castle Garden.

New-York Religious and Literary Reading Room.—Mr. William Down proposes to establish, in a central part of this city, an institution in which may be found all religious newspapers and periodicals of note, published by various denominations, in every part of the Union, as well as in Europe; together with specimens of tracts and Sunday school books, scripture maps, and maps to designate the location of missionary stations. The object is evidently to concentrate all possible information in relation to the effort making by bible, education, tract, Sunday-school, missionary, temperance, prison-discipline, colonization, and other societies of a similar nature. When the population of this city, and the peculiar zeal manifested by many for the advancement of the objects embraced in the proposed library, are taken into consideration, we can scarcely doubt that the expense which must necessarily be incurred in its creation, will be amply refunded.

Portrait of Dewitt Clinton.—We have been politely presented with a copy of the most, if not the only, accurate likeness of this distinguished statesman ever yet published. It is a lithographic performance of C. Childs, from a portrait by H. Inman—who deserves credit for his taste and his masterly execution and fidelity to nature. The picture should adorn the parlour and study of every American proud of the virtues, the talents, and the fame of one of the greatest men of his age.

Medical Society of the City and County of New-York.—At the anniversary meeting of this society, held on the twelfth instant, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:

Daniel L. M. Peixotto, M. D.	President.
Richard K. Hoffman, M. D.	Vice President.
Nicol H. Dering, M. D.	Corresponding Secretary.
Dr. William Rockwell,	Treasurer.
John James Graves, M. D.
Lewis Belden, M. D.
William Hubbard, Junr. M. D.	Censors.
D. L. Rogers, M. D.
John B. Rhinelander, M. D.	Delegate.

Seventh Volume.—A few copies of the last volume of this periodical, embellished with all the plates ever published for the work, and very neatly bound, may be had at this office.

Daily Sentinel.—The editors of this evening paper affect not to understand our remarks in relation to "would-be regenerators." All we have to say in reply is simply this: "none are so blind as those who will not see."

The Springs.—The Saratoga Sentinel says: "The number of strangers who arrived here during the week, ending on Sunday evening, was four hundred and eighty-two."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

"For as much as you have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, you have done it unto me."

It has afforded me much pleasure to find you have volunteered your services, and devoted a portion of your valuable publication, to the very important project of improving the condition of necessitous but industrious women. I do not believe there exists an evil which calls more loudly for a thorough and radical reformation; nor do I believe there is one that has awakened less attention or inquiry among reflecting people. Even the most exemplary and virtuous matrons, those who are deservedly regarded as objects of the highest earthly adoration and affection; even those, many of whom revel in the sunshine of prosperity, and possess all the means of making liberal contributions, and of infusing life and spirit into plans calculated to aid their sex, have passed by on the other side of the way, not regarding the sufferings of their afflicted sisters. But it is too much the disposition of people who are placed above want, to be heedless of the claims of others; forgetting that the great majority of both sexes are subjected to a life of toil, that many who appear to be in decent circumstances are barely able to keep their families above dependence, and that multitudes, from various causes, drink the bitter dregs of humiliation and poverty. That much of this will originate in the oppressive and perverted habits of society, in vicious propensities, and in the indulgence of base and sordid passions we cannot for a moment doubt. That persons who are conspicuous for their enlarged possessions, and whose vanity is gratified in having it known and repeated, many of whom would wish to be thought in the way of their duty, and who would be stung at the slightest reproach in this respect; that such persons should be daily witnesses of sufferings and misfortunes which are in their power greatly to mitigate, if not to remove, is indeed not a little marvellous. But after all, I consider nothing more wonderful than the fact that large contributions are often made to aid extravagant schemes of conferring pretended benefits on distant countries, while our own blood and kindred are subjected to countless privations. Can any thing more strikingly illustrate the maxim, that by doing this we grasp at the shadow whilst we lose the substance? Every dictate of wisdom and justice requires of us that we should protect the members of our own great family in place of squandering our means on those of other nations, of whom we know nothing, and who will scarcely thank us for our pains.

It must not be forgotten that modesty and delicacy are the prominent traits in the breasts of females, and that where they feel themselves dependant either for employment or for support, they seldom raise their voice by way of remonstrance, even when conscious of gross impositions. They submit to habitual wrongs from necessity, and that necessity frequently opens the door to temptation, and the result is ruin. That infinite mischiefs might be prevented by the timely interpositions of kindness and relief, must be evident to every person who has any pretensions to a knowledge of the springs of human action. In reflecting seriously on the subject, my surprise, as well as my indignation, has been greatly excited, and I have come irresistibly to the conclusion that females have much higher claims to the virtues of self-denial, fortitude, and nobleness of spirit, than the rougher sex are willing to concede to them.

But allow me once more to advert to the habitual wrongs and impositions practised upon them. Whenever necessity drives them to exposure, they too often become the dupes of unfeeling knaves and the jest of scoundrels. Diagrage, ruin, and premature death are daily occurrences among those who, had they been seasonably protected by worthy friends, and shielded from enticing offers, might have been not less distinguished ornaments of society than those mothers, wives, and daughters, on whom it would be highly perilous to cast the slightest suspicion. Hence the inference is plain, that of the numerous misfortunes of which we have to complain, a large portion are the legitimate offspring of insolent pride, sordid avarice, and a most reprehensible indifference to the just demands and the unrequited services of the friendless and the helpless.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TIES.

This earth is full of hidden spells,
To weave around the soul;
The sunny skies—old ocean's cells,
And the waves that o'er them roll;
While every zephyr whispering tells
Of nature's deep control.

And every living, breathing thing
Hath a tie of Gordian power,
Which often o'er the heart doth fling
Bright sunshine or a shower;
And time doth give a colouring
To every passing hour.

The soul hath ties in the mountain breeze,
In the charms of a summer sky;
In wandering along 'neath budding trees
By the light of a laughing eye;
Or living in isles of Indian seas,
Where perfumes wanton by.

And ties it hath in each lonely grove,
In the rage of an angry wave;
It hath ties in the magic spells of love;
It hath ties in the dreary grave—
The grave, to which all downward move,
The beautiful, the brave.

Rove sits upon an ivory brow,
And sleeps in a wreathing tress,
Looks out from an eye with a diamond's glow,
In holy joyousness;
Which charms away the pang of woe,
The canker of distress.

'Tis the deepest tie—for it chains the mind,
Like a fairy's charmed wand;
It holds e'en giant forms confined,
Hath worlds at its command,
And in its silken folds doth bind
The bright of every land.

T. S.

TO ELOISA.

Thou, then, all-charming as thou art,
To many a bosom justly dear,
Lofty in soul, and pure in heart,
Earth's common lot must bear.

These cannot shield thee from the ills
That cross life's weary pilgrimage;
Grief which the young heart sadly chills,
And mars the peace of age.

Thou too hast mourn'd thy blessings fled,
Even in life's glowing pride and bloom;
Thy tears of deep regret are shed
Above an idol's tomb.

Thou too hast missed the smile, the tone,
The kindred glance, to thee so dear;
Thou too hast mourn'd the loved—thine own,
And earth seems sad and drear.

Though boasted time can never heal
The bleeding wounds such grief has given,
Yet from his flight the power we steal
To hope relief from heaven.

Such hope a healing balm can shed
Upon the hearts that only bleed;
Such hope may raise the drooping head,
And bind the "bruised reed."

And memory, from her deep recess,
Though many a secret pang she brings,
Will also bring the thoughts which bless—
Thought which a halo flings

Around each dear familiar scene,
Each fond, regretted, halcyon hour;
And purely bright, and freshly green,
They live in memory's bower.

Lady, with conflict, pain, and toil,
We strive on life's wild billows tost;
'Tis but a space, a little while,
We mourn the loved and lost.

ISIDORA.

COMMON-PLACE.

And is my humble lyre to be
The first that wakes a lay,
To dedicate a book to thee,
Design'd for wit and poetry?

Dear lady, I obey.
For like this fair unsullied leaf,
Was once thy infant mind;
Save, when alternate joy and grief
Flitted across with stay so brief,
They left no trace behind.

But genius, wit, and taste refined
With knowledge, science, art;
Saw the bright tablet of thy mind
A spotless blank—and all combined
To fill so fair a chart.

And long, I trust, this volume will
Of thee an emblem prove;
While wit and taste its pages fill,
Be every precept they instill
Such as the virtuous love.

GOD IS THERE.

I view the daisy's opening flower,
That blooms so bright in every vale,
And seek in joy through field and bower,
The red wild rose and lily pale;
And while the glittering dew is hung
On bud and leaf surpassing fair,
Their sweets on every gale are flung,
And prove the hand of God is there.

And in the silent noon of night,
When every living thing is still;
But the murmur'ing waters glancing bright—
The mournful music of the rill;
When not a single leaf is stirred,
Nor lives a wand'ring breath of air,
A tone in this still hour is heard,
Which tells the soul that God is there.

Yon world of stars! how pure it seems—
How wonderful its bright array;
The rising moon—how mild her beams
Upon the misty waters play.
The mind may soar—may take its flight,
Far as the soul of man can dare,
Through worlds on worlds of endless light,
And still will find that God is there.

When from the west some mighty cloud
Comes on with tempest-darkened plume,
The sunbeams play beneath its shroud,
And earth is wrapp'd in gath'ring gloom!
The thunder's peal—the tempest's fray—
The vivid flash and meteor glare,
Are only heralding His way,
And show Almighty presence there.

Unloose wild thought—o'er earth and sea
Give boundless scope to chainless mind;
'Twill soon resolve each mystery—
A source divine for all things find!
Spring's budding flowers—the shrouded night,
The soft—sublime—the rich, the rare,
Point upwards to yon realms of light,
And tell each heart that God is there.

L.

STANZAS.

Among the flowers of sentiment
Which form this bright bouquet,
The humble tribute I present
May claim a place—for it is meant
My friendship to portray.
But be it not, I pray, united
With hyacinth or yew,
Emblems, alas! of friendship slighted.

Of pure affection unrequited,
And cold indifference too.

But let my offering bloom beside
The muses' eglantine,
Between the lilac's purple pride
And one more delicately dyed,
The fragrant jessamine;
For we in these the emblems trace
Of poetry and youth,
And that inestimable grace
Which guards the heart and lights the face
Of modesty and truth.

The constant myrtle may be near,
The timid violet too;
The amaranth, to virtue dear,
And the sweet rose, which all revere,
An emblem, girl, of you.
But let no cold Narcissus bloom,
Dear maid, to blight the rest,
For oh! self-love is sure to doom
Our virtues to an early tomb,
If cherish'd in the breast.

SAVOYARD'S SONG.

Far, far away,
By Geneva's blue waters in gladness we dwell:
Kind friends then caressed us,
Sweet voices then blessed us,
As low at our vesper's devotion we knelt,
Far, far away.

Far, far away,
One morn' saw our father's light vessel in pride.
But the storm gathered o'er,
And his bark came no more—
Our father's bones sleep in Geneva's blue tide,
Far, far away!

Far, far away,
Our heart-broken mother look'd out on the wave.
For her children she sigh'd,
For her husband she died—
On Geneva's green bank is our mother's cold grave
Far, far away!

Far, far away,
The poor Savoyard orphans to-morrow must go:
Then pity, kind strangers,
The world's friendless rangers,
And bless with your bounty our journey of woe,
Far, far away!

VILLAGE TALES.

LOUISA.

BY MARY E. MITFORD.

It was on Monday last that I had the double pleasure of attending the nuptials of an old friend, and of giving in my resignation of the post of confidante, which I had filled with great credit and honour for twenty years and upwards. A married woman no longer needs the sympathy and consolation of a listening and pitying love-friend. Her story, according to all the laws of romance, is fairly over. So is my occupation. I shall miss it at first, just as one living in a church-yard would miss an entire cessation of those bells, which yet from habit is scarcely heard. I shall miss poor Louisa's sighs and blushes, written or spoken, especially when the post comes in, and she will miss me, perhaps, the most of the two; for I cannot help thinking that by the time the honey-moon is over, the necessity for a discreet confidante may be as pressing as ever. I cannot disguise from myself, that a damsel who has been used to fall in love with a new object at the end of every two or three months for the last twenty years, more or less, may, from mere habit, and without the slightest intentional infraction of the nuptial vow, fairly forget that she is married, and relapse into her old custom; more especially as her husband appears to be the only young man she has ever known with whom she has never even fancied herself in love.

Louisa L. and myself were old schoolfellows. Her father is a West Indian planter of some property, who, having lost many children in the pestiferous climate of Barbadoes, did not choose to carry thither his only remaining daughter, and left her at school during a long residence on his estate, not as a parlour-boarder but as a common pupil. She was a fine-looking girl with a tall, showy figure, and a face amazingly like what one sees in those old family portraits, which bear so great a resemblance to each other, whatever they might do to the originals. Like them, our heroine was distinguished by regular features, a high, narrow forehead, black sleepy eyes, long dark hair, a clear complexion, and a general languid composure of aspect.

Now this sounds like the description of a beautiful woman as well as of a beautiful picture; and so it would be, only that unluckily, whilst content that the portrait should keep one look and one expression, we are apt to expect the real woman to vary occasionally, and are so unreasonable as to be disappointed when we find her countenance, however handsome, (for the handsomer it is the more we expect from it) fixed in the same mould of comely silliness from year's end to year's end. In such a case almost any change would be felt as a relief, and a little ugliness would tell exceedingly.

Her conversation was quite in keeping with her style of person; much of the sort (making due allowance for the interval of a century) that one might expect from Sir Peter Lely's portrait of one's great grandmother seated on a bank, attired in a robe of blue satin, with a crook in her hand, a rose in her bosom, and two or three sheep at her feet.

Simile apart, Louisa was a thoroughly well-meaning young woman, with little wit and much good-nature, with a mind no more adapted to contain knowledge than a sieve to hold water, and a capacity of unlearning, a faculty of forgetting, most happily suited to the double and triple course of instruction which her father's protracted absence doomed her to undergo. She had been in the first class for five years to my certain knowledge; there I found her and there I left her, going over the same ground with each successive set, and regularly overtaken and outstripped by every girl of common talent. The only thing in which she ever made any real proficiency was music; by dint of incredible application she sang tolerably, played well on the piano, and better on the harp. But she had no genuine love even for that, and began to weary, as well she might, of her incessant practice, and her interminable education. The chief effect of this natural weariness was a strong desire to be married, the only probable mode of release that occurred to her, for of her father's return she and every one had begun to despair. How to carry this wish into effect perplexed her not a little. If she had been blest with a manœuvring mamma, indeed, the business might soon have been done. But poor Louisa was not so lucky. She had only an old bachelor uncle and two maiden aunts, who, quite content to see to her comforts in a kind, quiet way, to have her at home in the holidays, to keep her well dressed and well supplied with fruit and pocket-money, continued to think of her as a mere school-girl, and never dreamed of the grand object by which her whole soul was engrossed. So that the gentle damsel, left entirely to the resources of her own genius, could devise no better plan than to fix her own thoughts and attention, fall in love, as she called and perhaps thought it, with every man of suitable station who happened to fall in her way. The number of these successive, or alternate, or simultaneous preferences—for often she had two beaux who were laid aside and taken up in a sort of see-saw, as either happened to cross her path, and sometimes she had literally two at once—was really astonishing. So was her impartiality. Rich or poor, old or young, from seventeen to seventy, nothing came amiss. Equally amazing was the exceedingly small encouragement upon which her fancy could work; to dance with her, to sit next her at dinner, to ask her to play, one visit, one compliment, a look, a word, or half a word, was enough to send her sighing through the house, singing tender airs, and reading novels and love-ditties. The celebrated ballad in which Cowley gives a list of his mistresses—the "Chronicle," as he calls it—was but a type of the bead-roll of names that might have been strung up from her fancies. The common duration of a fit was about a month or six weeks, sometimes more, sometimes less, as one love-wedge drove out another; but generally the "decline and fall" of these attachments (I believe that is the phrase) began at the month's end.

It was astonishing how well these little dramas were gotten up; any body not in the secret would have thought her really a tender innamorata, she had so many pretty sentimentalities, would wear nothing but the favourite's favourite colour, or sigh out her soul over his favourite song, or hoard his notes or visiting tickets in her bosom. One of her vagaries cost me a bad cold. The reigning swain happened to be a German count, who, talking somewhat fantastically of the stars, expressed a sort of superstitious devotion to the beautiful constellation, Orion; he could not sleep, he said, till he had gazed on it. Now, our luckless damsel took this for a sort of covert assignation, a tender rendezvous of looks and thoughts, like the famous story of the two lovers in the Spectator; and the sky prospect from her apartment being rather limited, she used, to my unspeakable annoyance, to come star-gazing to mine. This accès being encouraged by more attention than usual on the part of the gentleman—or rather she being unused to foreign manners, and mistaking the continental courtesy to a fair lady for a particular devotion—lasted three whole months. Of course she fell into other mistakes beside the general one of fancying all men in love with her. One winter, for instance, she fancied that a sickly gentleman, who used to sun himself on the pavement on our side of the square, walked there to listen to her music; so she obligingly moved her harp close to an open window (in December! N.B. she caught as bad a cold by these noon-day serenades, as ever her midnight assignations with the belted Orion gave me) and played and sang during the whole time of his promenade. A little while after we discovered that the poor gentleman was deaf.

Nor were her own mistakes, though they were bad enough, the worst she had to encounter. A propensity so ridiculous could not escape undetected amongst such a tribe of tricky and mischievous spirits; nor could all the real regard attracted by the fair Louisa's many good qualities save her from the mal-practices of these little mockers. It was such fun to set her whirling heart a-spinning, to give her a fresh object—sometimes a venerable grandfather, sometimes a school-boy brother, sometimes a married cousin—any lover would answer her purpose, and the more absurd or impossible, the better for ours.

I will, however, do myself the justice to say, that partly from compassion, and partly from vanity at being elected to the post of confidante, I was not by many degrees so guilty as many of my compeers. To be sure one Valentine, a piece of original poetry, with about as much sense and meaning as the famous love-song by a person of quality, and a few flowery billets to match, purporting to come from the same quarter—that Valentine! I must plead guilty to that Valentine—but that was a venial offence, and besides she never found it out. So when I left school, and even when six months after her father unexpectedly returned and took her to reside with him in a country town, I still continued the favoured depository of her secrets and her sighs.

We lived in distant counties, and met so seldom that our intercourse was almost entirely epistolary. Intercourse did I say? My share of the correspondence, or of the dialogue, was little better than what a confidante on the French stage sustains with the belle princesse, from whom she is obliged to hear a hundred-times-told-tale. I was a mere woman of straw—a thing to direct to. She never cared for answers, luckily for me; for at first, whilst my young civility and conscientious sense of the duties of a polite letter-writer instigated me to reply point by point to her epistles, such blunders used to ensue as are sometimes produced in a game of cross purposes—a perpetual jostling of hopes and fears; condolence out of season; congratulation mistimed; praise misapplied; eternal confusion; never-ending mistakes. So, farther than half a dozen unmeaning affectionate words, I left off writing at all, perhaps with the lurking hope that she would follow my example. No such thing. The vent was necessary—I was the safety-valve to her heart, by which dangerous explosions were prevented. On she wrote—and oh such letters! crossed and re-crossed, and in such a hand! so pretty and so unreadable! Straight and far apart, with long tails meeting each other, and the shorter letters all alike, all m.'s and n.'s. In vain did I remonstrate against this fashionable but barbarous calligraphy, above all against the iniquitous chequer work; on she went from bad to worse, till at last, to my great comfort, her letters became altogether illegible, and my conscience was absolved from the necessity of even trying to read them. A frank made no difference; she went on with her double crossing, only there was double the quantity. Any thing like a regular perusal of these precious epistles was entirely out of the question; and yet I used to get at the meaning of most of them in the process of folding and unfolding, just as one sometimes catches the substance of an unreadable book by the mere act of cutting open the leaves. I knew her so well, that I could trace by a catch-word the progress of her history, and the particular object of her present regard—how she was herself in love with a lord, and how accusing a presumptuous linen-draper of being enamoured of her; now she had a young baronet at her feet, and how she could talk of nothing but an itinerant musician. Twice had she called on me to fulfil an old promise of attending her to the altar; and once, (I was young and silly then myself) once I had been so far taken in as actually to prepare a wedding suit. Of course, when the final summons came, I was utterly incredulous. It was something like the fable of the shepherd's boy and the wolf; not a soul believed her till the news arrived in a regular authentic document—a letter from her father—a worthy matter-of-fact man, whom poor Louisa's vagaries had actually kept in purgatory—to mine, who also held the fair damsel for mad. Mr. S. mentioned his intended son-in-law as belonging to the medical profession; and on looking back to Louisa's letters, which under the new stimulus of curiosity, as to the approaching dénouement, we contrived to decipher, we discovered that for upwards of two months Louisa had been deeply smitten with a young physician, newly arrived at L—, whom she called by the name of Henry, and of whose fine tall person, as well as his dark and manly beauty she gave a most flaming description. This, of course, was the gentleman. I hastened to repair my fault and prepare my dresses; wrote a letter of congratulation, packed my trunk, and set off. Imagine my astonishment, on arriving at L—, to find Louisa tête-à-tête with a little fair lad of eighteen or twenty, the head and shoulders shorter than herself, soft, delicate, and lady-like—the very image of one of Beaumont and Fletcher's girls, who dress themselves in boy's clothes for love—and to be introduced to him as Mr. Peter Sharp, surgeon, the happy futur of Miss Louisa! I was never in so much danger of laughing in my life.

I gathered, however, from her admissions, and her father's more rational account, that whilst our fair friend was, according to the vulgar phrase, "setting her cap" at the handsome physician, the young surgeon, who had just finished his education by walking the hospitals, returned to L—, was taken into partnership by his father, and advised by his friends to look about for a wife as a necessary appendage to his profession—perhaps he might also be advised as to the lady, for Louisa has a pretty fortune for a country apothecary. However that night be, he began, as he assures me, to pay suit and service; whilst the fair object of his devotion, whose heart, or rather whose fancy, was completely pre-occupied, and who thought of Mr. Peter, if she thought of him at all, as a mere boy, entirely overlooked himself and his attentions—they being, perhaps, the only attentions of a young man which she ever did overlook in the whole course of her life. She confesses that the first entire sentence she ever heard him utter was the offer—the actual offer of heart and hand. Most ladies in her situation would have been a little posed; but Louisa is not a woman to be taken unawares: she has thought too much on the subject; has too well-founded a reliance on her own changeability; besides, she had set her heart on the “pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious” bridal; the wedding was the thing—the wedding-day—the man was of little importance; Peter might do as well as Henry—so she said yes, and all was settled.

And a very splendid wedding it was; really, for those who like such things, almost worth the troubles and anxieties of a twenty year's love. The whole cortège, horses, carriages, friends, and bridesmaids, down to the very breakfast cake and gloves, were according to most approved usage of books or of life. It might have made a fine conclusion to a novel—it did make a splendid paragraph in a newspaper. Every detail was correct, except one—nobody cried. That did vex her. That was an omission. She tried hard to repair it herself, and flourished her cambric handkerchief; but not a tear could she shed; neither could we, the bridesmaids, nor the father, nor the nuptial father, nor the clergyman, nor the clerk—nobody cried. The bridegroom came nearest—he, the only one who ought not to cry; but luckily he became sensible that it would be a breach of etiquette, and turned the involuntary emotion into a smile. All else went well. May the omen be auspicious, and tears, and the source of tears, keep far away from the kind and gentle Louisa!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PRINCIPLES OF HONOUR AMONG STUDENTS.

I HAD been about a month in Gottingen when I was sitting alone one evening, in that species of indolent humour in which we hail a friend's approach without possessing energy sufficient to seek for society abroad, when my friend Eisendaller entered; he resisted all my entreaties to remain, and briefly informed me that he came to request I would accompany him the following morning to Meissner, a distance of about five leagues, where he was to fight a duel, and told me, that to avoid suspicion in town, the horses should wait at my door, which was outside the ramparts, as early as five o'clock; having thus acquainted me with the object of his visit, and also told me not to forget he would breakfast with me before starting, he wished me good night, and departed. I remained awake the greater part of the night, conjecturing what might have been the reason of this extraordinary caution; for I well knew that several duels took place every day within the precincts of the university, without mention being made of them, or any inquiry being instituted by the protector or consul. Towards morning I fell into a kind of disturbed sleep, from which I was awakened by my friend entering, and hallooing, “Auf, auf, die sonne scheint heil!”—“up, up, the sun shines bright;” (the first line of a well-known student catch.) I rose and dressed myself, and having breakfasted, we mounted our nags and set off, at a sharp pace, to the place of meeting. For the first few miles not a word was spoken on either side; he was apparently wrapt in his thoughts, and I did not wish to intrude upon his feelings at such a moment; however, he at last broke silence, and informed me that the duel was to be fought with pistols, as he and his adversary had vainly endeavoured to decide the quarrel in several meetings with swords. The cause of this deadly animosity, for such it must have been to require a course rarely if ever pursued by a student, of resorting to pistols, he did not clearly explain, but merely gave me to understand that it originated concerning a relation of his opponent's, a very lovely girl, whom he had met at the court of Hanover. Having given this brief explanation, he again relapsed into silence, and we rode on for miles without saying a word. The morning was delightful, the country through which we passed highly picturesque, and there was an appearance of happy content and cheerfulness on the faces of the peasants, who all saluted us as they went forth to their morning labour, that stood in awful contrast to our feelings, hurrying forward, as we were, on the mission of death.

We at length arrived at Meissner, where several of my friend's party were expecting him, and having stabled our horses, we left the town, and took a narrow path across the fields, which led to a mill about a mile off; this was the place of rendezvous. On our way we overtook the other party, who had all passed the preceding night at Meissner; and guess my surprise and horror to find that my friend's antagonist was one of my own intimate acquaintances, and the very student who had been the first to show me any attention on my arriving in Gottingen. He was a young Prussian, named Hautsell, whose mild manners and gentleman-like deportment had acquired for him the sobriquet of der Zahme, (the gentle) among his brother students. After saluting each other, the parties proceeded to the ground together. There was little time spent in arranging preliminaries; it was agreed, as both were well known marksmen, to throw dice for the first fire; the seconds then came forward, and Hautsell's friends announced that Eisendaller had won.

There was an instantaneous falling back of all but the two principals, who now took their position about fifteen paces from each other; I watched them both closely, and never did I see men more apparently unmoved than they were at that moment—not a muscle of their features betrayed the least emotion or any consciousness of the awful situation in which they were placed—the pistol was handed to Eisendaller, with direction to fire before the lapse of a minute; he immediately levelled it, and remained in the attitude of covering his antagonist for some seconds, but at length finding his hand becoming unsteady, he deliberately lowered his arm to his side, stiffening and stretching it to his utmost length, and remaining thus for an instant, he appeared to be gaining resolution for his deadly purpose. It was a moment of awful suspense; I felt my heart sicken at the blood-thirsty coolness of the whole proceeding, and had to turn away my head in disgust; when I again looked round, he had raised his pistol, and was taking a long and steady aim; he at length fired; the ball whizzed through Hautsell's hair, and as it grazed he wheeled half round by an involuntary motion, and raised his hand to see if there were blood. I now looked anxiously at Eisendaller, but he stood firm and motionless as a statue. I thought at one moment I saw his lip curl, and a half scowl of disappointment and impatience cross his features, but in an instant it passed away, and he remained as passionless as before.

It was now Hautsell's turn, he lost no time in presenting his weapon; there was a small red spot burning on the cheek that had been grazed, which seemed to bespeak the fiery rage that had taken possession of his soul, for he felt that his antagonist had done his best to take away his life. I shuddered to think that I was looking on my friend for the last time, for from the situation in which I stood I could distinctly see that his heart was covered, and that the moment Hautsell drew the trigger would be his last. Maddened with an agonizing thrill of horror, I felt an irresistible impulse to rush forward, and arrest the arm that was about to deprive him of life; but while a sense of what was due to the established customs of society on such occasions restrained me, and I stood breathless with terrific expectation of the fatal flash; Hautsell, to my amazement, suddenly raising his pistol to a vertical position, fired it straight over his head, flung his weapon into the air, and rushing forward threw his arms round Eisendaller, burst into tears, exclaiming, “Mein Bruder!” and wept upon his neck like a child. We were wholly unprepared for such a scene, and although not easily unmanned, the overwrought feelings of all sought vent in a passion of tears. We soon left the ground, and mounted our horses to return to Gottingen. On our way homeward there was little said. It happened that once, and once only, I found myself at the side of Hautsell; he conversed with me for a short time in a low under tone, and on my asking how he felt at the moment of his adversary's missing him, he answered, “it was then my determined purpose to shoot him, and up to the last moment this determination remained unaltered, but at the instant of placing my finger on the trigger, I thought I saw an expression about his face that reminded me of earlier and happier days, when we studied and played together, and had but one heart, and I felt as if I were about to become the murderer of my brother. I could then more easily have turned the pistol against my own breast than have shot the friend of my childhood.” Dublin Lit. Gaz.

THE UGLY MAN.

A hero is nothing in these days if not handsome. But I must admit at once, in plain language, without shame or equivocation, that I am what the world calls—and particularly the feminine part of it—confounded ugly. There is not a feature in my face where it ought to be. I look as if I had just walked out of “Der Freyschutz.” You would fancy that I had been not created, or guessed at, or that I had been made by mistake. I have been accused of picking up my countenance at a masquerade; and it has been stated that Mr. Farley invented me for a pantomime.

People are surprised that they do not see a line of italics in my forehead, “drawn and etched by George Cruikshank.” Liston has frequently expressed his admiration of my ugliness, and regards me with a kind of envious enthusiasm. I was once obliged to fight a duel with a friend, only for looking at his little girl, whose imagination had been excited by reading the history of an ogre; and was a short time after cast in an action, brought against me for stopping to admire a horse that happened at the same moment to take fright. I am a particular favourite with the author of Frankenstein, who thinks me philosophically frightful. I sat to her for the Monster. I have seen people stare at me as if they wondered how I escaped from St. George, or wished to know when I was last at Wantley. Frequently have I been puzzled to know how Narcissus could fall in love with himself; the thing seems to me impossible. When I have surveyed my face in a glass, I have been rather alarmed, lest instead of passing a pocket I should put my hand into it.

How sorry I have sometimes been when calling upon a friend, I have seen all the little children, as they stole a glance at me on my entrance, prefer going to bed to the proffered privilege of a game at forfeits. Shakspeare must have seen me in a vision when he drew Caliban. Spencer, also, has very nearly described me in several places. One day or other I shall be taken up for a triton that has strayed from its pedestal in a gentleman's pond. I should make a capital study for a knocker.

Mr. Nash wishes to take a cast of my face for that purpose. It is not long ago since mine host of the “Saracen's Head” offered me a share in the concern, on condition that I put up my portrait for the sign. He little suspected the possibility of painting it; it would be easier to personify a chaos. Fuseli could not have made me more frightful, nor could Lawrence have extracted a grace from me, even when the alchemy of his pencil found gold in all things. No painter, therefore, has yet had the courage to sketch me. Yet, as I stood the other day looking at a Hercules, and laughing at myself, I turned and caught a pale thin young man pencilling my contour in his pocket-book; and in a few days afterwards, while I was talking with some ladies in a carriage, what was my surprise at recognising my own features, in all the sublimity of ugliness, painted upon the pannel! I was in the character of a griffin!

What was worse, the ladies, who happened to be horribly handsome, observed the likeness, which they seemed to regard as a coincidence highly flattering to me. I fancied every moment that they would compliment me on the resemblance, and expect me to present them with their crest set in diamonds for my miniature. While leaning over they glanced, first at the green pannel, and then at me; comparing the grin of the griffin with the smile of unconsciousness that I assumed, and which must have looked very like a paroxysm of horror.

I grew more and more ghastly as I affected to look pleasant. In endeavouring to twist my mouth into something less disagreeable, I only resembled a fury playing on a fiddle. At last, finding that the griffin had decidedly the best of it, I left the ladies to their scent-bottles. I believe one of them fainted. As I retreated, they seemed a little surprised at my walking away in the usual manner like other people. They looked down and consulted together; they had counted my legs.

I shall not attempt to convey to the reader any definite notion of my features; as well might I endeavour to paint the sound of the bagpipes, or to turn a vinegar barrel into verse.

My nose—let it pass undescribed; a shape of shadow, a riddle to all ages. I bequeath its memory to mankind, and in after times, let it be said that there was at least one nose of which the human mind could form no conception; I will merely observe, that if it should acquire, either from time or the table, any other form or hue, it must inevitably be handsomer than it is. My feet very much resemble those that we meet with in modern poetry, being sadly deficient in quantity when compared with each other.

Yet I am one of the most popular men of the day; a party is hardly considered complete without me. I take precedence of the youthful and the elegant; you will always find me in the loveliest, the liveliest, and the least superficial circle in the room. I attract about me the gay and the romantic, the sentimental and the impassioned. Mind, I am not hired like a genius or a juggler, who is expected to amuse in proportion to the honours that are paid him; and yet I am hunted as a curiosity, and carried about like a new poet, or a new shawl.

But for what? I do not write songs, nor have I made any useless discovery in science.

To be able to dance well, says some old author, requires a good understanding; it also requires legs, which the articles that assist me in walking cannot correctly be called.

Is there some secret, then, by which ugliness may be made fascinating? There is; it consists simply in this singular fact, that I never in my life happened to read any one of the Scotch novels! This forms my character. I am known as "the gentleman who never read Waverley!" I live upon the nil admirari—I flourish upon nothing. Every body is contending who shall get me into a corner to describe to me Amy Robsart or Mac Ivor.

I am like the new world—all are anxious to cultivate me. My ignorance is universally coveted; to know is to be nothing.

How I am envied! All leave me with an impression that I am exceedingly well informed, because they have communicated to me every thing that they happened to know up to that period.

There are some that take a pride to gird me, as men did at Falstaff; but my triumph is no less complete; I have captivated the loveliest of her sex. She writes romances, and I have promised to read none but hers. I am to furnish her with perpetual ideas for her corsairs and bandits; she will never want a demon while I live.

My hopes of happiness on this point had not yet received a confirmation. I was in hourly expectation of a decision, and flattered myself—except when I happened to be standing near a mirror—that it would be favourable. In five days an answer was to be returned.

My heart beat responses to the clock, and ticked as if it had been warranted. I watched every hour that came, as a debtor does a dun, and was thankful when it was gone. It would be on the fourteenth; memorable date! Now then for my letter; "Letitia," said I, (these girls get such fine names) "you may bring up my coffee, and mind, I expect a letter this morning; pray let me have it the moment it comes."

The girl started at first, and I believe almost tittered. "There has been one already, sir."

"Then never mind the coffee now, put it down and bring me the letter."

"O, I refused it, sir," said she, with an air of discretion.

"Refused it! when? why?"

"It came by the eight o'clock post, sir. I thought it was a valentine, and that of course you would not take it in."

She indulged me with another stare, and treated herself to another titter.

The post now came. Hou mihi, what an inundation of despatches; I forgot how many, some at twopence, some at threepence, none paid! Some were folded mysteriously and turned into geometrical forms—the seals were not less multi-form, and were graced with every impression from a sixpence to a key. There was, however, surprising unanimity in their contents, they all struck at me with some silly satire. But it was all in vain; nature had done so much for me, that my enemies could not, by any possibility, caricature me.

I felt an earthquake within me, but stood firm. I summoned my wits, and held a secret vestry in my mind. The result was inevitable. I was obliged to take in every letter that came till the right one arrived.

Many bore the insignia of a button, and more of a thimble: every one I came to increased my disappointment; I looked for South Audley-street at the top, and "yours sincerely" at the bottom, in vain. My mortification rose twenty per cent. I paced up and down the room, ruminating upon philosophy and the post-office, on ill-directed love, and mis-directed letters. I resolved to terminate my wretchedness at once, and wondering how Chabert could be so foolish as to refuse prussic acid, I rushed out in search of it. But I was not so lucky as Romeo: our apothecaries are too well off; all refused. At last I found a shop with a boy whistling behind the counter. I made a desperate effort to be agreeable, and pleaded some experiment in natural philosophy, but he denied me like the rest. I begged for a little laudanum for the tooth-ache, but he recommended tincture of myrrh. He wrapped up my change in paper, and I was again left in the world without a hope. I turned my head and saw that I was passing a cutler's shop.

I went in and selected a new set of razors; they were not polished, and I could not have them that night; they were to be sent in the morning, certainly not later than nine. I consented to live till that hour.

I retired to bed, but to broken slumbers. I beheld nothing but scarlet coats and leather bags—a legion of post-men. I was wandering in a hall lined with looking-glasses; I was committed for trial for placing my portrait in the Royal Academy; when I awoke it was very near nine; only a few minutes remained for me. My eyes fell upon the glass, and I gave the last shudder of disgust at the unhappy features that involved me in ruin. The delay of the cutler rendered me impatient; I wondered what the papers would say the next morning, and whether they would have wood cuts. Unconsciously I took up the wet sheet before me to read my final debate. Underneath it lay—mysterious providence—a letter! It realized my fondest dream—at the same time Letty entered the room; "Your razors are come."

"Very well," said I, "then give me some hot water, for I must dress directly."

We were to be married the first of April. Reader, whoever you are, let this be at once your affliction and your balm—that you are less happy and less ugly. New Monthly Magazine.

PORTRAIT OF BONAPARTE.

The person of Bonaparte has served as a model for the most skilful painters and sculptors; many able French artists have successfully delineated his features, and yet it may be said, that no perfectly faithful portrait of him exists. His finely shaped head, his superb forehead, his pale countenance, and his usual meditative look, have been transferred to the canvass; but the versatility of his expression was beyond the reach of imitation. All the various workings of his mind were instantaneously depicted in his countenance; and his glance changed from mild to severe, and from angry to good humoured, almost with the rapidity of lightning. It may be truly said, that he had a peculiar look for every thought that arose in his mind. Bonaparte had beautiful hands, and he was very proud of them; while conversing he would often look at them with an air of self-complacency. He also fancied he had fine teeth, but his pretension to that advantage was not so well founded as his vanity on the score of his hands. When walking, either alone or in company with any one, in his gardens, he had the habit of stooping a little, and crossing his hands behind his back. He frequently gave an involuntary shrug of the right shoulder, which was accompanied by a movement of his mouth from left to right. This habit was most remarkable when his mind was absorbed in the consideration of any profound subject. It was often while walking that he dictated to me the most important notes. He could endure great fatigue, not only on horseback but on foot; he would sometimes walk five or six hours in succession, without being aware of it. When walking with any person whom he treated with familiarity, he would link his arm into that of his companion, and lean on it. Bourrienne's Memoirs.

BEAU NASH.

Beau Nash was born in 1764, at Swansea, in Glamorgan-shire, and was intended for the law, but entered the army; rank, taking disgust at the discipline and his subordinate rank, he soon forsook, and took chambers in the temple. Here he devoted himself entirely to pleasure and fashion; and when King William visited the inn, he was chosen as master of the pageant with which it was necessary to welcome the monarch. So pleased was William with the entertainment, that he offered him the honour of knighthood; but Nash refused, saying, "Please your majesty, if you intend to make me a knight, I wish it may be one of your poor knights of Windsor, and then I shall have a fortune at least equal to support my title." In 1704 he was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath; and immediately instituted a set of regulations as remarkable for their strictness as for their judicious adaptation to the wants and society of the place. While in the plenitude of his power and popularity, Nash lived in the most splendid style of elegance, supporting his expenses by a long run of success at the gaming table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode was drawn by six gray horses, and attended by a long cavalcade of servants, some on horses, others on foot; while his progress through the streets was made known by a band of French horns and other instruments. His common title was the king of Bath; and his reign continued with undiminished splendour for fifteen years. His health then began to decline, and his resources grew less plentiful. As the change in his spirits and circumstances became more evident, his former acquaintances gradually forsook him, and he died at the age of eighty-eight, in comparative indigence and solitude. His character was so estimated by the corporation of the city, that he was buried with great magnificence at its expense; and his epitaph, a neat tribute to his memory, was written by Dr. Harrington. Lardner's Cyclopædia.

HORNE TOOKER'S OPINION OF CERTAIN EDITORS.

"Nothing," says he, "is gained by a controversy with an ignorant, low-lived, low-bred, vulgar fellow. You get the better of him in a contest, and the fellow will immediately, as the dernier resort of meanness, enter into personalities. This is with him a cardinal virtue."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PRACTICAL SCIENCE.

THE practical results of the progress of physics, chemistry, and mechanics, are of the most marvellous kind, and to make them all distinct would require a comparison of ancient and modern dates; ships that were moved by human labour in the ancient world are transported by the winds; and a piece of steel, touched by the magnet, points to the mariner his unerring course from the old to the new world; and by the exertions of one man of genius, and by the resources of chemistry, a power which, by the old philosophers could hardly have been imagined, has been generated and applied to almost all the machinery of active life; the steam engine not only performs the labour of horses, but of man, by combinations which appear almost possessed of intelligence; wagons are moved by it, constructions made, vessels caused to perform voyages in opposition to wind and tide, and a power placed in human hands which seems almost unlimited. To these novel and still extending improvements may be added others, which, though of a secondary kind, yet materially affect the comforts of life—the collection from fossil materials of the elements of combustion, and applying them so as to illuminate, by a single operation, houses, streets, and even cities. If you look to the results of chemical arts, you will find new substances of the most extraordinary nature applied to various novel purposes; you will find a few experiments in electricity leading to the marvellous results of disarming the thunder cloud of its terrors, and you will see new instruments created by human ingenuity, possessing the same powers as the electrical organs of living animals. To whatever part of the vision of modern times you cast your eyes, you will find marks of superiority and improvement, and I wish to impress upon you the conviction, that the results of intellectual labour, or scientific genius, are permanent and incapable of being lost. Monarchs change their plans, governments their objects, a fleet or an army effect their purposes, and then pass away; but a piece of steel touched by the magnet preserves its character for ever, and secures to man the dominion of the trackless ocean. A new period of society may send armies from the shores of the Baltic to those of the Euxine, and the empire of the followers of Mahomet may be broken in pieces by a northern people, and the dominion of the Britons in Asia may share the same fate as that of Tamerlane or Zengiskhan: but the steam-boat which ascends the Mississippi or the St. Lawrence will be continued to be used, and will carry the civilization of an improved people into the deserts of North America, and into the wilds of Canada. Sir Humphrey Davy

HAIL-STORMS.

Professor Olmstead, of Yale College, accounts for hail-storms in the following manner:

Violent hail storms are always attended by black clouds, high winds, and thunder and lightnings; they are confined chiefly to the temperate zones; they occur most frequently in the hottest months; hail-stones are much smaller on the tops of mountains than in the neighbouring plains; they are often followed by cooler weather. The immediate cause of hail-storms is a sudden and extraordinary cold in the region of the clouds where the hailstones begin to form, but the great question is, what is the origin of this cold? An exceeding cold wind from the north, or from the high and cold regions of the atmosphere; this meets with a moist, warm current of air, and a hail-storm follows. In descriptions of hail-storms it is commonly mentioned that opposite and violent winds meet. When a cold current from the regions of perpetual frost meets with a warm current, the watery vapour of the latter is frozen, and hailstones are formed. In the torrid zone there are no hail-storms, except near lofty mountains, because there are no freezing currents of air to mix with the cold currents. The south of France is more remarkable for frequent hail-storms than any country in the world. This is owing to its situation between the Alps and Pyrennees; the cold blasts from these regions of snow and ice, mingling with the hot, damp air over the intervening country, produce violent hail-storms; the opposite currents of hot and cold air are set in motion when the heat of the sun is great. It is surprising that hailstones, descending as they do, through many thousand feet, fall with so little force. They are heavy enough to fall with a hundred times the force which they actually exhibit. The reason of this is the following: they are very small when first formed, and receive continual accessions in descending; these accessions are made from watery vapours at rest, and the taking one of these new lodges continually retards their speed. Hailstones are smaller on the tops of mountains than in the neighbouring plains, because they do not fall so far.

MY UNCLE BEN.

"Keep thy lips buttoned, boy!"

My uncle Ben is one of your bona fide observers of the old school. From his youth he has been accustomed to look and reflect for himself, and now, at the age of forty-five, his mental storehouse is replete with a goodly accumulation of knowledge. That it is like the leaves of our autumn forests, of many colours, I am candid enough to confess; but maugre all that, the gleanings of two score years' observation, speculation, and ratiocination are not to be lightly esteemed, if acquired by a discriminating mind. Accordingly, my uncle Ben is regarded as a prodigy of perspicacity and sound judgment. It is, therefore, scarcely necessary to add that he is always chosen arbitrator of all collisions for miles around. From what I have said, some may esteem my uncle Ben a notorious twaddler; but he is not, although I will confess that he is a little pragmatical at times. In the main, however, he speaks and acts to the purpose, and is emphatically one of your business-bent, thorough-going men. In whatever cause he embarks, if he is assured of its rectitude and utility, he goes straight forward; like Balaam he puts to, whip and spur, oppose what may notwithstanding. It is evident, therefore, that he is none of your mauly-pauly, good-for-nothing items in the list of humanity. He exhibits, besides, a striking originality of phiz and phrase, which, had I time to develop them, might furnish some peculiar and valuable hints to the statuary and rhetorician.

My uncle Ben and his biographic nephew are as true friends as ever shook hands or eat salt together. I am unable to tell from what his regard for me arose; but as for myself, I will candidly acknowledge that I have felt a particular esteem for my worthy kin ever since he dandled me on his knee to the tune of "Wha'll be king but Charley," and filled my pockets with oranges, and gave me a Barlow knife, which was the miniature fac-simile of a saw. This esteem has since been occasionally enhanced by his bestowal of sundry other presents of greater moment. Nor have I been wanting in endeavours to perpetuate his kind-heartedness to myself; but, on the contrary, I have manifested much diligence in procuring for him various articles, such as Indian relics, rare shrubs, curious shells, antiquated shoe-buckles, and black-letter tones, the acquisition of which has afforded him unbounded gratification. You must know, by the way, that he is a great admirer of natural history, and that his enthusiastic attachment to this science partakes very much of the character of lunacy. I have known him descend for a full hour upon the configuration of a gnat, and talk some half a dozen hearers asleep while analyzing a buttercup. In fact, he loves nature as a man does his wife, because she is a part of himself, and redolent of sweet tones and pleasant associations, and fair to look upon withal. Consequently, his feelings not unfrequently betray him into the "fine-frenzy" mood, and then he drinks gin and water, and recklessly commits the sin of poetry, as if it were a light transgression and easily to be repented of. He delights in playing crambo, carries a rhyming dictionary in his pocket, and has written acrostics on all his neighbours, saving and excepting Miss Hetty Mudge, whose name he declares to be altogether unacrosticable, and Mr. Napoleon Bonaparte Laurelworthy, upon whom he thinks seriously of perpetrating an epic. His table is continually haunted by three or four albums, those fashionable drag-nets for ever cast abroad in the current of modern society, to fish up for the longings of vanity whatever veracious compliments may be floating therein; yet he does not consider them a bore, but a means of recreation and an opportunity for poetic display. His scrap-book is a veritable literary curiosity, and his portefeuille is worth a score of Bodleian libraries. Apropos! reader, didst never have a glimpse of a poet's portfolio? Then thou hast not seen the eighth wonder of the world. I know of nothing to which to compare it. It presents to my mind, however, a better idea of a microcosm than any thing else with which I am acquainted. Intellectual landscapes, of every description, sketched by the fairy pencils of imagination, and replete with the graces of taste, are here spread out to the mind's eye of the favoured spectator. Here he may survey the Alps and Andes of intellect—the high and mighty monuments of genius, upreared in its hour of creative energy in silent mockery of the destroyer time. As the beholder turns away from these pinnacles of thought, other scenes less magnificent, but radiant with beauty, come thronging on his enraptured vision. As fancy introduces him to her varied creations, a thousand joyous emotions which the miseries of the world have pent up in his bosom, gush out like the waters of a full and deep fountain. She points to the haunts of youth, and anon the golden sands of boyhood are again running their sunny lapse, as he mingles in the rush and about of holiday merriment, or sits scarce breathing in the fire-side ring, while the tales of the good genii go round. She points to the scenes of manhood, and he feels himself again girded with strength for whatever trials may await him by flood or field, and stands forth ready to grapple with wrong or temptation as with a bearded foe. She spreads around him the waste of age—dark, wintry, and verdureless—and he feels the death-damp gathering chillily upon his bosom—that the grasshopper is a burden, and that ere long life's silver cord will be loosed, and its golden bowl broken. Fancy can effect all this by the magic of a poet's portfolio. Yet must he be a genuine fondling of the muse, or we turn with disgust from the fairy land to which we have been transported; for, instead of the goodly creations which anticipation promised, and which we have a right to expect, we find we have been mocked with artificial flowers, devoid of fragrance. The mirage vanishes, and lo, in place of the fruits and fountains we have nothing to console us but barrenness and drought. I cannot at this time give my readers an introduction to the sanctum in which my redoubted uncle has enshrined the glories of his rhythmical lucubrations, but by and by I may have an opportunity to gratify all reasonable curiosity on this subject.

I always make it a point to visit my uncle Ben during the spring and autumn, ever sure of a hospitable reception, and a good store of amusement at his unassuming mansion, which he has with equal modesty and tact at nomenclature, yeclapt "Copee-cottage." It stands on a little eminence within the curvature of a beautiful stream, and is surrounded with almost every variety of tree and bush, from the lofty sycamore to the tiny rhododendron that scarcely shades the violets below. The house is of an octagonal form, and a large elm being situated at each angle, it is almost entirely hidden from view in the circumambient mass of leaves and branches, in which for years many a familiar and half-domesticated bird has built its nest and reared its young unmolested. In fact every living thing that finds entrance to the premises of my worthy relative is suffered to remain and participate of his bounty. For this reason he is always surrounded by a multitude of pets—tame robins, tame crows, tame squirrels, et id omne genus, which, though my utter abomination every where else, I can albeit endure at Copee-cottage with tolerable equanimity, since their presence affords its eccentric but warm-hearted proprietor a pleasing opportunity of gratifying his ostentatious benevolence.

I have said that my good uncle manifests a peculiar originality in expressing his thoughts—a sort of words that breathe emphasis, united with great sentimentality. It was on a late visit at his mansion that he uttered, among other memorabilia, the laconic sentence at the head of this article—"Keep thy lips buttoned, boy." There is a little anecdote connected with the apothegm, which may not prove uninteresting, and I will therefore presume on the reader's pardon for inserting it. It was on a charming May morning, while last at Copee-cottage, that my aunt Deborah requested me to accompany her, for the purpose of viewing some late improvement in her brother's garden. As we were returning, my aunt stopped at a little arbour, to arrange some truant vines. I walked on to a small clump of roses, in order to make a bouquet for the good-hearted dame, and while carelessly plucking the blossoms, I received a slight wound from a hidden thorn. I had just commenced a bitter exclamation against all Flora's favourites, when my uncle Ben, who overheard my anathema, gave me the button-on-lip advice. Now, happily, he dislikes all parade of fashion, and it so happened that just at this moment the stage-coach was passing, out of which a city belle was endeavouring to thrust her pretty face, in order to obtain a better view of the cottage. But her endeavours were in vain, for a vast expanse of bonnet absolutely precluded the possibility of the undertaking; so adjusting the discomposed dunstable as well as her long arms would permit, and receiving a kind assistance from a friend at the opposite end of the carriage, she resumed her former position. My uncle Ben witnessed the discomfiture of the fair damsel, and while his little gray eyes emitted a sort of fire-fly phosphorescence, he exclaimed, "Ah, fashion, fashion! thou idiot-born of pride and folly—thou destroyer of female loveliness—thou betrayer of nature's symmetry and simplicity—thou most villainous pioneer, and abettor of physicians—thou"—but just then my aunt Deborah, who had heard all, and, by the way, had that very morning despatched an order to Mrs. Cantelo for one of her latest and most exquisite inexpressibles, came up, and with a good-natured box on the ear, cried, "Keep thy lips buttoned, brother"—and my uncle Ben was silent. EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

July 20, 1830.

DEAR SIR—Yours of the nineteenth instant, with the last numbers of your unrivalled miscellany, and the canister of No. 37, (for which receive my thanks) all arrived in due course of mail. But what in the name of every thing sacred in correspondence could have induced you to put my rambling epistle into print? You editors are sad fellows; and private confidence, I see, must succumb before your insatiate desire to minister for the public good "things new and old." I pardon you, however, in my case, as the transformation of names, and withholding the actual place of my sojourn, puts the parties concerned beyond the reach of detection; and I question much whether my clumsy portraits would even be recognised by the veritable originals for whom they were taken.

You ask me to continue my "sketches of character"—a request that I shall comply with more readily as it happens to suit my present humour—and I really consider the groups who are at my disposal, worthy the attempt, albeit they may be executed by an unskilful hand.

I slightly mentioned in my last "the maiden aunt" who forms a very prominent figure in our family collection. Gallantry and her own inestimable merits give her the precedence in this detail. Miss Experience H. is the only sister of my worthy entertainer. She belongs to that much traduced portion of the human family who retain the juvenile appellation of Miss, joined to their original patronymic, until age almost precludes the possibility of ever obtaining any change in their condition. Miss Experience, however, is not one of your "tart-tongued" spinsters, who wage universal war on their species, and whose sole employment is sipping hyson, mangling reputations, and rearing pet animals, as pugnacious as themselves. She, on the contrary, is the very essence of good-will and kindly feeling, and (bating a little feminine vanity, the result of once possessing a fine person, which, if report lies not, produced some havoc amongst the beaux of her youthful days) she is a well-informed, sensible woman. But it is in the universal good opinion she holds of all the world in which consists her peculiarity. Every mischievous urchin in the village is under her especial protection, and fearlessly plays off his pranks, being sure of escaping punishment through the intercession of "aunt Experience"—nay, even idlers and vagabonds find favour in her sight. "Poor misguided creatures," she will say, "they deserve our pity." The foibles and the follies of her friends, I really believe, only the more closely endear them to her. Of this I am certain, she can extract subjects for praise out of the self-importance of my friend H., the Xantippe qualities of her sister-in-law, and the eccentricities and pretensions of her eldest niece. The domestics of the family are all sheltered under her ample and protecting wing; and I believe are only kept together by her peace-making disposition, for they are all grey in their service, yet continually threatening to quit it, owing to the constant ill-humours of Madame H. One of these useful personages I must make you acquainted with, as belonging to a class now almost extinct. An old negro who acts in the complicated capacity of valet to his master—butler in the dining-room and cellar, and factotum in every other department of the household—his age is coeval with my friend H's. They have never been separated from childhood, and it is the boast of Mr. Cesar, that "massa could not do any thing without his helping hand." You may suppose he is an important personage in our domestic establishment. He even presumes to curb the harsh humours of his honoured mistress—the cunning rogue knows, however, that a salvo is always ready prepared by Miss Experience; and many a hard dollar passes from the said lady to the pouch of the apparently irritated blackee, when the outpourings of Madame H.'s wrath call forth the conciliatory interference of her more patient sister-in-law.

As our party to the springs is now made up, and we start on Monday next, I cannot close my letter without introducing you to a gentleman who is to form one of our compagnons du voyage; no less a personage than the celebrated Adonijah Ganduluch, par courtesy an M. D., whose fame as a medical practitioner is spread far and wide in this remote district. Report gives to the learned doctor a very humble commencement of his professional pursuits; he has, however, by dint of perseverance, and that happy faculty which stumbles at nothing difficult or dangerous in his art, contrived to gain the entire practice of the neighbourhood, and to fill his coffers with the fruits of his constantly exercised medical skill.

Of his talents I cannot speak in very high terms of praise, for I do believe the sapient gentleman is in a most happy state of ignorance of the higher parts of his profession; and confess nothing has amused me more than to see him writhing in agony under the learned questions and harangues of Miss Elmir, who takes especial delight in testing the extent of his chemical and physiological attainments. Miss Experience is a powerful auxiliary to the learned man in these encounters. She has always an excuse for the evident ignorance he displays, by referring to the well-known axiom, that "doctors disagree," or, "that one discovery in chemistry only serves to falsify previous ones;" and then by citing some successful case in the doctor's course of practice, victory before doubtful generally terminates in favour of her favourite practitioner.

By the by, I am not surprised to perceive that some god-fies have been attacking you. Courage, man and! It only proves the excellence of your labours. Ignorance and inability stalk unheeded through the community; but let genius and originality prove successful, and the whole herd of carping critics and disappointed would-be "oracles" are on the qui vive to crush their efforts. Believe me yours,
H. I.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE TWO GRAVES.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE LAST.

WHATEVER benevolence or delicacy could suggest to the two occupants of the secluded abode in which the lovely stranger had breathed her last, was alertly and quickly performed. During the hours which wore away while employed in the discharge of their melancholy office, the stranger continued absent; and, though the shades of evening had begun to descend, still he returned not. George Davis, accompanied by the physician of the distant village, had in the meanwhile reached his home, and at length, becoming alarmed on account of the protracted absence of his guest, sallied out in search of him. With that ready skill in wood-craft, and quick perception of indications not visible to unpractised eyes, which form a striking feature in the knowledge of our frontier settlers, George Davis for some time pursued the trail of the stranger through the grass, and among the decayed leaves of the forest, without difficulty. At length, however, owing to the changed nature of the soil, and the increasing darkness of the hour, the tracks became less and less distinct, and just at this time, as if to baffle and render ineffectual his benevolent intentions, the trail, which had hitherto pursued an onward direction, became perplexed, winding, and intricate, like that which would be made by one deeply intoxicated. George Davis stooped to the earth, from time to time, that he might more closely examine the appearance of the leaves; and as he proceeded from one fancied trace of a footprint to another, with a pace at each succeeding step slower and slower, his brow began to show the feelings that were working within, and at length exhibited so much doubt and anxiety, that the physician, who had accompanied him, had no difficulty in perceiving it, although naturally not one of the most acute and observant of men.

"Why do you pause, George?" said he at length, as his companion stood stock still, and showed in his countenance that he did not know which way to proceed.

"Why you see, doctor," answered the other, in the embarrassed tone of one who does not like to own the difficulty in which he finds himself placed, "why you see, doctor, I've done a smart chance of trailing in my time, and can follow on a blind trail as far and sure nor [as] any other man 'twixt this and the Big Bend; but this here trail's a little too much, even for old Kentuck'. You see, here I stood fernest that very gum-tree half an hour ago, and since we tied our horses down in the hollow, we have twice passed under yon very cotton-tree, that now looks as bright and gay among the dark leaves of these cypresses, in this confounded swamp, as if what little daylight there is would shine only on it."

The doctor cast his eyes around, and seemed himself to recollect that they had passed over the same ground before. He ventured an acknowledgment to that effect, to which George Davis hastily replied—

"Don't I know it, doctor; you can't learn me. There," said he, as he parted the grass and showed a red dirt in the soil beneath, "there's your own track, your own and wide spur-strap. I know it well. I could count every peg in your shoes. And here, you see, is my mockasin. It's the very ground we have been travelling over this half hour."

"But if the stranger has been thus going round and round," said the physician, "he cannot be far from us. What is this long streak in the grass, which goes off in the direction of yonder sycamore? May not this be his trail?"

"It looks more like the trail of a dying buffalo, as he staggers forward when the lead has entered his heart. And yet," said Davis, who had stooped to examine the appearance which he had already twice passed by as something not made by the foot of man—"and yet," said he, "it is a fresh track, and may lead to something. We will try it, at any rate. Follow, doctor."

The trail which the woodman had now struck in was, indeed, that of the unfortunate stranger. He had wandered forth into the woods unknowing whither he was going; and his anguished thoughts preying upon a frame already much reduced by anxiety and watching, produced a violent fever. While the paroxysm lasted he continued to penetrate the forest with a vigorous and rapid stride, thus only ensuring a greater degree of weakness when the diseased action of his blood should subside. His step at length began to falter, and his eyes to reel; but still he kept onward. The woods danced and turned before his dizzied sight; the heavens, with all their glorious masses of clouds crimsoned by the setting sun, whirled around, and the firm earth seemed actually to tremble beneath his step, and to be uneven and undulated, as if agitated by billows like those of the ocean. Still he kept staggering along, until at last his exhausted nature could endure the struggle of powerful and contending emotions no longer, and pitching violently forward, like the plunge of a falling steed, he fell suddenly to the ground. In this condition he was found by the benevolent individuals who had been in search of him, and borne back in a state of insensibility to the cabin. The physician, though he had arrived too late to afford any assistance to one of the unfortunate strangers, found yet a fit subject for his art in the other. Such aid as his skill suggested was immediately rendered, and so effectual were the means he resorted to, that on the succeeding day, by the time the preparations for the funeral were accomplished, his patient was not only restored to his senses, but so much improved as to insist, though much against the advice and remonstrances of the benevolent physician, on accompanying the body to the grave. He hastily arose, and dressing himself in his best garb with scrupulous nicety, accompanied the melancholy group to the place of interment. The spot chosen was on the summit of a natural mound, but a short distance from the cabin. The grave had been dug beneath the wide-spreading arms of a lordly sycamore, and the rude coffin was lowered into its place by the hands of the back-woodman and of his nearest neighbour, who had come ten miles on foot through the forest, to be present, and render what assistance he could on the melancholy occasion. A short and fervent prayer was offered up by the physician, which was listened to by every hearer with unaffected reverence. A slight shudder passed over the stranger, as the first clod fell upon the coffin, and a close observer might have noticed an involuntary motion, as if he had intended to spring into the grave, and be buried, the quick with the dead. But if any such thought passed through his mind, it was instantly checked; and raising his tall and manly form to its full height, and tightly compressing his lips, as if resolved that no expression of human weakness should escape him, he continued to the end of the agonising ceremony a calm, and to all outward appearance, the least moved spectator of the scene. When the doctor afterwards approached him, and expressed in brief and simple terms his condolence, and exhorted him to bear his bereavement with fortitude, he listened to him with composure and respectful attention; and by an eloquent pressure of his hand at the conclusion, returned his acknowledgments for the interest he had manifested. On the return of the group to the cabin of George Davis, he accompanied them with as firm a step as any; and one whose judgment of the heart is gathered solely from external circumstances, would have thought that the grief of the stranger had dissipated itself in its first violent burst. One better skilled to read the human character, however, would not have failed to perceive many evidences of a heart wounded beyond the power of even time—the great mediciner of minds diseased—to heal.

From the day that the being, in whose fate his own seemed inextricably interwoven, had been consigned to earth, although he indulged not in sighs, nor betrayed any of the usual indications of grief, yet he evidently wasted away, and without any specific disease was rapidly following her to the tomb. George Davis, who was touched by the situation of his young and heart-broken guest, readily acceded to a wish which he had expressed of remaining a dweller in his cabin for a considerable time; and notwithstanding the repugnance which he had all his life indulged to society, he yet became so attached to the stranger as not to feel well at ease except when in his company. The guest humoured him in his growing attachment so far, that he would even sometimes go out with him on his hunting excursions, and listened, or seemed to listen, to his many curious tales of Indian warfare and border exploits. But the truth was, though the unhappy young man conformed himself in outward manners and conduct to the circumstances in which he was placed, there was one hoarded thought locked up in his heart, which was fast wasting the spring of existence. This was indeed,

"One fatal remembrance—one sorrow that throws
Its bleak shade alike o'er our joys and our woes;
To which life nothing darker or brighter can bring,
For which joy hath no balm, and affliction no sting."

Like Henry the first, of whom it is recorded that after the death of his son, Prince William, who perished in a shipwreck off the coast of Normandy, he was never seen to smile again; so the melancholy guest of George Davis was lost for ever to joy, and incapable of wearing its semblance. He was not moody, and not often abstracted. He mixed freely in the pursuits of the family, conversed on their own topics with the mother and daughter, and repaid the stories of the back-woodman with some tales of sea-adventures, of battle, storm, and wreck, in which, though he never named himself, it seemed evident that he had borne a part. But though he thus endeavoured to repay the attentions of his benevolent entertainers, and sedulously refrained from giving any vent to the sorrow that was consuming him, he was obviously growing, day by day, more attenuated and pale. Every morning and evening he was missed for a time from the cabin, and it was well known at what point the rambles in which he indulged at those hours terminated. During the remainder of the day he employed himself either in one of the ways that have been indicated, or in writing in a large volume, which he always carefully returned to his trunk. In this way several months glided away. The gloomy season of winter had passed by, and spring, with her happy call was beginning to awaken the earth from its long and dreary torpor. The goodwife of George Davis began to fancy that the heart of the stranger might be revived by the same sweet influences which had already brought back its smile to the cheerless face of nature; and even fancied that she saw indications of returning cheerfulness in his countenance. But if this was anything more than fancy, it was but as the hectic glow which precedes dissolution. He had gone forth one pleasant evening, according to his wont, and had proceeded on his accustomed route towards the grave of his lost companion. As he passed over the rude fence which inclosed the little plantation of George Davis, he was met by the honest back-woodman, who, at the same time happened to be returning from the forest. They saluted each other with a friendly greeting, and each passed on towards his object; but, though there was nothing unusual in this occurrence, it yet rested like a weight upon George Davis's mind. Whether there was something peculiar in the tone of his guest's voice, or in the expression of his eye, or in his general demeanour, he could not tell, but long after his return home he continued to ponder on the interview with a troubled spirit, and frequently walked out into the open air to listen for the returning footsteps of his lodger. The usual time of his absence at length expired, and still he returned not. The anxiety of George Davis now broke through the restraint which his sense of delicacy had hitherto imposed upon him, and he sallied forth, either to meet his guest, or to learn what had befallen him. As he receded further and further from his cabin, and still saw nothing of the other, his anxiety redoubled, and quickening his pace, he almost ran along the path which the stranger's frequent pilgrimages to the grave of his lost companion had made, till, reaching the spot, he there beheld him stretched upon the ground, partly across the hillock, beneath which his heart seemed to have been buried. It was in vain that George Davis called to him—that he shook him, and endeavoured to arouse him into consciousness. The life, which had long stood flickering on a point had gone out—the spirit had departed—and nothing but an unconscious, lifeless form was now left of the unhappy stranger.

It would be needless to dwell on the circumstances of the funeral. The body was interred in the spot where life had deserted it, and the two graves are yet pointed out to strangers who pass through the flourishing town which has since grown up around them. They have lately been encircled by a neat paling, and two headstones have been added to them, the one bearing the name of Henry, and the other Ellen. Beyond the mere fact that such were their names, nothing of the history of the two strangers ever transpired. The trunk which was left by Henry contained, besides a very small sum of money, only a few clothes, some of which seemed to mark their owner as having been a naval officer, and the manuscript volume which has already been mentioned. This volume exhibited evidences of considerable literary talent, and several of its descriptions of sea adventures, sketches of poetry, and other matters, are perhaps worthy of a place in a miscellany like the one in which we have recorded this brief memorial of their author. We may hereafter open it for the amusement of the readers of the Mirror.

Of George Davis little remains to be said. After the death of Henry his fondness for hunting, and the other pursuits and modes of frontier life, gradually declined, and his aversion for society underwent a proportionate diminution. He soon began to see without discomfort the tide of emigration roll through the valley of the Mississippi, like its own mighty rivers; and he even evinced but little displeasure when the noise of the axe and the hammer, and other unusual sounds, broke in upon the stillness of his own immediate neighbourhood. A great land speculator bought a tract of land adjoining the patch which George occupied, and perceiving its eligibility as a site for a town, he endeavoured to add to it the plantation of the woodman. But George had become wedded to the spot, and perseveringly rejected all his offers. The consequence has been, that he has seen the forest disappear around him, and a flourishing town grow up in its place, while his own land has increased in value by the proximity, until it is now worth more by the foot than it once was by the acre. In the rapid and astonishing changes which he has witnessed, his own character has also undergone much alteration. He has lost almost every trace of the habits of the hunter and recluse, and there is scarcely one of the old inhabitants of the town, of which he is now one of the wealthiest citizens, more fond of the social circle than George Davis. His daughter, a fine, matronly and accomplished woman, (accomplished, at least, in the best sense—the housewife sense of the word,) was married several years ago to a lawyer, who had settled in that neighbourhood from one of the eastern states. Though he is a yankee, old George is very fond of his son-in-law, and fairly idolizes the curly-headed, rosy-cheeked grandchildren he has given to him. The son-in-law himself seems extremely happy, and well he may be; for he has an excellent wife, his business is as good as a western country lawyer could desire, and in a few years—though I hope the day is still distant—he will fall heir to George Davis's large estate. In the meanwhile he is very popular in the part of the country where he resides, and there is some talk of sending him to congress at the next election. Most of the particulars of this narrative, as well as the manuscript volume I have spoken of, I obtained from Mr. Davis himself, during a recent visit to Ohio; and the reader may depend on their accuracy, for there is no man in the whole western country whose veracity stands higher than that of old George Davis. MUSIC.

WHERE THE BEE SUCKS.

In the last number of the Mirror we furnished our readers with a beautiful melody from the Tempest. Having free access to the score of that work, we now present in continuation, another selection. The favourite song, "Where the bee sucks," is too well known, and too generally a favourite with the public, not to be a welcome guest on the piano-fortes of our fair amateurs, and a closer acquaintance will only enhance its value.

A few words may not be amiss on the subject of this unique composition. Many of our readers have seen the Tempest at the Park theatre, and all have read it. They will consequently recollect that in the last act Prospero bestows on his faithful spirit, Ariel, as a requital for service, the gift of liberty.

"Ariel. Was this well done, sir?
Prospero. Bravely, my Ariel. I shall miss thee much—yet, take thy liberty, my chick. Away! and to the elements be free!
Ariel. My ever gracious master, thanks."

The song which we now publish follows. A more joyous and light-hearted melody never gave force to more original and poetic words. Can any thing give such minute ideality to the ephemeral and gossamer-like qualities of the amiable spirit as his own description in this song, of his intended pleasures and enjoyments?

"Where the bee sucks there lurk I;
 In a cowslip's bell I lie;
 There I couch, when owls do cry,
 On a bat's back do I fly,
 After sun-set merrily:
 Merrily, merrily shall I live now,
 Under the blossom that hangs on the bough."

The reader, or one who attends the representation of the Tempest, really pities Prospero for the loss of his "airy minister," and feels happy at Ariel's grateful assurance:

"And for the freedom I enjoy in air,
 I will be still your Ariel, &c."

Whatever may your happiness concern,
 From your still faithful Ariel you shall learn."

As a composition, this song is excellent. Sound and sense throughout are inseparable. The modulation is not very extensive or peculiar, indeed the subject does not demand that it should be so. As a piece for orchestral accompaniment, the opportunity for beautiful and playful imitations by the wind instruments, is frequent, and the question and answer maintained between the voice and the band, tends greatly to the assistance of the melody without crowding it. The instrumentation, of course, at this time of day, is vastly improved and widely different from what it was nearly two centuries ago, when this air was written; but as played by the Park theatre band, no liberties have been taken with the harmony of Purcell. SELECT POETRY.

THE FIRST AND THE LAST CAPTIVE.

SHE sat in silence on the floor,
 Her raven hair unbound
 Spread her pale cheek and bosom o'er,
 And swept the very ground:
 Her eye was dim and downward cast,
 And now and then a sigh,
 Within her heart till then locked fast,
 Heaved deep and bitterly.

It was a splendid palace-room,
 Around with tapestry spread,
 And, chasing back the twilight gloom,
 A lamp its radiance shed;
 Faintly it lit that pensive face,
 Where strong and still despair
 Had fixed its heavy darkening trace,
 Stiffening each feature fair.

A pencil was within her hand,
 And carelessly it moved,
 Scarce under her own will's command
 Along the floor it roved;
 At length the letters, slowly traced,
 Stood like a wizard's spell
 (Even yet they are not quite effaced)
 "Remember Isabelle!"

She sat awhile, then started up,
 To her cheek rushed back the blood;
 She dashed away the silver cup
 Of wine that near her stood;
 She leant beside the window high,
 She grasped its iron bars;
 Whilst, pitying her, from the azure sky,
 Looked down the silent stars.

It was in vain—her hands, too weak,
 Forced not those bars apart,
 And down she fell with one wild shriek,
 That seemed to burst her heart;
 Still she lay through the night hours mirk—
 They came at morning tide,
 And found that Death had done his work—
 So their first captive died.

Years passed away—they brought again
 A captive to the tower;
 Now many a dark and bloody stain
 Profaned the palace bower.
 The tapestry had fallen down,
 The golden lamp was quenched;
 From the cornice rich the silver crown
 Of mimic flowers was wrenched.

Their captive was an aged man,
 Grief on his forehead high,
 And on his lips, so thin and wan,
 Tales but of misery.
 His love, so beautiful and young,
 Years gone, from him was torn,
 And he had withered, yet thus long
 His load of life had borne.

They placed him in this prison strong—
 "Ay, be it so," he cried;
 "I care not—in yon heaven ere long I'll meet my murdered bride."
 He cast his eyes to heaven, and then
 Down on the floor they fell,
 And he read, while thrilled each aged vein—
 "Remember Isabelle!"

It was enough—the nerves that held
 Through all that life's decay,
 No longer by his pride compelled,
 Resigned at once their sway.
 He perished the last captive there;
 And still the peasants tell,
 At eve these words sound through the air—
 "Remember Isabelle!"

NEW SONGS.

THE PORTRAIT.

Ah! let me look upon thy face,
 Fling back thy clustering hair;
 It is a happiness to gaze
 On any thing so fair.

'Tis such spring-morning loveliness—
 The blushing and the bright—
 Beneath whose sway, unconsciously,
 The heaviest heart grows light.

The crimson flushing up the rose
 When some fresh wind has past,
 Parting the boughs—just such a hue
 Upon thy cheek is cast.

Thy golden curls, where sunshine dwells
 As in a summer home;
 The brow whose snow is pure and white
 As that of ocean foam.

For grief has thrown no shadow there,
 And worldliness no stain;
 It is as only flowers could grow
 In such a charmed domain.

I would thy fate were in my hands;
 I'd bid it but allow
 Thy future to be like thy past,
 And keep thee just as now.

THE COMPANIONS.

With thy step in the stirrup, one cup of bright wine,
 We'll drink the success of thy sabre and mine:
 When as boys we took down the bright arms from the wall,
 And rushed in mock combat, around the old hall,
 We longed in true warfare the weapons to wield:
 Now the foe is before us, and yonder the field.

We'll onward together, thy steed beside mine,
 Our blow be as one when we rush on the line;
 Should one fall, one only, the other will try
 A step for his vengeance, another to die—
 On the neck of the fallen yield up his last breath,
 And the vow of their boyhood be cancelled by death.

But rather this evening as victors we'll ride:
 O'er the field of our conquest, the place of our pride,
 With our names on each lip, but named only as one—
 'Tis the glory of either what each may have done.
 Now on for the harvest that darkens yon plain,
 We come back in honour, or come not again.

THE ABSENT.

There is no music on the strings
 Of her neglected lute;
 Her white hand wakes no more its chords—
 Her bird-like voice is mute.
 She wreathes no flowers for her vase,
 No roses for her hair—
 She lingers in her favourite grove,
 But her heart is not there.

The dancers gather in the hall—
 She is amid the band,
 With vacant smile and wandering glance
 For those who claim her hand.
 Her eyes fill with unbidden tears,
 Her cheek is pale with care—
 Lonely amid the festival,
 For her heart is not there.

She broods above her own dead thoughts,
 As o'er her nest the dove;
 Memory and hope own but one dream—
 Her first young dream of love.
 She hears a gallant trumpet sound,
 A banner sweeps the air;
 She sees a knight lead on the charge,
 And oh! her heart is there!

THE DEPARTED.

Set thy spur to thy steed, thy sail to the wind,
 You may leave the far vale and the mountain behind:
 Like the storm o'er the south in thy flight thou mayst be
 But where mayst thou fly from the memory of me?

The struggle, the pleasure, the toil, and the strife,
 May fill up thy days with the hurry of life;
 But night cometh lonely o'er land and o'er sea,
 And in silence and shadow I still am with thee.

With no rose on my cheek, with no rose in my hair,
 But cold as the love whose remembrance I bear,
 Breathing vows that are broken, and hopes that are fled,
 A voice breaks thy slumber—the voice of the dead.

Let thy loveliest slave lull thy sleep with her strain—
 Ay, drain the red wine-cup—it all is in vain;
 From the haunt of thy midnight I will not depart,
 For thy guilt is my power—my home is thy heart!

MEMORY.

A voice of gentle singing
 Went by upon the wind,
 And an echo sweet is ringing—
 The thought is left behind.

'Twas a song of other feelings
 That belonged to other days,
 Ere I marked the stern revelations
 Of the curtain time must raise.

When my heart and step were lighter
 Than they'll ever be again,
 And the dream of hope was brighter—
 For I believed it then.

That sweet song was of gladness,
 Yet it has left with me
 A shadow one half sadness,
 One half dear memory.

Though the darkness of November
 Around my heart be thrown,
 Yet how pleasant to remember
 The spring hours once its own!

LITERARY NOTICES.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

National Portrait Gallery of Illustrious and Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century. With Memoirs by William Jerden, Esq. No. XIII. King's edition. London. Fisher, Son, and Co.

THE great success of this work has induced the publishers to issue a quarto edition, with proof impressions of the plates, distinguished by the name of "the king's edition." We avail ourselves of the appearance of this thirteenth number to extract from the memoir of Mr. Canning the following anecdotes, which we think cannot fail to be interesting to our readers.

The first is in illustration of the statement that it was chiefly attributable to Mr. Canning's persuasion that the princess of Wales was induced to quit England in 1813.

"The writer of this article one day happened to wait at Gloucester Lodge while the princess of Wales had an interview with Mr. Canning; and on her retiring, was shewn into the room which her royal highness had left. He found Mr. Canning standing by the fire-place, very deeply affected; and after some matters of less consequence, the conversation turned on the then engrossing topic of the day. In the course of this, to him so interesting scene, he accidentally leaned his arm upon the chimney-piece; when Mr. Canning (who was describing the forlorn situation of her royal highness as she had just painted it to him) exclaimed with great emotion—'Stop! your sleeve is now wet with a princess's tears.' It was true—her royal highness had been weeping there over her deserted condition; and we believe that within a few hours of this time, Mr. Canning, moved by her distress, had applied for, and obtained, the frigate which bore her from the English shore."

The next relates to the appointment of Mr. Canning as premier.

"It can, alas, be no breach of etiquette or betrayed confidence now to record how powerfully Mr. Canning was affected by his majesty's behaviour on this exciting occasion. On the succeeding day, when he described it to the writer, he was almost overcome by the emotions called up by the bare recollection of the king's goodness. They were alone in St. James's; and the important subject of the resignation of Mr. Canning's late colleagues, the propositions for the choice of new members to the cabinet, the course of policy to be adopted on certain leading questions—had been considered in a manner worthy of the frank and manly natures of both the parties; when his majesty, who had a while leaned upon the arm of the chair on which Mr. Canning sat, held out the royal sign of his entire confidence, and gave him his hand to kiss, accompanied by expressions so sincere and gratifying, that the deeply touched minister could only drop on his knee and impress on it the silent oath of his utter devotedness and love. We could wish, if it were possible, to paint an historical picture of so interesting a scene, and one which ought never to be forgotten when the patriotic virtues of either the monarch or the subject are remembered."

The last anecdote that we shall quote shows the amiable and benevolent feelings of Mr. Canning in a very striking point of view.

"The writer was one day with him when either the newspapers or some private person gave an account of a woman with a family of children in mourning having watched the egress of Lord Eldmouth (then home secretary) from his official residence, and thrown herself, bathed in tears, at his feet, while the children clung to his dress, and implored, in the most melting tones, mercy for a husband and a father, who was under sentence of death, and about to be executed. The sentence, it appeared, was irrevocable, and the noble lord had literally to be torn from the despairing group. We well remember Mr. Canning's observation—"I would not be in that situation, exposed to such an affliction, for all the power and influence possessed by all the ministry."

The Fortunes of Perkin Warbeck; a Romance. By the author of "Frankenstein." Three volumes. London, 1830. Colburn and Bentley.

Full of strange incident and mysterious interest, Perkin Warbeck, either as the last of the Plantagenets' ill-fated race, or else as the most pleasing picturesque of impostors, led a life admirably adapted for the novelist; and Mrs. Shelley, taking up the belief that he really was duke of York, flings over her subject all the attraction belonging to the innocent and unfortunate. The story is so ill calculated for extract, that we must content ourselves by commending the good use our fair author has made of her materiel, which she has invested with the grace and excitement of her own poetical imagination. The character of Monia is a conception as original as it is exquisite.

The True Plan of a Living Temple; or, Man considered in his proper Relation to the ordinary Occupations and Pursuits of Life. By the author of the "Morning and Evening Sacrifice," &c. &c. Three volumes, 12mo. Edinburgh, 1830, Oliver and Boyd. London, Simpkin and Marshall.

The author has acquired much popularity on religious subjects, which these volumes are well calculated to increase. They possess a good deal of enthusiasm, together with rational piety; and are eminently deserving of praise for their effort at dispersing those gloomy views which are entertained by certain sects, and which would convert this fair and natural world into a dungeon fit only for hypocrites and ascetics. The notes and illustrations, which occupy nearly all the third volume, are particularly interesting. Literary Gazette.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

New Publications.—The press of this country teems with new publications. That they are all of equal value will not be contended; nay, it must be admitted, that as tares will spring up with the wheat, so many unprofitable and even noxious volumes will, at times, be issued. It may, however, be asserted with confidence and pride, that the proportion of the latter is incomparably smaller than it has been at any former period. The taste of the public has evidently undergone a marked improvement; and, even in the lighter departments of literature, seldom does a wholly useless, much more seldom an immoral composition, offend the judicious or anxious critic. A few examples, drawn from various specimens on our table, will, in part, evince the truth of this statement.

Prize Essay on Alcoholic and Narcotic Substances.—Professor Hitchcock is the author of this valuable and practical document, and great is his merit for having accomplished his undertaking in such a masterly and pertinent manner. No idle rhodomontade swells his sentences, to remind you of a schoolboy's declamation, or a furious bigot's ravings; no exaggeration starts up to disgust you with the overwrought zeal of blind enthusiasm or hypocritical cant. All is a plain unvarnished statement, such as is supported by the highest authorities of fact and reason. Philosophy is appealed to—prudence is invoked, and patriotism successfully roused to enlist jointly in direct and uncompromising hostility to the greatest destroyer which ever yet assailed the intellect, or the heart, or the body of man. There is no distorted medium introduced to give undue force to existing objects; they are presented in their naked native outlines, and left to make their own impression, unassisted by external accessories of embellishment or amplification. And callous must be the sensibility and palsied the judgment of that reader who can withhold sensation of horror at perusing the results here clearly stated for his inspection. It is indeed a fearful sign of the progress which the great foe to the health, the morals, and the understanding of men has already made, to witness the too general apathy with which the records of his destructive triumphs are daily, nay hourly regarded. And that man who flies from a contemplation of the horrors presented by the spectacle of intoxication, may tremble for himself! He is on the verge—another step, and he is gone for ever. Professor Hitchcock views the subject in every point from which a knowledge of the past and present may be rendered subservient to the improvement of the future. He discusses the question as a man of science, as a moralist, as an economist, and as a lover of his species; and the same conclusion still reverts upon him, that total abstinence is the only safeguard. We hope that every father of a family, that every brother, and that every son, will attentively read this essay. It is full of instruction and improvement.

Essays on the Public Charities of Philadelphia, &c. By M. Carey.—We have received from the truly benevolent author several hundred copies of a pamphlet bearing this title, and intended for gratuitous distribution. Its object is to vindicate benevolent societies from the charge of encouraging idleness, and to place, in a strong light, before an enlightened public, the sufferings and oppression under which the greater part of the females labour, who depend on their own industry for a support for themselves and children. Is it not strange that this subject should fail to attract the attention it deserves? If a mission to the Jews of Palestine or the coppered idolaters of Polynesia were proposed, how soon would the purses of the rich be opened. But our own native female, starving with her helpless children, calls aloud for relief, and there is none to help her! Those who are desirous of possessing themselves of this invaluable pamphlet, may obtain a copy gratis, by applying at this office.

The Journal of Law.—This is the title of a new periodical commenced at Philadelphia by an association of the members of the bar. It is published semi-monthly, and promises to be eminently useful in diffusing uniformity of knowledge among legal gentlemen in the different states.

The American Lancet.—The Medical Inquirer has changed its former modest appellation for this more piquant and threatening title. We have not heard however of its having drawn blood yet. The first intimation we have of its sanguinary effects shall be duly noticed.

The Arts.—The displays of genius and the progress of improvements in the numberless valuable arts which every where minister to our daily comforts, not less than to our fame and reputation as a people, affording as they do an animating theme of gratifying and instructive comment, are yet too little heeded by our statesmen and lawgivers. Even splendid exhibitions of skill, such as would have been deemed honourable had they been produced in those foreign workshops which command the united ingenuity and experience of the ablest artists, have in many instances received no more than a passing notice. These things show at once the difficulty of subduing our prejudices, and the injurious ascendancy which has been so long maintained among us by Europeans.

It would be impossible to go into an enumeration of only a small portion of the numerous fabrics and specimens of the handicrafts, most of which are of the more useful kind; though many could be named of exquisite workmanship, designed merely for ornament. Our object in adverting to subjects in which are involved the glory, honour, and real independence of our country, is to point the attention of our readers to an article which falls more particularly within our province, that of paper. This article, now produced in surprising quantities, and in a state of perfection which has called forth our highest admiration, and the unqualified commendations of competent judges throughout the Union, seems to have sprung into existence almost without experiment or preconcert. The art itself is of the highest importance, since neither public events nor private transactions could be known or recorded without it. From the infant who studies the form of letters, and through every class of society till we reach the exalted statesman, and jurist, and the accomplished scholar, all have an immediate and deep concern in whatever relates to the production of paper. And it is exceedingly gratifying to know, that no individual, however great may be the refinement of his taste, or however fastidious he may be in his notions, can fail to be suited. From the ample and magnificent sheet of elephant or columbian drawing, through the nameless grades and forms down to the delicate note paper, not larger than a lady's hand, richly perfumed and splendidly gilt and embellished, nothing is now wanting to complete the variety.

In addition to the strong recommendation which has been imparted to this valuable commodity, by the introduction of the most agreeable perfume in letter and note paper, the different samples now offered for sale exhibit all the variegated and charming colours of the rainbow, and are put up either in reams, half reams, or quarter reams, in a way at once the most tasteful and fanciful. Wove or laid, plain or hot-pressed, gilt, silvered, or mourning edged; white, cream, straw, (a light yellow) pink, skyblue, pale blue, with all the intervening shades, are at the command of the purchaser, and in parcels adapted to every convenience.

Our country has abundant cause to be proud of such improvements. Nor can it be necessary to say that all this is the effect of a praiseworthy spirit of enterprise and perseverance, combined with ample means, deep ingenuity, and profound skill, and to an extent that could scarcely have been anticipated. How can stronger claims to reward and encouragement be presented to an intelligent community? And what man will have the hardihood to declare that with such indisputable facts before his eyes we ought still to be tributary to Europeans for an article of such prime necessity? A commentary of this kind is worth a thousand idle speculations.

The Battery and Castle Garden.—Those who, like ourselves, are doomed to toil and moil in this pent up city, despite the hot weather and the alluring invitation of advertisements for excursions, have yet a source of consolation, and a refuge from despair, well worthy of praise and of general application. They have a promenade—of which the like may not be seen in other populous towns in this or the other hemisphere. They have the Battery, with its bowers and well gravelled walks, its beautiful prospects of land and water, of distant hills and cultivated vales, of castellated isles and romantic villas, of numerous vessels sailing to and fro, some bound, with broken and doubting hearts, on distant fearful voyages across the waste of waters; others returning, freighted with heavy cargoes and lightened spirits, to their native shore. There too in the silence, the ear may listen to the notes of martial drum and fife from each insulated fortalice, or fancy strain its creative powers to catch the sound which Knickerbocker so well describes, of the merry-making sable gentry of Communipaw, and hold communion with the days of old. Nor need the senses suffer or the limbs undergo fatigue in the open air. The garden opens its portals, and lowers its moated bridge to receive the welcome visitor; and many are the charms which await his presence within its once warlike walls. Music—song—flowers—exquisite refreshments, and the cool breezes of evening, wooed there as to an air tower, when not a breath stirs the atmosphere elsewhere—all these and more invite to a walk and a seat in this enchanting spot.

Castle Building.—However subversive this practice may be to a sober regulation of our lives, yet there is something inexpressibly fascinating in its indulgence, which none but your real castle-builder is capable of appreciating. How delightful is the feeling that with one wave of fancy's magic wand, riches, honours, happiness, and every good "that flesh is heir to" court your possession! How consolatory to the unfortunate wight who is to be enabled to create a fancied bank for himself, in which thousands are deposited at his credit; and who, inhabiting an attic, elevated far in the airy regions, in which he moost delights to revel, can transform the miserable tenement into a sumptuous palace, with all its gay appurtenances, and people it with beings exactly suited to his own fastidious taste. Rest assured, ye overgrown capitalists, that the actual possession of your enormous wealth does not convey so much real satisfaction as the enjoyment of this ideal bliss affords to the poor castle-builder, while he indulges in his harmless reveries. To speak a sober truth, the possession of this faculty furnishes to many, whom fortune sports her malice on, the only consolation they experience under the miseries to which they are subjected.

Weekly report of deaths.—The mortality of last week, especially among infants, was very great. There was the unusual number of two hundred and four deaths, of which one hundred and six were of children under two years old! Eleven persons died from drinking cold water.

WHERE THE BEE SUCKS.

Andante.

AS SUNG BY MRS. AUSTIN, IN THE CHARACTER OF ARIEL, IN SHAKESPEARE'S PLAY OF THE TEMPEST.

Where the bee sucks there lurk I, In a cow-slip's bed I lie, There I couch when owls do cry, when owls do cry, when owls do cry. On the bat's back do I fly, Af-ter sun-set mer-ri-ly; mer-ri-ly, af-ter sun-set mer-ri-ly. Mer-ri-ly, mer-ri-ly, shall I live now, Un-der the blos-som that hangs on the bough, Mer-ri-ly mer-ri-ly shall I live now, Un-der the blos-som that hangs on the bough, Un-der the blos-som that hangs on the bough.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CONTRASTS.

Why should the freeborn spirit, like a pearl
In ocean's caverns hid, for ever lie
Immured mid glooms of blighting ignorance?
It has all faculties for light, all power
To hurl its circling chains away, all right
To glory in its favoured birth, and call Ethereal essences its kin. Yet sleeps it on Through its dull life of torpitude, enervated,
Till on its vision breaks the kindly beams
Of intellectual light. Thrice blest the few,
The passing few, on whom that radiance falls!
Whate'er their lot, or poverty, or pain,
The world's base envy, or its baser scorn,
They are not wretched all, for known to them
The sacred bowers where happiness retires
To hold her court, and shower her bounteous gifts.

Lo, now the rustic to his toil goes forth
Sullen and sad, while 'neath his reckless foot
The blooms of summer die, the forest oak
Low bows its head, and in his strain uncouth
The song of birds is drowned. But different far
The son of science to his labour hies,
Whom stern subduing poverty compels
To wring his pittance from the stubborn clod.
The light of joy is on his open brow,
Though there the hand of toil has chronicled
The busy years in many a furrowed line.
The woodland bird, within his native bower,
Hath not a sprightlier air nor freer note,
Than he whom science for his rural task
Girds with a double strength. The humblest flower
That gems his pathway to the harvest field,
Fears not his frequent tread, but sweetly smiles
To catch one passing glance of his kind eye.
He has a sense for every charm around,
And while the sickle or the scythe he wields,

The mind is active in her secret cell
To note down each perception as it springs.
From the deep glens comes up the livelong day
His care-dispelling song, which echo loves,
In her wild haunts, to warble o'er and o'er,
Till every grove is eloquent with joy.
On the lone hills he is not all alone,
For there to him is sweet society
With birds and bubbling waters, and the sweep
Of harvests bending to the passing breeze;
And when the tempest spreads its banner folds
In darkness o'er the heavens, to him the voice
Of winds, and waves, and dying thunders speaks. P.

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

BY IANTHE.

Thou hast left us, and for ever :
The light of those sweet eyes
Will beam upon us never
Till we meet above the skies.
Life's sunshine was around thee ;
The world looked glad and bright ;
And the ties of love that bound thee,
Might have checked thy spirit's flight.
But the bonds that earth entwined
Are all too weak to stay,
When the far-off heaven shineth,
The spirit's upward way.

Thou hast left us, and for ever :
Thy smile of quiet mirth,
Thy low sweet voice shall never
Sooth our aching hearts on earth.
The joys thy presence cherished,
Like morning dreams have fled ;
And many a fair hope perished
Upon thy narrow bed.

For the love that we have borne thee
Thy loss we needs must weep ;
Yet even while we mourn thee,
We envy thee thy sleep.

VIEWS IN THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.

PARK ROW.

"Behold the picture—is it like?"

It is presumable that few readers are aware of the labour and difficulties attending our researches for facts connected with the subjects of the engravings which occasionally embellish the Mirror. Not only the dusty records of both "church and state," for nearly two centuries, are to be carefully examined, but also huge unwieldy folios of newspapers of more modern dates, together with old magazines and other antiquated periodicals, whose mouldering skeletons have partially survived the period of their ephemeral existence. In the chaste and classic language of the immortal Knickerbocker, "we have long beheld with great solicitude the early history of this venerable and ancient city, gradually slipping from our grasp, trembling on the lips of narrative old age, and, day by day, dropping piecemeal into the tomb." We are labouring to preserve some relics for the use and benefit of posterity.

Not only are the features of this city continually changing, but even its local appellations are constantly disappearing from the map. Where are now the streets which were once designated by terms of royalty, such as King, Queen, Crown, Princess, Duke, &c. ? Where are Smith-street, Kip-street, Golden-hill, Partition and Fair streets ? Where is Old Windmill-lane, and many other celebrated localities familiar to our forefathers ? Gone—vanished!—and, in many instances their former situations are as much involved in doubt and mystery as is the much disputed site of ancient Troy. The genius of improvement still stalks on with giant strides, and a future generation may be as much puzzled to ascertain the precise spots on which the Jail and Bridewell are now standing, as are some of the present inhabitants in providing ways and means for their speedy removal. Even Park-row itself may one day "cease to be," and the verdant promenade in its front be extended over the ground now occupied by the stately edifices represented in the picture. Magnificent elms and butternuts, of nature's own manufacture, may hereafter displace the present canvass groves with which the hand of art has embellished the temple of the muses, while its pit and stage shall be "floored over," not with deal boards for the dancers at a thousand-dollar masquerade, but with gravelled walks and triangular plots of clover, for the better accommodation of truant urchins who pitch coppers and play at marbles. But, whatever mutations await this great thoroughfare of the city, we have taken care to secure its portrait, graven with a pen of steel on imperishable copper ! so that posterity may "compare notes," and marvel at the simplicity of their ancestors.

The street which is now denominated "Park-row," was once a rough country road, the only one which led from the city to any other part of Manhattan Island. It was then called "The High Road to Boston," and when the adventurous traveller, whom business or pleasure called to the more eastern settlements, had left the noise and bustle of the town far behind him, his way lay over a small rustic bridge, which crossed a sluggish stream of water, near the present junction of Chatham and Roosevelt streets. This water-course connected Swamp-meadow on the east with the Freshwater-pond in the centre, since known as the Collect.

On a moonless evening this was doubtless a dark, dreary, lonesome, comfortless road, with only three houses (if we except a windmill, which then occupied the present site of Blanchard's Amphitheatre) in the whole distance from the suburbs of the city to the bridge before mentioned, and perhaps half a mile further. There were, indeed, a few buildings in Kip-street, (now Nassau,) south of the Vineyard, as the present site of the Brick Meeting church-yard was then called. But these were situated at some distance from the "High Road;" one of them standing on the spot now occupied by the American Tract-house, and another on the opposite corner of George-street (now Spruce.) One of the three houses before mentioned stood on the present site of Tammany-hall, another nearly opposite our present Tryon-row, and the third where the new marble building is now being erected for the American Museum, corner of Ann-street—or more correctly, between that edifice and the Chemical Bank.

By a reference to Lyne's map, published in 1729, it will be seen that little improvement had been made in this quarter down to that period. Broadway then extended from the Battery, or rather Fort George, to the spot now occupied by St. Paul's church, where the "High Road to Boston" commenced, shooting off in an easterly direction, and leaving a long unseemly ropewalk on the left, in the line of Broadway, extending from Barclay to Murray street. The present Park was then a wild common, and all that region west of Broadway, between Courtlandt and Duane streets, extending to the Hudson, was called King's Farm. Near the spot where Warren and Greenwich streets now intersect each other, was a house of refreshment, with a garden and bowling-green; but no road led to that part of the island. The spot now occupied by the "Mineral Fountain" of Jacob-street was then the centre of Beekman's Swamp, where wild pigeons and blackberries could be taken in abundance.

At the period alluded to, neither Beekman nor Ann street extended west of Kip or Nassau street; so that the latter, together with Fair-street and the Boston-road, formed three sides of a triangular field, on which no building was erected, except the one in Broadway before mentioned. It was a field in the country; as properly out of town as the present junction of Broadway and the Bowery, the apex of the triangle forming the junction of Kip-street and the Boston-road.

The spot of ground which we have thus attempted to describe has since been cut up into smaller sections by the opening of Beekman-street, Ann-street, and Theatre-alley; and the whole is, of course, now crowded with buildings. That side of the triangle formed by the Boston-road is covered with houses, a view of which embellishes our present number; and, in consequence of its proximity to our judicial promenade, is known by the appellation of Park-row.

The view here presented is taken from a position in Broadway, near the head of Vesey-street, looking eastwardly along the south side of the Park. A small portion of the iron railing which encloses this beautiful lawn is seen on the left, together with a section of one of the four marble columns which support the iron gates at the south-west entrance, through which a lady and little boy are supposed to have just emerged from the Park. These columns were erected in 1821, when the imported iron railing was also put up, causing much ironical railing against our sapient corporation for giving John Bull so profitable a job, when it could have been done so much cheaper and better by our own native artists at home. But let that pass. In the centre of one of these marble columns, or gate-posts, is a large cavity, in which is deposited a capacious tin box, of cylindrical form, tightly sealed and soldered, containing many specimens of the coins, arts, and literature of the day. On this occasion our worthy friend, Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell made, as usual, a scientific and highly interesting speech. Each of these pillars has since been surmounted with a Turkish cannon ball, made of Asiatic marble, which were brought from the Mediterranean, and presented to the corporation by Commodore Decatur.

The Park itself is a triangular lawn, comprising about eleven acres. It is bounded by Broadway on the north-west, Chambers-street on the north-east, and Park-row on the south. At the period of the revolution, as before stated, it was an open common, denominated "The Fields," in which was the House of Correction, or Bridewell, and the New Jail, as it was then called, although it was nearly twenty years of age, having been erected in 1758, twenty-four years subsequent to the institution of the House of Correction. Several years after the extension of Broadway, and the laying out of Chambers-street, (the precise date we have not been able to ascertain,) the Park was enclosed with a wooden pale fence, which continually suffered from juvenile depredators; as the light pales, or narrow strips of boards, which formed the fence, were found very convenient by the lawless urchins in the construction of bats and other implements used in their gymnastic exercises. In 1794, an extensive edifice of brick was erected on the north-east side of the triangle, facing Chambers-street, for the purpose of a City Almshouse. This building, which is two hundred and sixty feet in length, and three stories in height, exclusive of the basement, with a wing at each extremity, was appropriated to the purposes for which it was erected, until the completion of the New Almshouse at Bellevue, in the spring of 1816, when the paupers were forthwith removed to that commodious building. The former building was then repaired, and called the "New-York Institute," and has since been occupied by the American Museum, the Academy of Fine Arts, the Historical Society, and several other similar societies. This section of the Park was then enclosed with an iron railing, of domestic manufacture, extending from the Bridewell to the corner of Chambers-street, and from thence to the west wing of the Institution.

Previous to these improvements, however, the new City-hall had been erected between the Bridewell and the Debtor's Jail. This edifice, which has formed the subject of a former engraving, was commenced in 1803, and finished in 1812, being nine years in building, and costing five hundred thousand dollars! Historians inform us that the magnificent temple of Solomon was completed in seven years from its commencement; but then it should be remembered that there was no board of aldermen at Jerusalem to impede the progress of the work, and that we had few Solomons in our New-York common council when the City-hall was projected at the estimated cost of two hundred and forty thousand dollars.

As our readers have already been furnished with a description of the City-hall, with the exception of an elevation of the steeple, a re-formed Justice, and an illuminated clock which is to be, we shall now proceed to notice a few of the objects which actually appear in the picture; our previous remarks referring solely to such as are not seen, being concealed by the left hand margin of the engraving. The reader is doubtless aware that all the foregoing sage observations have been elicited by a few feet of iron railing, a butternut tree, and half a section of a marble post!

On the south side of the Park, outside of the flagged foot-path, is the principal stand for the hackney-coaches; and, in looking at the picture, we really feel glad for the dandy and his fair companion, who have just escaped the cruel ordeal of impertinent importunity, which every one must undergo who has the temerity to pass that way. Their last persecutor is the fellow seated on the box of the foremost carriage, a compliance with the law which very few of them will imitate. His face is turned towards the exquisite, with a sardonic grin, which seems to say, "You are no gentleman, bad luck to ye, or ye'd give the female a sate in my carriage. No lady ever walks out in my country, unless she rides in a coach." The gigantic driver of the next hack, however, appears to have better fortune, and ten to one the two youngsters with whom he is chaffering will pay double the legal fare for their contemplated excursion.

Exactly over the top of the second carriage in the picture appears the upper story of Tammany-hall, with its white-washed front, reminding us of "an old acquaintance with a new face," while the driver and horses of the first carriage, with the aid of a friendly tree, have saved the artist the trouble of glazing some half dozen windows in the west wall of the Brick Meeting; which, whether visible or not, actually stands behind that very tree. Its elegant spire is sufficiently conspicuous over the roof-tree of Professor Chilton's four-story domicile; and it is but civil to add, that this gentleman is an operative chemist and druggist of no ordinary celebrity. Turner's grocery, at the corner of Beekman-street, being a little shantee, not much larger than the body of a hackney coach, is totally concealed by the heads of the horses before mentioned; a very convenient screen by the by, to prevent our witnessing any accidental violation of the constitution and by-laws of the temperance society.

The narrow, dark-looking, three-story building on the right of Chilton's, is occupied by Mr. Walsworth, who keeps the "Chatham Hotel." On the right of this is a house of entertainment called "Bachelor's Hall," under the direction of Welcom D. Niles. The next is Morse's "City Coffee House." On the right of Morse's is a low, two-story building, half of which is occupied by Thomas Lewis, boot and shoe-maker, and the other half by James Sweeney. Then comes the lofty four-story "Theatre Hotel," now conducted by Mr. Waterbury. The next building in order is the "Park Theatre," with a description of which we shall close this article. On the right of the theatre, as respects the position of the artist, is an elegant hotel, originally established by Isaac Delamatre, and now conducted by James Holt, called the "Sock and Buskin House." Next is the apothecary-store of Messrs. Place & Souillard, adjoining which is the porter-house of M. & E. Cronly. A small section of Ira Clark's establishment terminates the picture on the right, where a fine load of hickory is just making its exit, destined no doubt, for some house-keeper in Ann-street.

Thirty human figures, besides one dog and several horses, impart much expression and animation to this interesting scene; and we think that our readers will agree with us, when we add, that the whole reflects no inconsiderable credit on the two artists, Messrs. Burton and Smith.

The most prominent edifice in the cluster, of which we have thus attempted a brief and imperfect description is the "Park Theatre," sometimes called the "Old Drury of America." Although there is nothing imposing or prepossessing in the external aspect of this establishment, there are still many interesting particulars connected with its history, which are not unworthy the attention of the curious reader. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to a few facts relating to this subject.

It is now nearly a century since the first attempt at dramatic performance was made in this city. An old maid-lady of our acquaintance, who at this moment enjoys good health and the full possession of all her mental and physical faculties, recollects witnessing or hearing of some performances of this description previous to the establishment of a regular theatre in 1750. A large store somewhere in the vicinity of Old-slip was appropriated to this purpose; and her impression is, that the whole was conducted in a rude, unpublish style, unworthy the patronage of refined society. We presume that these reminiscences of the good old lady refer to the fact mentioned by Mr. Noah, in an article on the subject which he published in 1821. He says: "the earliest theatrical performances in the recollection of the oldest inhabitants, were in a store on Cruger's wharf, near Old-slip, by a company of 'Thespians,' composed of 'choice spirits' of a certain order. They were roystering young men, full of tricks and mischief, who used to play cricket in the Fields, and who spent their nights at the boat-house in Broad-street, near where the United States' public stores now stand." It is probable that no one member of this company ever immortalized himself by his histrionic talents, as none of their names have been handed down to the present generation.

About the year 1750, the first regular theatre was built in New-York. "It was a stone building in the rear of the Dutch church in Nassau-street, near Maiden lane." We recollect a church in Nassau-street, called the "German Calvinistic Reformed," which has since been altered and devoted to secular employments, and is now occupied as a glass and crockery store by George Dummer & Co. The first theatre, then, must have stood in the rear of this building; but whether the entrance was from John-street or Maiden lane, we are not informed. The manager's name was Hallam, and he had a tolerable good company, recruited from the provincial theatres of England. In this theatre, our informant says, the sterling English tragedies and comedies were performed. After a time, however, Hallam received such flattering invitations from Jamaica, that he was induced to take his company thither, and the theatre was pulled down.

The next theatrical establishment mentioned in the annals of this city, was in Beekman-street, a few doors below Nassau-street, about the year 1770. This was a wooden building in poor condition, with paper scenery and a wretched wardrobe, under the management of one Miller. It was finally destroyed by some political mob in the year 1774.

Of the state of the drama in New-York during the revolutionary war, while the British had possession of the city, we possess little or no information. A commodious theatre, we are told, was erected in John-street, where the British officers got up an amateur company, and performed the popular dramas of the day, together with some original satirical pieces from the pen of General Burgoyne. After the evacuation of the city by the British, which took place in 1783, the John-street theatre was opened by a regular company, who met with considerable encouragement. In the hard winter of 1785, the manager offered part of the proceeds of one night, one hundred pounds, to the common council for the relief of the distressed poor. The donation was declined, however, on the ground, that theatrical exhibitions had an immoral tendency. This theatre was destroyed by fire in 1795.

About the year 1797, a number of gentlemen united by subscription in the purchase of a lot, and commenced a new theatre fronting the Park, between Ann and Beekman streets. In this enterprise a considerable sum of money was expended, when, from embarrassments, mortgages, &c., it finally came into the hands of Messrs. Beekman and Astor, who completed the building and furnished it with every requisite appendage. It was opened for public performance in 1798, under the management of the celebrated Hodgkinson, formerly of the John-street theatre, with a most excellent company. After the death of this truly great actor, the establishment was successively under the management of Dunlap, Cooper, Price, and finally of Simpson.

On the twenty-fifth of May, 1820, the Park theatre was discovered to be on fire, and such was the rapidity of the conflagration, that scarcely an article was saved, and in a short time nothing remained but the bare and empty walls.

Previous to this disaster, a large wooden circus, which then stood in Anthony-street, on the spot now occupied by Christ church, had been fitted up for a summer theatre, by the Park managers. On the destruction of the Park establishment, the house in Anthony-street was opened for the remainder of the season, and was generally well attended. It was on this stage that Kean first presented himself to an American audience.

Months rolled on before any thing was done towards rebuilding the Park theatre. At length, however, the proprietors, Messrs. Beekman and Astor, embarked once more in the experiment; and as they possessed a golden talisman which could almost rival the lamp of Aladdin, in the performance of wonders, they found no difficulty in raising a new phoenix from the ashes of the old. The house was finished in August, 1821, and opened on the first Monday of September.

A particular and technical description of the Park theatre, at this late day, cannot be deemed necessary. "Its attractions are all within." Its exterior is before the reader; a plain, unsightly, "shabby-looking affair," lighting a blush in the cheek of every citizen who is called upon to act as cicerone to a stranger. The front, such as it is, measures eighty feet in width, and fifty feet in height. The building is one hundred and sixty feet deep; comprising three complete circles of boxes, two side tiers, a spacious gallery, and commodious pit.

With an enterprising manager and a good stock company, the Park theatre is always well attended; but while the proprietors continue to exact from the lessees such an exorbitant rent (sixteen thousand dollars per annum!) it is impossible for the establishment to prosper.

In conclusion, we are constrained to say that the present external appearance of the Park theatre is a disgrace to the city. Did the owners of the edifice possess one spark of that public spirit which renovates and beautifies every thing around them, they would cheerfully spare a few dollars from their hoarded millions for the embellishment of an establishment which has always been to them an unfailing fund of wealth. It is almost incredible that men, who have made immense fortunes among us, and who exact such an exorbitant, not to say iniquitous rent, for little more than the bare walls of a plastered barn, should refuse to appropriate a small portion of that revenue to such improvements as are absolutely necessary to impart some degree of respectability to the establishment, and which are so loudly called for by those who support it.

Had it not been for the indefatigable exertions and manly enterprise of the lessee, the Park theatre must long since have gone to ruin. And what has been the reward of Mr. Simpson's labours? A regular and constant increase of rent for every improvement which his genius and liberality have created. Under such circumstances it ought not, it cannot be expected that he will incur the expense of embellishing the exterior of the building. He has enough to do, and more than enough to suffer in creating properties for the interior.

It is an ungracious task to be compelled to make these remarks, but a sense of public duty will not permit us to remain silent on the subject at the present time. It must be confessed, however, that our views are not totally free from selfishness; for had the front of the theatre possessed any degree of architectural beauty, in the same ratio would the engraving have been more worthy the public attention; as it is, the only thing we can offer in its favour is fidelity of design and felicity of execution.

THE FINE ARTS.

MUSIC.

THAT music has made rapid strides in America, is evident to the most uninterested and casual observer; but that it receives the encouragement necessary to make it thrive in all the refined luxuriance of which it is capable, I am not prepared to admit. America is still far behind Europe in that respect. No establishment has done so much for the improvement of the art as the Park theatre under the management of Mr. Simpson. The strength of his chorus; the excellence of his band; the engagements made with the first-rate artists he has from time to time assembled; the classical and delightful music he has given, and continues to give; the operas successfully brought out, and which have been unatempted, or failed in the hands of every other manager in the United States; the enormous expenses incurred in such a cause, altogether form a debtor and creditor account of no mean amount between Mr. Simpson and the public, the balance of which is very much in that gentleman's favour. In a late number of the Mirror, an allusion was made to the production of Weber's Oberon, and its cold reception. The music of this splendid opera is not even published in this country, and only known as having been performed twice or thrice in this city! When the fashionable world, as certain individuals term themselves, clamour for places at the box-office, on the first appearance of some Italian with a long name and a vowel at the end of it, or crowd to hear bad French singing, how strange and ridiculous does it appear, and what can be their motive? Certainly not the love of good music. I believe that it must be summed up and explained in that one vulgar, non-descript, merit-opposing word—fashion. In every country, the innovations of this curious monster are productive of contemptible effects, and in no country more so than in England; but although, in London, until Fanny Kemble somewhat resuscitated the drama, it was not fashionable to appear at theatres except in private boxes, yet, on the production of Oberon, the fashionable and musical world were not only the chief support of the opera, but actually we find all the names of persons distinguished by rank and talent recorded in the newspapers as having attended the last rehearsal. The sale of the music likewise was very general. Much has been said in palliation of the neglect sustained by this opera in New-York, got up as it was with care and attention, and executed admirably. The music has been accused of being very difficult, and not pleasing; and one most respectable editor actually said it was more incomprehensible to him than Greek. I was not astonished at the gentleman being no Grecian; but I thought within myself that it was strange he had no ear. Weber, when engaged to write an opera by the managers of Covent Garden, selected the subject of Wieland's poem called Oberon. Mr. Planché, who was employed to write the drama, concludes his preface in the following modest manner:

"At the Baron Von Weber's desire, the task has been again attempted; and I am indebted principally to Mr. Sotheby's elegant version for the plot of the piece; but the demerits of the dialogue and lyrical portions must be visited on my head: they are presented to the public but as the fragile threads on which a great composer has ventured to string his valuable pearls; and fully conscious of the influence that thought has had on my exertions, I feel that even as regards these threads,

"If aught like praise to me belong,
"With him I must divide it,
"I'm not the rose, says the Persian song,
"But I have dwelt beside it."

Five of these beautiful "pearls," with the highly poetic "threads" on which they are strung, I have, by permission, selected from the Park score, and now offer to the worthy editor of the New-York Mirror. The public will then be enabled fairly to judge, whether they ought or ought not to be better acquainted with the work. B.

NOTE.—We acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of the five exquisite songs alluded to above, as sung by Mr. Horn, Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Sharpe, Miss Pearson, &c. We feel happy in offering to our readers compositions from such an unquestionable source, and self-complacency mingled with regret, that we are the first to publish them. Surely, this is a stigma on the professional teachers of music in this city, whose duty it is to make their scholars acquainted with the most classical works. Had a proper demand been made by these individuals for a supply of music of this description, the vendors would have been ready enough to meet the demands of the market. We have selected for the present number, the Vision Song, as sung by Reiza, who appears to Sir Huron of Bourdeaux, in a dream.—Ed. N. Y. Mir

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

CLOSE OF THE SEASON.

THE curtain descended for the last time this summer on Tuesday; the entertainments of the evening being for the benefit of Mr. Simpson. Mrs. Austin appeared in the character of Polly, in the Beggar's Opera, and the first act of the Brigand was added.

The season altogether has been a successful one, and the manager has catered well for the public. In tragedy, we have had Forrest and Booth. In comedy, many fine old plays and good farces, effectively acted by an excellent stock company. The tragedians have occasionally been aided by Mrs. Barnes; the comedians by Miss Kelly. Several new comedies have been successfully brought out here, which in London are described as farces, in the play-bills. Their growth into comedies, we presume, is to be attributed to travelling.

Mrs. Austin has been exceedingly well supported in several new operas. Miss Laporte made a debut in a kind of Italian opera, with a set of strange looking people, the refuse of Garcia's troupe, who were no support at all. Miss George has appeared in English opera; and Miss C. Fisher has played her usual round of characters. Mr. Hackett, who stands alone in his representation of yankee peculiarities, has enacted a variety of new extravaganzas with success; and in Rip Van Winkle he has proved himself an excellent Dutchman. The last piece which he got up was the only failure; that, and the "fox-skin story" which it contains, are too bad to laugh at. A number of very successful melo-dramas have been brought out, together with a few execrable ones. By the by, there is a glee or chorus called "Mynheer Vandunck," which, with "Brother Sons of Jove," finds its way into every melo-drama. Now as these tunes are the glory and pride of the Park chorus singers, be it known to the manager, that in every garden in New-York and Brooklyn, they are nightly advertised and chanted by divisions of these indefatigable men; nay, armed with such weapons, they even make predatory attacks upon New-Jersey. The consequence is, that another standing chorus must be arranged for new melo-dramas next season, for the above mentioned well-worn tunes will be detected from gallery to pit. For ourselves, in the heat of the day we often reflect on the cool of the evening and the joys of a cigar in the open air; and invariably, by association, we whistle "Mynheer Vandunck," and we feel positive that next season we shall never witness Masaniello, nor the Knights of the Cross, nor many other melo-dramas, without recollecting the delights of "ice creams that are past," "pleasing but mournful to the soul."

Since the second or summer season commenced, this island has been frightened from its propriety by swarms of aspirants to Theatrical honours. Three gentlemen, with rural names, Field, Thorn, and Fountain, a whole landscape in themselves, have been nightly budding and spouting for their own amusement. We hope they will migrate to the country for practice, if they mean to make the drama a profession. Messrs. Thorn and Fountain can never rise above the stage occupations of setting a chair, handing a letter, or taking a prisoner off; and to do so much as this, they must be well drilled. Mr. Field reads his author with propriety, but has natural deficiencies which no study can obviate, and which must disqualify him from ever becoming more than a third or fourth-rate actor; and indeed to arrive at that point, he has much to learn, but more to get rid of. The manager evidently wishes to bring stars into disrepute, or he would never advertise these raw recruits under that denomination. We have also, during the hot weather, been favoured by the talents of a Mr. Dixon, who modestly terms himself "the celebrated American buffo singer," and has contrived to get this unassuming title put at the head of the Park bills. We do not exactly understand on what he founds his claim, unless it be impudence; and we are strongly urged to this conclusion, by a comparison between the gentleman and Mr. Placide, whose name is to be found in small letters on the nights when Mr. Dixon figures away in capitals! Sloman we disliked, but he had some drollery, and his Major Longbow was rather amusing than otherwise. Mr. Dixon swings about his limbs with the same vile motion which Mr. Sloman used to rejoice in; but he has neither Sloman's voice nor humour; and in his imitations of African character he is far inferior to Blakely. Such exhibitions, by the way, ought to be confined to the circus; for a person who can only grin and caper on the stage between play and farce, uttering abominable jokes to bad music, has no more right to a respectable grade in the profession, than the clown who attends upon horses, cracks Joe Miller jests, and rolls in the saw-dust. LINES TO EMILIE.

BY EVERARD.

THOU wert not born to be
An aged wanderer o'er earth's varied scene,
Thou dreamer, in thy glee!
Thou whose gay path in garniture of green
And pictured radiance lies, enrobed in dazzling sheen.

Thine are the morning hours—
The music and the flush of being's spring—
The sunshine and the flowers
That hope and joy, gay phantoms! round thee fling,
As midst thy years they play on pinions glistening.

Thou wert not born to bleed
The friends that love thee, by thy lingering long
To share their fond cares;
For, when my heart grows rapturous in thy song,
As in its deep recess the tide of love is strong—
Then, with a sense of gloom,
Some thought comes whispering to my startled ear,
Like rush of eagle's plume—
"Love not too fondly or too deeply here, Since in the days to come each dream must disappear!"

Then thy beguiling smile,
And the soft language of that calm blue eye,
Are lost and dim the while;
And mournful fancies rise, and visions high
Sink, like a wounded bird, from the mysterious sky!

Alas! I see it all!
How soon the blossoms of thy years will be
A blighted coronal!
Pale leaves will fall from pleasure's autumn-tree, [free!
When care hath thrall'd the heart, whose visions once were

Or it may be that death
With icy hand may press that placid brow,
And crush the braided wreath
It wears so calmly and so sweetly now,
While midst each painted leaf the airs of summer flow!

Oh, something to thy heart
Will come to check the transports nestling there,
And bid their spell depart!
Though glorious hope still paints the future fair,
Yet fate's funereal wing will cloud that distant air!

And thou wert doubly blest
If thy fond spirit, like a peaceful dove,
Could soar and be at rest!
Earth is no home for thee—and far above
The God who made thee pure may best deserve thy love!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PURE WINES.—Nothing is more conducive to health than a temperate indulgence in mild and pure wine, while even a moderate use of those which contain much alcohol is pernicious. Unfortunately most of the wines imported into the United States are of the latter description and therefore have been rationally proscribed by those who prefer health to the gratification of the palate. They have forgotten, however, to recommend the importation, or manufacture and general use of pure wines as a substitute. The best wines are not those which command the highest price. Some peculiar properties in Champagne and Tokay serve to enhance their value, but common table wine should be cheap to secure an extensive use. In Europe the average is five cents the bottle, and if we could manufacture it for the same price, all the mongrel Port and Madeira would soon be expelled from market. The writer of this article has tasted twenty-five different kinds of American wine—some of them were excellent, and possessed even an exquisite raspberry raciness. They can be made of all colours and flavours, by mixing the grapes. We should not seek to imitate Tokay or Champagne, but rest satisfied with the production of good table wines, which shall impart a vinous flavour to a large quantity of water, and thus render it, even when bad, a pleasant and harmless luxury to all.

SIMPLE METHOD OF MAKING GAS.—A machine has been recently invented in Paris, by which every family is enabled to supply itself with gas of the first kind for illumination. One of two feet square is sufficiently large for lighting up any private dwelling. The gas is manufactured from a cheap composition of oily and resinous substances, free from any disagreeable odour, or any injurious effect on furniture. It is so constructed that immediately on extinguishing the light the gas ceases to be produced, thus combining safety and economy. The price of the machine is about two hundred dollars. The committee of the "Academy upon chemical substances" have made a favourable report upon this apparatus, and the prefect of the police of Paris appears to be so well satisfied with its cleanliness and safety, that he has permitted it to be used without subjecting it to the formalities required in cases where unhealthy establishments are erected.

PROTECTION OF THE HUMAN BODY AGAINST FIRE.—We presume it is known to most of our readers that the late M. de Montyon, of Paris, bequeathed a prize of eight thousand francs to the author of the best invention for rendering the employment of any art or trade less unhealthy. This bequest has been awarded by the Academy of Sciences to M. Aldeni, the inventor of an apparatus which protects the human body against the action of fire.

AERONAUTICAL TRAVELLING.—We learn from a late Paris paper that a new hypothesis of aërostation has been brought before the scientific academy of that city. Ever since the discoveries of Montgolfier ingenuity has been busy in devising means to navigate the air; and, though all experiments have yet failed, there seems to be an opinion among many scientific men that the undertaking is practicable. It is believed that there is sufficient density in the lower stratum of the atmosphere to support a self-moving car, sustained in part by gas, if the mechanical power were applied on the same principle that a bird uses its wings. M. Dupuis Belcourt is the author of the hypothesis to which we have adverted. His machine is thus described:—"It is a lengthened balloon, cylindrical, with a mast like a ship, ending in front by a cone, near which are arranged the means of guiding, which consist of wheels with wings acting in a horizontal direction. At the end of the machine is a helm, and a prow is at the lower extremity."

LITERARY NOTICES.

LIFE OF NELSON.

THE life of Nelson, which the brothers J. & J. Harper have recently published, as the sixth volume of that valuable series of works of which we have several times had occasion to speak in commendation, is a production of that kind which no one who commences perusing it can bear to lay down until he has arrived at the conclusion. It is said of Dr. Johnson, that he never read a book through; but we think the old moralist would not have been able to have made this declaration with truth, had a work like Southey's history of England's greatest naval commander fallen into his hands. It is not the fashion of the present day to speak of the laureate author in very exalted terms as a poet, though those who deride him most will scarcely deny uncommon merit and beauty to his Roderic, the Last of the Goths, or great originality and power to those two wild and interesting epics, Thalaba and Madoc. In whatever light, however, he is to be viewed as a poet, but one opinion of him is entertained among critics as a biographer. There is not a single Waverley or Pelham novel possessing greater fascination than his true history of the unfortunate and gifted Kirke White; and we doubt much if there is, in the whole compass of personal memoirs of distinguished men, a single work which is perused with more sustained and eager interest than Southey's Life of Nelson. The gallant commander "lives o'er the scene" before the reader; and we do not envy the feelings of that individual who can peruse, dry-eyed, the account of his sufferings, his fortitude, and his inextinguishable patriotism, during the last moments of his life. But he died, though not full of years, yet full of fame; and, as his biographer beautifully observes, "if the chariot and the horses of fire had been vouchsafed for Nelson's translation, he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory."

We should not omit to mention that the Harpers' edition of this excellent work is embellished with a copperplate portrait of its subject. It is a copy of a very admirable plate done on steel, taken from J. Hoppner's celebrated portrait.

STORIES OF A COUNTRY CURATE.

A work under this title is among the numerous reprints of English books which have been lately given to our public by the enterprise of the publishers named above. For the interesting tales comprised in this collection, we tender them our thanks. We know of few stories in the English language of more intense and better managed interest than the Smugglers, the Poachers, and the Fatalist. By the way, the latter tale puts us strongly in mind of an admirable sketch by the inimitable Paulding, called the Drunkard. The incidents of the two possess considerable similarity, and we scarcely know to which should be accorded the palm. The author of these stories of a Country Curate is a bona fide clergyman, and besides the present work, he has written two or three others that have found much favour with the English public. One of these, the Subaltern, has been republished here, and acquired considerable popularity. The stories which he tells are generally of a sombre cast, but their melancholy is of that soft, twilight kind which gives such fascination to the Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life.

COPYING PICTURES.

Most parents are anxious that their children should know a little of every thing connected with the fine arts. To gratify this laudable ambition, music, drawing, and painting, are taught in all our select schools; but nature never intended to make painters, musicians, or poets of every one whose parents can pay for a lesson in these arts. Learning may be acquired—genius is intuitive. But notwithstanding this fact, any child of ordinary capacity may be taught to copy pictures with a fidelity and accuracy that cannot fail of affording pleasure. This pleasing art is illustrated on a new plan in a little treatise just published by Matthew D. Finn, entitled "Theoretical System of Painting, or Modern Plan, fully explained in Six Lessons, and illustrated with eight engravings. To which are added the Theory and Practice of the Old School, in the Introduction of Landscape and Figure Painting; with many valuable receipts on the subject."

WOODWORTH'S MELODIES.

A second edition of this work was announced some months ago, but has been delayed for the purpose of making the selection more complete. Several pages of recent effusions, never before published, will be added to the volume, which will probably not appear before the month of October.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

SUMMER.

The sultry summer days are come, the hottest of the year,
Of lemonade, and iced cream, and spruce and ginger beer;
Heaped in the wooden tea-gardens* the thirsty cits they drink,
Then from their pockets draw their hands and slowly pay the chink.
The cooling evening breeze comes not when the scorching sun has set,
And fat men wipe their face and cry—"the warmest day as yet!"

It was clearly shown by Hone, on his trial for parodying St. Athanasius's creed, that parodying any thing did not necessarily infer disrespect towards the thing parodied, and it is upon this ground that I take the above liberty with the beautiful lines of one of America's sweetest bards. Well, after a long, dull, hot and cold, equivocal spring—summer, fervid summer, has come in earnest. The minds of the citizens are at length relieved from the uncertainty which for two months pervaded them, namely, whether to fling the windows open, or order fire to be put into the grate; and the last slight lingering tinge of morning or evening chill has vanished away. Phœbus, for half the day, now glares fiercely and intensely upon Broadway, and the hot flag-stones, retaining and reflecting his beams, burn the soles and crack the upper-leathers of the many boots and shoes that pass over them. The tide of emigration has set strongly in from the south, and sultry-looking planters are obliged to walk in the vicinity of dandy negroes, which by no means tends to cool their tempers. As the year rolls on, things good and bad come mingled together—fruit and flowers and drouth and dust—cloudless days and sleepless nights—scorching suns and southern breezes—mosquitoes and Clara Fisher. A given quantity of prose and poetry, setting forth the good and bad qualities of spring, summer, autumn, and winter, is as periodical as the seasons. Spring seems to be the favourite of the poets, who themselves, for the most part, live upon hopes and promises rather than substantialities, and have therefore a very natural sympathy with this very promising season. There certainly is something delightful in the general awakening of nature from the long dead sleep of winter; and the first blossoming of the flowers, the first warbling of the birds, and the genial warmth and freshness of the first spring days bear an inexpressible charm along with them; but to a worldly and unromantic disposition, partial to palpable realities, the taste of fruit is more acceptable than the scent of flowers, and a promise of a good thing not so good as the good thing itself. In so far summer is better than spring; but, in truth, despite of a calm temper and a thin jacket, the weather, in good sooth, is horribly, I may say, awfully hot. Ladies are seen gliding down Broadway clad in garments of "woven winds," and gentlemen go perspiring and glistening along in white jean. Now are thick tufts of hair upon the cheeks found to be a serious inconvenience, and lo, the whiskerless rejoice! Now is the mercury in the sun at a fearful altitude, and the corporation are above fever heat in the shade. Now are the citizens bent upon imparting useful information, and, as they meet, each "shakes his fellow by the hand," and says unto him—"this is hot weather," to which the other responds—"it is so!" and they pass on their way. Now do people, contrary to all custom, wish for "cold comfort," desiring, like King John, to be "comforted with cold." Now do butcher's dogs repent of their unchecked indulgence in carnivorous diet, and greyhounds alone are in a good habit of body. Now do the engine-men on board of steam-boats think lightly of the feats of Monsieur Chabert, the fire-king: wistfully do they gaze upon the river, and if a hissing, fizzing, whizzing sound is heard in the water, the captain cries out, "there goes a man overboard!" Now do stout gentlemen, after a hearty dinner, look as if they were going through the process of distillation, "harding the lean earth as they walk along," and the unmarried portion of the extraordinarily fat fruit-and-vegetable women who sit in Fulton-market, have every prospect of continuing so. Now it is good to keep to the leeward of ice-carts, and to the windward of ladies of colour; and three impertinent questions in succession from any man is a legitimate excuse for assassination. Now is all kinds of fiery, passionate writing in disrepute, and Captain Parry's "Narrative of an Expedition to the North Pole" meets with a ready sale; and now does the worthy editor of this journal unfeelingly request his correspondents to put pen to paper and draw forth the fevered thoughts of their fermenting brains. Now may all people who persist in drinking unmixed brandy or Irish whiskey, be given up by the "Temperance Society;" and now do mariners in warm latitudes incur great dangers by steering as near stray ice-bergs as possible, and sensible fish are scarce towards the tropics. Now do men in carbonated-mead and soda-water shops coin money without being touched by law, and their daughters are looked upon as desirable matrimonial speculations. Now are those who talk wrathful politics kicked out of society, and tragedy is eschewed as tending to heat the blood. Now do people prefer broiling at the springs to broiling in the city, and travel post-haste to keep themselves cool and comfortable, though, at the same time, an account in the newspapers of a man having voluntarily run a mile in ten minutes would be regarded as apocryphal. Now do editors cease to threaten to horsewhip each other, and a sedate drowsiness pervades their columns. And now young ladies who are obliged to behave decorously, and mind their p's and q's in the presence of old withered maiden aunts on whom heat makes no more impression than on an Arab of the desert, are in a very uncomfortable situation. Now are long stories unlistened to and cayenne pepper disused. Now do cooks blaspheme, and dealers in fish and other perishable commodities are troubled in spirit. And now, in short, do nearly all the ills that heat can engender, afflict the perspiring inhabitants of this republic. My advice to them is—be patient and winter will come; or what is equally to the purpose, though better expressed by some great moralist or other—"be virtuous and you will be happy!"

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

Saratoga, July 30, 1880.

DEAR SIR—We arrived here on Wednesday last, and have been so occupied since in viewing the "lions," in and about the neighbourhood, that it is with some difficulty I snatch a few moments to continue my rambling journal of our expedition. The extreme heat of the last fortnight appears to have driven the inhabitants of every city and village in the Union to these fashionable resorts for the idle rich and the pleasure-seeking tourist of every grade—and truly there is now congregated at the "rival springs" a mixed assemblage of these classes, sufficient to puzzle the deepest observer of human nature, were he to attempt their analization or description. We republicans are certainly treading fast on the heels of the ephemeral and fashion-loving aristocrats of the old world. We dress, we dance, we gamble, we drive, and race, and have our "exclusives" in all these several follies, equally with our transatlantic brethren. And, moreover, we do these things with a happy nonchalance of consequences, so peculiarly characteristic of the experienced roués of the metropolitan cities of Europe.

By the way, while speaking of "exclusives," I have a little anecdote to tell you, which has been the source of much pleasure here. A few days preceding our arrival, a gentleman made his debut at the Hall, and so perfectly fashionable was his dress, so dignified his bearing, that he immediately won the attention of all, even in this crowded "repository of elegant extracts." "Who is he?" asked a Philadelphia beau, with an envious glance at his habit recherché, which decidedly intimated a wish to become acquainted with his tailor. "Who is he?" very inquisitively whispered a Boston mamma, with six marriageable and reversionless daughters at her disposal. "Ah, belle homme! He is so charming," sighed a little French heiress, as she surveyed his high forehead and unrivalled mustachios; "who can he be?" "N'importe," muttered a New-York exquisite, piqued at her want of attention to his honourable self, which he had until the appearance of the stranger successfully monopolized. Curiosity heightened every day; still all were in the dark with regard to the unknown. At length it was given out that he was a foreign nobleman, "rich and unmated," on a tour through the Canada and United States. Every one strove to make his acquaintance, and he was almost buried in cards and geranium-scented billet-doux. The next morning after our arrival, a party was made up for Lake George. It was very select, I assure you, scarcely one in a hundred receiving the honour of an invitation. The ci-devant nobleman was to gallant the French heiress; but just as he had handed the lady to her seat in his barouche, and was on the point of springing to her side, a gentleman drove up, and catching him by the hand, cried "Ah, Charley, is that you? How are you, my dear fellow? I left Utica yesterday—your wife and children are well, all well, and send an ocean of love." Here was a consummation—the heiress fainted away, the party dispersed like so many frightened pigeons, and the next morning the blood noble was no where to be seen.

You may well suppose that the fashion, the display, and the follies which surround us here have surprised a portion of my travelling companions in no small degree. Aunt Experience, who has not quitted the boundaries of her native village for the last thirty years, has been in one continued state of surprise and bewilderment since our arrival. At our first entrée to the ball-room of Congress Hall, (where we have taken up our quarters) it was ludicrous in the extreme to observe the venerable lady's amazement at the brilliant assemblage—radiant as it was, with all the beauty and fashion of the place. She could scarcely realize the fact that we were in America. "Surely, Mr. I," addressing me, (who undertook to be her cicerone for the evening) "all these people must be foreigners—they are dressed so extravagantly fine!" And when I undeceived her, she became impressed with the notion that only the richest portions of community formed the collection. You may conceive her surprise and chagrin when I pointed out to her several of the most gaudy dressed individuals in the assembly who had sang "Adieu la boutique," and were executing the complicated evolutions of a cotillion according to the latest imported Parisian mode. Her accustomed equanimity and kind-hearted feelings gave way at this information, and she indignantly deplored the departure from republican simplicity and habits, which characterized the days of her youth. Madame H. and Miss Elmira are very differently affected by the gaieties of the passing scene—they are in raptures with every thing, and with every body. The old lady has found out a coterie exactly suited to her taste, and in a few hours became deeply initiated in the mysteries of "exclusiveness." She professes already to distinguish the parvenus from the veritable haut ton, and has established a code of signals with her daughters, by which she can inform them who they are to honour with their hand in the dancing room, and who to reject. My little Rosa, however, has already disobeyed these injunctions, and pleads in her excuse, "that she never could be rude, or tell a falsehood, merely to please the caprices of fashion;" she consequently laughs with the gay, rattles with the witty, quizzes the affected and effeminate beaux who follow in her train, and in short, she indulges in all the innocent pleasures which present themselves, with a happy unconsciousness of the chilling rules which fashion prescribes to her devotees. Elmira, agreeably to mamma's prohibitions, is scrupulously select in her associates; she has renewed some of her city acquaintances, has become bluer than ever, and we are threatened with an epic, of at least forty-nine cantos, to celebrate the wonders of Saratoga, both ancient and modern. You will doubtless require some information respecting my friend H—. He is entirely out of his element; execrates the sandy and barren soil of the neighbourhood; wonders how people can leave their own quiet and well-conducted homes, to encounter the bustle and confusion of a public hotel; and votes all the pleasure parties bored, and the gaieties of the ball-room as leading to ruin, both of character, fortune, and health. Yesterday, however, brought him some relief from these complicated evils, in the arrival of an old college chum, and he consents to prolong his stay a few days, for the purpose of accompanying the said gentleman on a tour to Canada. I have agreed to join them, feeling no disposition to retrace my steps without my agreeable and amusing companions.

* The term "wooden tea-gardens" may not be understood by some, out there are several such places in this city. The garden is composed of a number of small wooden boxes, in which all kinds of beverages are drunk excepting tea.

MUSIC AND MOONLIGHT.

BY THYRA.

How beautiful art thou, O night! with thy unclouded sky,
The low faint music of thy breeze like some lone spirit's sigh;
Thy mellow moonlight shedding round its radiance soft yet bright,
Till there is nought of dark or dim that smiles not in that light.

And thine is still a sweeter spell, O music! power divine!
How answers back the thrilling heart to every note of thine!
And every feeling of delight, though hushed and sleeping long,
Bounded into rapturous life again as wakes the soul of song.

Music and moonlight! what has life to match that fairy hour,
When o'er the young and buoyant heart are cast your spells of power?
When some glad spirit which hath known life's poetry alone,
Drinks the enchantment of the scene o'er which your charms are thrown?

Alas! your spells are vain to wake one throb of joy in me!
This drooping heart is lulled no more by your sweet witchery;
Ye bring but painful memories, sad whispers of the past,
When o'er my path a radiance beamed too beautiful to last!

Too deeply hath my spirit felt the magic of your way—
Alas! and must ye call no more sweet feelings into play?
Must all that gives a charm to life be henceforth unto me
Links of a chain which binds my heart to one sad memory?

There is a tone in music's voice which breathes of other days,
The moon's soft light brings other scenes to my reverted gaze,
And to the loveliest things of earth some dark remembrance clings,
Poisoning the purest founts of joy and chaining fancy's wings.

My heart is wrung with secret pain—my spirit droops beneath
The weary weight it must sustain with every moment's breath;
Each source of joy is closed for me, and all I hear and see
Seems dull and wearisome and vain, or idle mockery.

The doom is on me—all in vain the flowers of life may bloom;
Not for me doth their beauty smile, nor breathe their soft perfume;
My heart, a Tantalus, whose thirst no fount shall ever slake,
Hath nothing left but to endure till death the thralldom break.

A weary and a rugged path it is my lot to tread,
With nought upon its cheerless gloom a passing light to shed—
The heart which, turning sadly from all that this earth adorns,
Draws poison from life's sweetest flowers—how must it feel its thorns?

NAVAL SKETCHES.

MERRY TERRY,

OR AN OLD REEFER'S YARN.

"His breast with wounds unnumbered riven,
His back to earth, his face to heaven,
Fallen Hassan lies—his unclosed eye
Yet lowering on his enemy,
As if the hour that sealed his fate;
Surviving left his queenless hate:
And o'er him bends his foe, with brow
As dark as his that bled below."

"Come, spin us a yarn, Jack, my boy," said a curly-headed, rosy-cheeked young midshipman, to old Jack Palmer, one evening, as we were running down the Spanish Main, before as sweet a breeze as ever filled a to'gallant-sail. Jack Palmer was an old sea-dog, and a clever fellow, at least in the Yankee sense of the word. He had seen all sorts of service, and knew all sorts of stories, which were perhaps not the less amusing for their want of grammar, and their abundance of sea phrases. He was master's mate of the gun-deck; but when called upon for a story by Rosy Willy, (the name of the little reefer that had asked Jack for a yarn,) his business for the day was finished; the grog had been served, the bull stowed away in the spirit-room, and the key of the hatch returned to the master. It was a pleasant evening, too, and as it was only three bells of the second dog-watch, and of course too early to turn in, Jack sat down on the fo'castle chest, and signified his willingness to comply. He was immediately surrounded by a knot of midshipmen, eager to listen, and, after the usual preliminary of a fresh quid, he began as follows:

Merriville Terry, or as they used to call him for shortness, Merry Terry—and a right good name it was, for he was as gay a lark as ever gave life and animation to a steerage mess-table—was one of the noblest middies that I ever knew. He was as full of rigs and jokes as a French man-of-war is of music, and they were quite as harmless, too; for Merry never said any thing to hurt a shipmate's feelings, and no one ever thought of getting angry at his fun. There wasn't a reefer in the whole fleet that didn't love him like a brother; nor a luff, that when there was hard duty to do, didn't favour him all he could; for Merry had a delicate constitution, and couldn't stand the rough and tumble of the service as well as some. But he was no skulk, and, blow high or blow low, Merry never shrank from his watch. When the relief was called at night, whether it was calm or storm, all sail or a close-reefed top-sail and fore-sail, it made no difference, on deck he always was before the sound would be out of the bell. He didn't tumble up the hatchway either, as some of you reefers do, with your hands in your becketts, and your bow ports half shut, or fumbling at your button-holes, like a green-horn at a gasket; but up he sprang, wide awake, and rigged from clue to earring, as if all dressed to go ashore on liberty. As I said afore, every body from stem to stern, liked Merry Terry, or for the matter of that, from one end of the navy list to the other—all except one man. As for the sailors, it would have done your heart good to see how they watched his eye when he had charge of the deck, as if they wanted to spell out his orders before he had time to speak 'em. They would do more for a single look of Merry, than for all the curses and damns of the skipper, though backed by the boatswain's mate, with the cats in his hand. It wasn't from any fear of him, you may be sure, for I don't b'lieve Merry ever stopped a man's grog, or as much as gave him a cross word, in his life; but it was from pure love and respect. When he spoke, to be sure, there was something in his tone and manner that seemed to say he must be obeyed; and when he looked at a man who had been cutting up rusties, though he didn't frown, or swell, or try to look big, as I have seen some officers do, yet there was that in his eye that made the stoutest quail. It was just so among the reefers at the mess-table. If two of them was sky-larking or quarrelling, or doing anything ungentlemanly, Merry would just look at them, and they would leave off at once, and droop their heads like a dog-vane in a calm. I said every body loved him: I remember once, when we were beating up the Straits with a Levanter dead-a-head, and blowing so heavy it almost took the very buttons off our jackets, that Merry, some how or other, happened to fall overboard. He had been standing on the taffrel, with his quadrant in his hand, trying to get a chance at a lunar, when all of a sudden the old hulk made a heavy lee-lurch, and away he went splash into the water. Though there was a sea running, like so many mountains chasing each other, yet before you could say Jack Robinson, no less than four stout fellows were overboard after him. It liked to have gone hard with the whole five, for it was more than the stoutest swimmer could do to keep his head above board, and before we could clear away the stern boat, though we didn't stop to cast off the gripes, but cut and slashed away, they was almost out of sight to leeward. Old Tom Bowman, the quarter-gunner, and Bill Williams, the captain of the fo'castle, made out to reach Merry just as he was going down the last time; and though it was as much as their own lives were worth, they held him up till the boat came to their assistance. I well remember the joy of all hands when the boat pulled up under the stern, near enough for 'em to see that Merry was in it; and when they hooked on the tackles, I don't b'lieve that ever a ship's crew ran away with the falls with as much good will, as ours did that evening in running up the jolly-boat that had saved Merry Terry.

The day Merry first came aboard our craft is as fresh in my mind as if it was yesterday, and a snug, trim-built little fellow he was, too, as ever broke a biscuit, or went coxswain of a captain's gig. He was then about as old as Rosy Willy here, and much such another; only he was taunterbuilt, and broader in the bows, and carried sail more man-of-war fashion. His eye was as blue as the sea in the tropics, and as bright as the tropic sea sometimes is at night, when it seems all on fire. His head was covered with dark hair, that lay as thick and close as the nap on this monkey-jacket; and his skin was so white and soft, that it always seemed a pity when I saw him standing his watch in the heat of the sun, and his plump little cheeks looking as red as if the blood was going to start right through them. However, he didn't mind it the value of a scupper nail, and I don't know but it did him good, for he grew handsomer as he got a little tanned, and seemed never happier than when he was on duty. He was a little green at first, of course, but there was no such thing as getting the weather-gage of Merry, for as sure as an older reefer tried to run a rig on him, he would just cock up his bright blue eye, and see what the other was up to in the turn of a glass.

It was a long cruise that we were together, and Merry got to be as much of a man in size and appearance as any of us, before it was over, though he couldn't have been more than eighteen then. On our arrival in New-York the most of the middies got their walking papers as soon as they could, and made sail each for his home. Merry's connections, who were of Irish descent, lived in Virginia, and it was that way he laid his course, you may be sure. I remember very well the morning when I had the third cutter called away and manned for him; and as we wrung each other's hand at the gangway, neither of us had voice enough to say good-by. My stomach felt all that day as empty as a midshipman's locker, and the ship seemed as lonesome to me as the old brig Nancy did once, when all hands died off of the yellow fever, and left me and the old tom-cat the only living souls aboard of her.

For about two years after Merriville and me parted, I lost the run of my old shipmate. He continued ashore, but I soon got tired of being cooped up in narrow streets, with no chance of seeing more of the sky than chose to shine between the tops of dingy houses. Happening to hear that some of my acquaintances were going aboard a ship then fitting out at Boston, I applied for orders myself, and was soon once more where I had a little sea-room to ware and haul upon. That was a short cruise, and by the time twenty months were up we were all home again, the crew discharged, and I, with my hands in my becketts, spinning street-yarn, and having nothing in the world to do.

The next ship I was ordered to was my own name-sake, old Jack Adams, she was lying in Hampton-roads, ready for sea. The first man I met, as I went up the accommodation-ladder, was Merry Terry himself, who stood upon the gangway-sill to receive me. I knew him at a glance, though he was a good deal altered; and he knew me, too, as soon as his eye rested on my face. Merry was by this time about twenty years of age, or thereabouts, and a finer looking fellow never trod the quarter-deck. He had lately lost both his parents, and this had given a sort of sad expression to his countenance that made him appear handsomer than ever. I soon found that he was the general favourite on board the ship, as indeed he always was, go where he would; and it was expected that before we sailed he would get his parchment from Washington, and mount a swab. An elegant luff he would have made, too, for if ever man knew how to work a ship, it was Merry Terry. When he had the deck, the old craft herself seemed to know it; and no matter what kind of weather we had, she was sure to behave as obedient as a side-boy. I have seen him put her in stays where there wasn't a breaker of water to spare, with rocks both a-head and a-stern, and the wind whizzing round and round, like a bee in a bucket of tar. But when it was "helm's a-lee," and Merry had the trumpet, there was no such thing as missing stays.

I mind I told you a while ago that every body liked Merry Terry, except one man—that man was the skipper. Somehow or other he hated him worse than the devil hates a marine. He used to ride him down like a main tack, would row him on all occasions, and put him on all sorts of disagreeable duty. It was even thought he had clapped a stopper on his promotion. The story among the reefers went that Merry had come athwart the captain's hawse in some love affair; but whether that was so or not was mere dead-reckoning, for Merry was as close as an oyster, and never spoke a disrespectful word of his commander. In return for all the abuse he received, he would only curl his lip a little, and look at him dead in the eyes—but such a look as he would sometimes give him! I would rather, for my part, have been on short allowance of grog for a month. Well, things went on in this way for some weeks, till at last sailing orders were given out, and of course there was no more going ashore for the middies. The boats were run up and stowed; the pole to'gallant-masts struck, and storm stumps sent up in their place; all hands were called to unmoor, and we even have short, so as to be ready to trip and be off, whenever word should come from the cabin to that effect. When all this was done, the captain sent up an order to have his gig lowered away and manned, and directly after came on deck himself in a full rig of citizen's toggs. Merry Terry stood in the gangway, leaning over the hammock cloth, when he heard the boatswain's mate pipe away the gigs, and as the familiar sound struck his ear, I noticed that he started and turned pale. It was a glorious night—much such an evening as this, only later, about two or three bells in the first watch, I think. As the captain passed over the gangway he gave a peculiar kind of a look at Merry—something like a monkey would at a marine after stealing his pipe-clay—and then turning round to the first luff, he said—"Remember, Mr. Orlop, that you are under sailing-orders, and that no one must leave the ship on any pretence." As he spoke this he turned another malicious glance at Merry out of the corner of his eye, and jumping into the stern sheets of the gig, ordered the men to let fall and give way.

As long as the sound of the oars in the rowlocks could be heard, Merry stood as still as a stock-fish, his eye following the wake of the boat till it was lost in the haze of distance. When he could neither hear nor see it any longer, he began to walk about as wild as the devil in a gale of wind; and the reefers, who would gladly have done anything they could to soothe him, saw clear enough that it wasn't a matter for them to meddle with. In the midst of his agitation, a shore-boat came alongside, the waterman in which handed a note up to the middy that went to the gangway to receive it, and immediately shoved off again. The note, of course, was given to the officer of the deck, according to man-of-war fashion, and he being a stately, pompous sort of fellow, took his own time to send one of the side-boys for a lantern. When the glim came up, he walked to the fife-rail, and looking at the superscription discovered that the note was for Merry Terry. The latter, on learning this, eagerly extended his hand for it, and tearing it open, rapidly devoured the contents; then rushing to the gangway, he would have sprung into the shore-boat, which he hoped was still alongside; but during the officer of the deck's delay it had already got far beyond hailing distance. Three or four times Merry paced up and down the deck in violent agitation, his lip as white and quivering as a jib in the wind, and his eyes shining like the top-glim of a Commodore's ship. All at once he walked right up to the first luff, who was standing abait, leaning on the taffirel, and in a voice that seemed to come from the cable-tier, it was so hoarse and deep, he said, "Mr. Orlop, I must go ashore, to-night."

"You cannot, Mr. Terry, you heard the captain's orders."

"Damn the captain!" (It was the first word I ever heard Merry swear, though he and I had been messmates going on five years.)

"Mr. Terry, you forget yourself!" answered the first luff, in a firm, yet mild tone. "If you use such language, sir, you will force me to a disagreeable exercise of my duty."

"I mean no disrespect to you, Mr. Orlop," said Merry, partly recollecting himself; "but I am half-distracted. If you will lend me your ear, sir, in a more private part of the ship, I will relate to you what may perhaps change your notions of duty."

Mr. Orlop was one of that class of officers who, to the knowledge and skill of an able seaman, added the feelings and address of a perfect gentleman. He, as well as every body else on board, had seen, and felt indignant at the treatment Merry received at the captain's hands; and some of the whippers respecting the cause had also reached him. Perceiving that poor Merry was now uncommonly agitated, and fearing that he might commit some indiscretion which would oblige him to exert unpleasant authority, he readily complied with his request, and led the way to his own state-room.

The conference, whatever was its nature, was of short duration; but while it lasted, many a curious glance was cast towards the state-room door, and—I'm most ashamed to own it—many a listening ear was inclined towards the bulk-head. There was little satisfaction got that way, howsoever, for nothing was heard but a low, humming sound, now and then broken by a muttered curse in Mr. Orlop's voice; and terminated at last by a sudden exclamation of that gentleman, loud enough for the whole steerage, and birth-deck into the bargain, to hear.

"Enough, Mr. Terry, enough!" cried he. "You shall have it—if it costs me my commission, you shall have it! There is a point where obedience becomes a crime. When military discipline conflicts with the principles of honour, I will be the first to set an example of insubordination."

As he spoke thus, the door of the state-room was thrown violently open, and the two officers issued suddenly to view. The cheek and lips of Merry were still pale and quivering, while the face of the other was flushed with a deep red. They both ran rapidly up the companion-ladder, Mr. Orlop, at the same moment, calling out to me—

"Mr. Palmer," said he, "call the boatswain, and order him to get out the first cutter immediately. Do you attend yourself, sir, on the birth-deck, and start up all the men!"

By this time, his foot was on the top step of the ladder. As soon as his head was fairly above the combings of the hatch, he began again:

"Boatswain's mate!"

"Sir!" sung out old Reuben James, in his peculiar drawl.

"Call away the first cutters, and do you stand by and see to getting up the yard-tackles.—Captain of the fore-castle, there!"

"Sir!" bawled the captain of both starboard and larboard watch, at once, startled at the loud earnestness of the first lieutenant's voice.

"Lay aloft, and stand by to get your yard-tackles on the fore-yard!—Quarter gunners, do you hear? do you do the same on the main!—Foretop, there! out on the yard with you, and send down a whip for the yard-tackle block!"

"Ay, ay, sir!" promptly responded a voice from the foretop; and with these and similar orders and replies, intermixed with the shrill pipings of the boatswain and his mates, the spar-deck now resounded for several minutes. By the end of that time the cutter was hoisted out, and brought to at the gangway. She was no sooner there than Merry Terry sprang down the side, and the crew after, who, though they wondered as much as all the rest of us, officers and men, how all this was going to end, yet seeing they would oblige their favourite by moving lively, shoved off, and had up their oars in the crossing of a royal.

"Mr. Terry," cried the first lieutenant, "remember your word of honour that you will return to-night, provided you find or make all safe!"

"Upon my honour," answered Merry, laying his hand on his heart: then turning quickly to the men, "Let fall," he cried, "give way!" and as long as we could hear him, he kept saying every now and then, "give way, my hearties, give way—pull with a will," and such like.

And they did give way, too. They were a set of as stout oarsmen as ever manned a frigate's first cutter; but they never showed themselves afore as they did that night. The boat fairly jumped out of the water every clip, and the foam that she dashed off from her bows formed a long white streak in her wake, as bright and dazzling as the trail of a Congreve rocket. You may think it wasn't many minutes before they reached the shore, going at that rate as if the devil had sent 'em an end. Merry steered her right head on, and never cried "rowed of all," till she struck the sandy beach with such force that she ran up high and dry, pitching the two bow oarsmen, who had got up to fend off, about half a cable's length from her. At the first grating of the keel upon the gravel, he leaped ashore, and without stopping to say one word to the men, darted off like a wounded porpoise, running with all speed up the bank. For two or three minutes, the boat's crew looked at each other with their eyes stretched wide open, like the mouth of a dying fish, as much as to say what the devil's all this? At length they began to consult together in a low, grumbling tone, as if they were afraid to hear themselves speak, and Bill Williams, who was coxswain of the cutter, was the first to offer a suggestion that met the approval of the rest.

"Damn my chain-plates," said he "only hark how his feet go, clatter-clatter-clatter, as fast as the flopping of a jib-sheet in the wind. I'm fear'd, my hearties, that Mr. Terry's runnin' 'mongst the breakers, and if you'll stay by the boat, I'll give chase—and, if so needs be, lend him a lift."

The proposal of the honest coxswain was relished by all, and he accordingly set off in the same direction that his young officer had taken. But Bill Williams, though he could run about a ship's rigging, like a monkey in mischief, was no match for Merry in a land chase. His sea-legs wasn't used to such business, and he went pitching and heaving a-head like a Dutch lugger afore the wind, and seemed, at every step, to be watching for the weather roll.

In the mean time, Merry linked it off like a Baltimore clipper going large. He had proceeded perhaps about a mile from the boat, along the road which he had struck into directly after leaving the beach, and instead of shortning sail, appeared to be crowding more and more canvass all the time, when, all of a sudden, he luffed up and hove to, on hearing the clatter of an approaching carriage. The noise of the wheels sounded nearer and nearer, as they came rattling along over the rough road, and it wasn't long before the quick trampling of the horses' feet, and the clicking of their shoes against the stones, indicated that they were near at hand. The place where Merry had paused was about midway of a steep hill, and if he had chosen the spot it couldn't have been better suited to his purpose. The road, which had been rough and uneven from the first, was at this point broken into deep gullies by recent heavy rains, rendering, apart from the difficulty of the ascent, extreme caution necessary in passing with a vehicle. On one side, a steep wooded bank, rose to a considerable height, and on the other, the surface of the ground gradually descended to the water, which was not quite excluded from view by a few scattering trees that occupied the intermediate space. Behind one of these trees, that grew close to the road-side, and threw a deep shadow over it, Merry, gritting and grinding his teeth, crouched down, like a young shark watching for his prey. The carriage had already gained the foot of the hill, and was slowly labouring up, when a deep gruff voice cried out to the driver from within, bidding him drive faster. At the sound of that voice, Merry's eyes fairly flashed fire. The black, with instinctive obedience, cracked his whip, and was about to make a more effectual application of it, when a figure suddenly sprang from the road-side, and seizing the reins, commanded him to halt! The command, however, was scarcely necessary. The jaded horses had reached a short level stage in the ascent, and not even the sound of the whip had elicited any indication that they intended shortly to leave it. Merry, with a sailor's quick eye perceiving this favourable circumstance, in an instant was at the side of the carriage, within which a voice of a very different tone from that which last issued thence, was earnestly beseeching succour.

"Help! for heaven's sake, help! save me from a ruffian!" cried a female in imploring accents. The last words were scarcely articulate, and were uttered with a smothered sound, accompanied with a noise of struggling, as if the ruffian was endeavouring to hold the lady still, and to silence her cries by pressing his hand upon her mouth.

The incentive of this well-known voice seemed hardly wanting to add more fury to the rage of Merryville. Choking with mingled emotions, he called to the ruffian to hold off his hand, and, with an effort of desperate strength, tearing open the door, the fastenings of which he did not understand, he seized the inmate by the collar, and dragged him to the ground.

"Seducer!—scoundrel!—ruffian!" he cried, "I have you in the toils, and dearly you shall rue this night's work!"

"Mr. Terry!—I command—you shall suffer for this—a court-martial!" and various similar broken ejaculations were uttered by the wretch, who violently struggled to get loose from the strong grasp in which he was held. Merryville, though not of a robust constitution, yet possessed much muscular strength. In the present contest every fibre received tenfold vigour from the energy of the feelings that raged within him, and made him an over-match for the guilty being who writhed within his arms. The faces of both were inflamed and convulsed with mighty passions, though of a widely and obviously different character; for the rage of the one, though fierce as ten furies, had yet something noble and commanding in it, while that of the other seemed kindled by a demon. The clear, round moon shone down on the occurrence with a silvery brightness, which, while it made every feature of the scene perfectly visible, yet imparted to the pallid faces, glaring eye-balls, and quivering lips of the combatants a more ghastly and terrible expression, than they derived from their own wild passions. The captain (for it's useless to tell you it was he) struggled hard, but was evidently becoming exhausted. In the excess of his emotion he had bitten his lip nearly in twain, and the blood which, in their tossing to and fro, had been smeared over the faces and clothes of both, gave great additional wildness to their appearance.

The female, who by this time had recovered from the swoon into which she fell when the voice of Merryville first reached her ear, now screamed as she saw the blood with which he was profusely stained, and, imagining him to be mortally wounded, she sprang from the carriage, and tottered towards him across the road. A sudden movement of the two combatants, at the same moment, changed their position in such a way as to bring the back of Merryville towards the approaching figure, and at this instant, his antagonist having succeeded in releasing his arm from his grasp, hastily drew a pistol from his pocket, cocked, and fired it. The ball whizzed through the air, only slightly grazing the neck of the intended victim; but a piercing shriek from the lips of the female, heard above the loud report, announced that it had done more fatal execution in another quarter. As if by mutual consent, both parties ceased from their struggle for a moment, and rushed towards her. She staggered two or three steps forward, mumbled a few scarce audible words, among which the name of Merryville was the only intelligible sound, and fell bleeding to the earth. In the meanwhile the horses, which had been scared by the near and loud report of the pistol, pranced suddenly round, and dashing down the hill were soon lost to sight. Poor Merryville, with a groan of agony which he could not, which he did not seek to repress, bent over the form which lay stretched and pale before him, and raising it partly from the ground, gazed for a stupid moment in utter unconsciousness of all things else, upon the features of her still lovely face. The ball had passed directly through the heart, from which life had already bubbled out in a crimson tide, though a few darker drops continued to ooze from the livid orifice of the wound. Merryville whispered her name, but she answered not. In vain he leaned his ear to her lips, or bent his eyes upon them, till the hot, tearless balls seemed bursting from their sockets—no sound, no motion, made reply. He laid his hand upon her heart—but its pulse was still. He looked into her eyes—but they returned not, as they were wont, an answering look: their light had gone out—the spirit had departed from its house of clay—she was dead, quite dead! As this fact impressed itself upon his brain, a maddening consciousness of the cause seemed slowly to return; his eyes rolled up till the balls were nearly hid, his face became of a livid darkness, and his teeth were clenched together, like those of one in mortal agony. Suddenly starting up, he turned quickly round, and with his arms extended, and his fingers curved like the talons of an eagle, he sprang wildly towards his guilty commander. The motion seemed to have been anticipated, for the wretch had prepared himself with a second pistol, which, as his antagonist approached, he deliberately aimed at him, and fired. Whether the ball took effect or not, it did not defeat poor Merry's object. He darted like a hungry tiger on the wretch, and with both hands seizing him round the throat, he dragged him down to the earth. In vain his victim struggled—the sinews of his antagonist seemed hardened into steel. He tried to shriek for aid, but the grasp around his neck, choked his utterance, and his words died away in a rattling sound, like the gurgling in the throat of a drowning man. With a strength that seemed supernatural, Merryville raised him from the earth, and dragged him along the road. The struggling of the wretched man grew fainter and fainter, but still an occasional convulsive quivering of the limbs told that he yet lived. His face was almost black, his tongue lolled out of his mouth like a dog's, and his eyes, blood-shot and glassy, were protruded a full inch from their sockets. Blood had started from his nostrils in his mortal agony, and a thick wreath of mingled blood and foam stood upon his lips, which, wide distended, seemed stretched in a horrid laugh.

In silence, and with a strength that seemed more than human, Merriville continued to drag his victim along, till he reached the boat. He had been met by Williams not far from the scene of the first part of the contest, but he appeared not to see him. Williams, on his part was too much awed to speak. The firing of the pistols had prepared him for some fatal event; for he had a dim and dark suspicion of the object of Merriville's errand, inasmuch as he had been the bearer of several notes between him and his betrothed; and had heard, also, that his captain was a rejected suitor for the same hand. One glance at the group served to show him the dreadful nature of the burden Merriville dragged along with him: he saw that his commander was already a corpse, and besides, he was too much intimidated by the unnatural lustre of Merriville's eye, by his pallid and unearthly hue, and by his still and terrible bearing, to interrupt the silence with a word. As they approached the boat, Williams waved his hand to the crew, who were anxiously waiting on the beach, and signified by an expressive nod that they must not speak. Silently and sorrowfully they followed their young officer to the water's edge, entered after him the boat, and commenced rowing back to the ship. Poor Terry, still holding the body by the throat, took his seat in the stern-sheets, and leaned his head down on the gunwale in such a way that his garments concealed his face. The face of the corpse, however, was exposed in the broad moonlight; and as the head hung partly over the seat, with its features distorted and bloody, its hair matted with clots of blood and earth, and its glassy eye-balls apparently staring at the men, a superstitious shudder crept over them, which, with all their manhood they could scarcely repress.

In this way, and in silence, they drew near the ship. The sentinel hailed them; but no answer was returned. As they came to at the gangway, the officer of the deck called Mr. Terry by name; but still no reply. He saw by the terror painted on the countenances of the crew that something dreadful had occurred, and descended quickly into the boat, where the whole terrible truth was soon ascertained. They were both dead! By the discharge of the second pistol, Merry had been mortally wounded, and his life had oozed away while his hands were still clasped with desperate energy around the throat of his victim. Even after death his fingers did not lose their tenacity. The officer tried to unlock the death-grasp, but without effect; and the two bodies locked in an embrace, which, stronger than that of love, had outlasted life, were obliged to be hoisted up together.

Just as Jack Palmer arrived at this part of his yarn, all hands were called to stand by their hammocks, and the bustle incident to that piece of duty put an abrupt end to his story.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

BOYHOOD.

I WAS busily writing in my narrow dark back office—a partly smothered laugh struck my ear—I looked up, a bright face peeped in at the door. It was dear little Charley. The rim of his straw hat was turned up to leave his blue eyes unshaded. In a moment his hand was in mine, and his rosy pouting lips were put up sweetly for me to kiss, an operation which I should have performed even in more dangerous situations. He pulled me by the hand as he spoke,

"You must come out into the street and walk. I want you to buy me some torpedoes and a top. Ah, do come."

He pulled me again, and looked up with that eager real earnestness which in a child is so graceful. His mother's very face and voice. It was a pleasant afternoon. My hand was tired, my eyes wearied, and my mind sick of the tedious jargon which I was scrawling; at the instant a gleam of yellow sunlight fell upon the wall, and a breeze blew in softly from the window, and lifted the hair from my forehead. Charley knew his moment, brought me my hat, and gave me another pull.

"Well, come," said I, "if I must I will." A child can drag us to what we wish.

Well, off we went; he buoyant with hope, I quietly pursuing my own reflections, until with a succession of "pulls," which had commenced so successfully, he conducted me into the toy shop, whose multifarious and heterogeneous treasures had dazzled his fancy. I could fully enter into his feelings as he reached this attractive scene. His full dilated eyes wandered over the medley of infant wonders very much as I suppose a child of larger growth would gaze about him if he were introduced into some vast magic garden, crowded with golden cars, precious stones, horses, carriages, pleasure-boats, books, paintings, and idle heaps of desirable looking newly-coined silver dollars and shining guineas. There were valuable little wooden trumpets, "those clamorous harbingers of blood and death," and appalling tin swords, of a gory red hue, leaden dragons on horseback and in full gallop, but whether to or from the fight was wisely left to the conjectures of the spectator, humming-tops, coloured like the rainbow, a handsome set of tea things constructed out of pewter, one or two little "spirit-stirring drums," some wax ladies in full dress, besides other expensive and useful articles.

Charley took a pretty deliberate survey of the scene, and gave many objects a careful examination before his important purchases were completed. He blew several blasts "long and loud" upon the trumpets, he drew forth the tin sword, ran his eye along the innocent blade, and made several menacing flourishes, as if he were just about to cut off the head of some rascally Algerine; he cracked the whip, bounced the ball, spun the top, and took up the dragon, horse and all, in his hand, with such a look, that I feared the poor gentleman's fate was sealed, his unsheathed blade to the contrary notwithstanding; when a mask, which might have been moulded on the physiognomy of Caliban, caught his attention. The good-natured old lady who presided over these fairy scenes smiled as she yielded to each wandering caprice and changing impulse, and I smiled myself as the sweet and girlish face of the delightful boy was encased in the uncouth and monstrous countenance which he had selected, and his soft voice came out from the hideous lips, and the curls of his golden clustering hair burst forth over the rough, wrinkled forehead. There are men who dislike children; I think they are a great source of amusement. Their graceful actions, the outbursts of their feelings, the artless ideas which rise in their minds, and of which they can give but an imperfect expression. I am pleased to observe them thus, just as I love to watch the passage of a clear stream in the woods, when there are diamond sands on the bottom, and green sedges which wave with the very motion of the water; and the silver fishes are darting, while some old root or rugged stone juts out, and half dams up the brook, till the beautiful element loses its airy clearness, and gurgles over the obstruction like the purest liquid crystal.

Well, the bargain is made—Charley has taken the mask under one arm and six torpedoes in his hand. Some cake and a top fill his pocket, and full of sparkling pleasure we resume our journey. In a short time the torpedoes are gone, the last at a large majestic dog, with the walk of a lion. The fellow turned around, and looked at us with much seriousness and dignity. The boy was absolutely hushed for a moment with the awe of his presence, and took my hand; but the worthy individual deigning us no further notice, found a place to his liking, and quietly laid himself down to sleep.

There are certain moods of my mind when Charles is a more agreeable companion than many older and wiser. Life has a tendency to make us all hypocrites. As we grow old we grow mistrustful and artificial. There is a kind of unmeaning good nature worn only for the sake of fashion, and often disguising angry or careless feelings. It flings a sort of mystery about the character of all other people, so that it takes some time to find them out. But there is a trusting spirit about a young child which exposes to your notice every operation of the mind. When I am with such a being my observation is not confined to his infant form and features; I cannot help perceiving the fragility of his mind and character. I believe I can in some degree enter into the fears and feelings of a sensitive mother when she gazes on her boy. She is familiar not only with his outward shape and bearing, but with his peculiar ways of thinking. She sees a mind and heart wonderfully delicate and feeble, exposed to innumerable influences, which may either close their existence or destroy their purity. Even in the stillness of her own apartment she can scarcely regulate their infant wanderings. How must she tremble then at the thoughts of what may happen when she shall be gone, and he committed alone to the dangers of the world, to disappointment, anguish, temptation, disease, and despair. It is as if one should fashion a light boat to float only on the waters of a summer lake, and should behold it gliding with the current through some widening and deepening river towards the stormy and boundless waste of ocean.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Poets men of business!—Many of the best of our native poets are men of business. Halleck, Paulding, Sprague, Wetmore, and several others, are actively engaged in mercantile pursuits. While we might regret the circumstance, as calculated to deprive the public of more frequent visitations from their muse, we are inclined to believe that to it is owing much of the life and raciness, the freshness and boldness, which characterise their occasional free-will offerings. Well do we know, and deeply do we feel, the load that bears upon a writer compelled, at all times, whether the wind blows east or west, and the thermometer is at zero or at the boiling point, willing or not willing, to indite articles that must perforce be pleasing, instructive, and popular. Happy is he who can refuse to dip his pen in ink when the mood is not on him, or other various avocations invite. Such is the enviable lot of one of our friends, whose inimitable verse has ranked him among the first bards of this country, and who, in reply to an application made by us for his more frequent contributions to the columns of the Mirror, has, with his usual promptness and felicity, struck off the following reply. When the dog-star has ceased to rage, and the pressure of his "fall business!" has somewhat subsided, we shall look forward with delightful anticipations to his promised communications.

EPISTLE TO AN EDITOR.

An article! bless me, my good sir,
You surely are out of your senses—
I cannot, if ever I could, sir,
Indite while the heat thus intense is.
I've made my best bow to the goddess,
And asked her to favour the measure—
She was weaving an air for a bodice,
And sipping a cream at her leisure.
"Begone!" quoth the shrew in a fury,
"Nor think of a subject that's weighty—
No reader will ever endure ye,
While Fahrenheit's far above eighty:
Away with the tragic and epic—
The erudite, classic, historic—
Society's grown a dyspeptic,
And banquets on spleen and caloric."
"A chapter on fancy or fashion—
A tale of the last Pelham finish—
Some stanzas of pathos and passion—
With the sentiment simple and thin-ish.
These may do very well for the weather,
But pause ere you perpetrate moral—
Blend your rhyme and reason together,
And the town will your pages abhor all."
Thus saying, her ladyship sported
A look, not the blandest or sweetest,
And beck'ning a zephyr that courted
Her favour, was off at the fleetest.
Then prithe no more—"an you love me"—
Of prating or verbing an article—
By the dog-star that rages above me,
I've not of invention a particle.
Our fairest and brightest are roaming—
The city a nuisance is voted—
I'll be off! but when autumn is coming,
You may look for some queer things I've noted:
Then here's for the Springs—or the River—
And a glance at the fair by the fountain—
Since jolting is good for the liver,
Perhaps I may call at the Mountain.

Tales of the sea.—We have often wondered that ocean scenes have not been more prolific subjects to authors. True, the third of the earth composed of land contains the great majority of our population; but then the eternal wrangling between man and man, in the ordinary routine of business, has been so often wrought up in pathetic stories, that the reader, when he embarks in a well told sea narrative, experiences something of the same sense of wild interest which he feels when borne in reality across the boundless element in the winged vessel. Much, to be sure, has been said of the "dark blue sea," by poets and other young gentlemen addicted to literature, who have never in their lives sailed further than Albany or the Banks, or doubled Point Judith; but these can know little of the vast world of incidents and associations connected with a nautical life; of the peculiar characters formed within the narrow boundaries of the ship, their strange and often poetic superstitions, their utter ignorance of the complicated machinery of society on shore, and their inexhaustible fund of sea anecdote, expressed in odd sea language. In these interesting delineations our countryman Cooper has been eminently successful; and we hazard little in the assertion, that if the author of the admirable sketch, which will be found on another page of our present impression, would more frequently gratify the public with similar productions, he would acquire a reputation equally brilliant. Those familiar with the current literature of the day need scarcely be told that "Merry Terry" is from the pen of William Leggett, Esq.

We present our readers this week with an entire sheet of ORIGINAL matter, from a variety of veteran pens. We mention this fact simply for the government of those editors who are in the constant habit of copying our articles without giving credit.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE EAST.—The world, as known to the ancients, consisted of Asia, Africa, and Europe. These immense regions were understood to be bounded by great oceans on the east and west, but the extreme east was then, and, in a great measure, still is, shut up from the rest of the world. The vast empire of China, Tartary, and farther India, were not included in the conquests of Alexander, although he boasted of having subdued the world, and wept because there were no more worlds to conquer. Had he subdued his own unhallowed passions he would have had much more reason to claim the title of hero. The east, so often spoken of in scripture, as well as in profane history, was but little known to Grecian or Italian writers, although all their arts and sciences originated in that quarter; and it was proverbial among them that every good thing came from the east. In the language of Asiatic writers, who have always been distinguished for strong figurative expression, the wilful rejection of truth is called "departing from the east," or "turning the back to the east." Thus the posterity of Noah are said to have been "journeying from the east," when they conceived the absurd project of erecting a tower by which to climb to heaven.

GUNPOWDER, ETC.—Solomon asserted that there was "no new thing under the sun." "Is there any thing," he asks, "whereof it may be said, see, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us." Without insisting upon a literal and universal application of this assertion, it can be easily shown that many very important inventions have sprung up in Europe, and been honestly announced to the world as new, when the same principles had been in operation for ages among the nations of the east. The art of printing, the loadstone, and gunpowder, have been known in China from a remote period; astronomy and algebra were also studied in India equally long before they were understood in Europe, where the latter, in particular, is of very recent introduction. Both gunpowder and ordinance, it is certain, were in use in China as early as A. D. 85. The Chinese attribute the invention to King Vitey, who, they say, "was a great enchanter and necromancer; who, one time, being vexed with cruel wars by the Tartarians, conjured an evil spirit that showed him the use of making of guns and powder, the which he put in warlike practice against the realm of Pegu," &c. Other writers have likewise thought the agency of evil spirits necessary to the invention of gunpowder, although it was finally introduced into Europe by a monk! Milton, in his poem of Paradise Lost, gives the honour of the invention to satan himself, and then commissions an angel to communicate the secret to man.

CONGREVE ROCKETS.—The honour, if it be one, of this invention belongs to the man whose name it bears; and whose epitaph, as read to him by the witty Madame Vestris, we have already given in the Mirror of February 20, volume seven, page two hundred and sixty-four.* Without wishing to detract a single iota from the merits of Colonel Congreve, there is strong circumstantial evidence in favour of a more ancient origin of these destructive projectiles. In Grey's Gunnery, printed in London in 1731, is found the following passage, deduced from the life of Apollonius Tyhaneus, by Philostratus. In speaking of the Oxydrææ, an ancient nation of India, the historian says, "those truly wise men dwell between the Hyphasis and the Ganges; their country Alexander never entered. Their cities he never could have taken, though he had led a thousand as brave as Achilles, or three thousand such as Ajax, to the assault; for they come not out into the field to fight those who attack them, but these holy men, beloved by the gods, overthrow their enemies with tempests and thunderbolts shot from their walls!" It is said that the Egyptian Hercules and Bacchus, when they overran India, invaded this people also; and having prepared warlike engines, attempted to conquer them. They, in the meantime, made no show of resistance, appearing perfectly quiet and secure; but upon the enemy's near approach, they were "repulsed with lightning and thunderbolts hurled on them from above." Here, then, is a record of the very early use of gunpowder, as Alexander flourished three hundred and fifty-five years before the christian era; but whether it refers to a species of ordinance or rockets is not quite so clear.

CHARLES GILFERT.—When the much admired and very successful opera of "The Invincibles," was in preparation at the Bowery theatre, Gilfert insisted upon having an original song written for Miss Rock, and directed the stage-manager to apply to Mr. Woodworth for that purpose. "But the piece is to be played to-morrow evening," replied Barrett: "How can you expect an original production at so short a notice?" "Easy enough, easy enough. Woodworth writes at sight," "But how can it be set to music in season?" continued the stage-manager, in a tone of expostulation. "I can set the koran to music in no time," answered the confident composer. "See that it is done." "But how can Miss Rock study it in so brief an interval?" Here, Charley got out of patience, and exclaimed, with vehemence, "My music and Woodworth's poetry require no study—such a combination of talent will sing itself." The poetry was written; but some unexpected avocation prevented its being set to music. We were favoured with a copy of it, however, and it was published in the Mirror of January 31, 1829—vol. vi. page 236.

Gilfert was a singular fellow, as every one who was acquainted with him will readily acknowledge. After the conflagration of the Bowery theatre, an establishment in which all his affections seemed concentrated, he would walk for hours around the ruins, wrapt in serious meditation; on which occasions his gestures and expressions were truly serio-comico. At one moment he would pause, gaze wistfully at the tottering walls through his green spectacles, with a most rueful countenance, mutter some unintelligible exclamations of mingled Dutch and English, and then pass on, like the genius of despair stalking amid the crumbling monuments of his desolated hopes. During one of these moody reveries he was accosted by an acquaintance on a variety of topics foreign to the all-absorbing subject of his own meditations. In the midst of a very animated speech, his friend, whose remarks had not been honoured with the slightest attention, was interrupted by Gilfert's turning suddenly towards him, and with a look sadly wan and wo-begone, exclaiming, "Is it not astonishing? This magnificent building—the temple of the muses—the seat of the arts—the pride of the city, and the admiration of the world—is now a heap of smoking rubbish! All—all destroyed! Ay, even that convenient and beautiful apartment, where, with Hamilton, Smith, and Gouverneur, I used to sit so comfortably, and make my little arrangements for the whole United States! Oh, the reflection is too agonizing! What will you drink?"

POETICAL ADVERTISEMENTS.—We have observed of late that the poor muses are not only constantly teased and persecuted with the solicitations of professional poets; but even mechanics and artisans, of every description, enter the lists as candidates for their favours. Passing a hat-store the other day we observed a large hand-bill, with the following logicalorceau, which we have copied for the edification of the reader:

"A penny saved, our Franklin's wit discern'd,
Is fully equal to a couple earn'd:
Admit the maxim, and of course it follows
Who deals with the subscriber gains two dollars."

THE COQUET.

BY ISIDORA.

SHE knew her eyes had power to lure
Devoted hearts to wear her chain,
Who would her fleeting frowns endure
To win her witching smiles again;
Yet secretly she thought of one,
To love when all the rest were gone.

And still she twin'd her airy chain
Closely around each captive heart,
Alarm'd their fears and soothed their pain
By turns, with all her sex's art—
But most she triumph'd over one,
Who would have loved when all were gone.

And some her chain would lightly wear,
And match her wiles with equal art,
Content her changeful smile to share,
Nor hoped to touch so vain a heart.
Among them all there was but one
Who truly loved when hope was gone.

And some there were, too proud to bow
To fickle beauty's tyrant chain,
Who scorn'd to ask a heartless vow,
And could not love a thing so vain—
And so they left her, one by one,
Till all save one alone were gone.

And did he then his suit prefer?
And did she listen to his vow?
No, lady, he had worshipped her,
But he could only pity now.
He scorn'd the love that could be won
Only because the rest were gone!

A DESCRIPTIVE TALE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I.

I know each lane, and every alley green,
Dingle, or bushy dell of this wild nook,
And every bosky bourn from side to side,
My daily walks.—Milton.

GEORGE BARNARD was the only son of an eminent physician, who having acquired a considerable fortune in the practice of his laborious profession, had retired to a charming retreat to spend the evening of his days on the banks of the Housatonic. Here he lived as a gentleman farmer, unostentatious in his deportment, liberal as affluent, and beloved by all his neighbours, at whose sick-beds he occasionally ministered during the absence of the village practitioner. A maiden sister resided with him, to whose superintendence the household affairs were committed. George was the child of the old man's age, and fondly did he doat upon the little prattler, whose wishes were gratified as soon as expressed. His aunt Susan, too, loved the glossy-locked innocent, and was to him as a mother, for that fond guardian had been dead ever since the first days of his infancy. Month after month stole on, till the white chubby features of the child gradually gave place to the ruddier and more decided contour of opening boyhood, and at length the unfitting vestments of the nursery were exchanged for the jacket and trowsers, with their shining buttons, and ever dear pockets. Then followed the spring-time of existence, so cloudless and serene, ere the "inner man" becomes gloomy and troubled; the balcyon days, when he forgot the promised sweetmeats while riding on the shaggy back of old Hunter, or driving his hoop over the village green. All loved the future heir of the villa, as Mr. Barnard's beautiful mansion was called, from the surliest urchin in the parish to the old blind pauper, whose steps he not unfrequently attended in his lonely walks, leading him into the smoothest paths, picking up his cane when by chance it fell from his palsied hand, and receiving in return many a pretty tale of Robinson Crusoe and his lama, intermingled with blessings on the dear boy's head. At length his twelfth summer came, and his father, who had hitherto instructed him in the rudiments of the classics, now resolved to place him at the grammar school in the neighbouring village. Accordingly his satchel was well lined with sundry venerable tomes, which had been handed down from father to son for some five generations, and he was requested to be in readiness to set out on the next Monday. This was no trivial affair for one who had a thousand important concerns to occupy his attention. The flowers in his little garden must be arranged, his bantam community consigned to some trusty overseer, and his kite and cross-bow laid carefully away for vacation. It was a bustling hour, said his aunt, when all the youngsters in the neighbourhood were assembled at the villa on the morning of his departure. Up stairs and down stairs they flocked after him, while he ransacked every scrap-heap in the house, and distributed among them the collected toys of his indulged boyhood—marbles, tops, whistles, and, dearest prized of all, an epitome of a drum, whose caseless tattoo disquieted the repose of the village for a whole month after.

The family chaise was at length brought to the door, and as Mr. Barnard put on his hat, he wiped a tear from his eye, for the child of his bosom was to be borne away, and the notes of his innocent gladness unheard for a season in the peaceful haunts of his beautiful home. George, too, wept as he kissed his affectionate aunt, and gave old Hunter his parting caress.

A ride of a few miles brought them to the village of M—, and just as the noon-bell rung, the half serious youth was led to his little chamber by his future instructor. The father blessed his child, and departed with a heavy heart; for who would now meet him at the threshold with his laughing eye, or wander forth into the green fields with him, or sit at his knee the long winter evenings, listening to the anxious voice of parental instruction? His emotion, however, escaped not the observation of the affectionate youth, whose eye followed the carriage till it vanished behind a distant bend of the road, and then untying his satchel, he laid one by one the reverend volumes on the table, and silently promised that his idleness should blight not the expectations of that doating parent. Four years rolled rapidly by, during which he visited the villa every fortnight as regularly as the village carrier.

He was now to become a collegian, and bid farewell to that endeared home for a long three months. Various were the preparations for this pilgrimage to the temple of Minerva. The old library was again taxed for its share of supplies, and the vademecums of his grandfathers were transferred from their mahogany nooks to the trunk of the youth, already well stored with fine linen, counterpanes, comfortables, slippers, and a thousand other indispensables, which contribute to "calm contemplation and poetic ease." The family chaise was again put in requisition, and before the sun was set, George Barnard had entered on his novitiate, and was comfortably lodged in his quiet study. Here, too, he was beloved, for he was sociable, obliging, unassuming in his manners, and withal an apt, regular student. Though fond of the company of his companions, he never sought that polishing intercourse, that "sweet parlance," which is only to be met with in the scenes of the drawing-room. The fact is, he feared the ladies prodigiously. He scarcely knew one of the fair except his aunt Susan. Assiduously did he shun their society, for he always trembled like a criminal whenever chance threw him into their presence. This escaped not the notice of the college savans, and accordingly many a sly joke was foisted on him, to the no small edification of their good-humoured merriment. Their raillery, however, disturbed not his unintermittibility so long as he could keep himself at antipodes with the dear objects of his disquietude, which was easily effected in a town where parties are not particularly frequent; and besides, an unseasoned student is a sad wight with the ladies.

Thus situated and thus prejudiced the golden days of college life—the senior year forsooth—commenced. His awe of female presence was still as overpowering as ever; and no bright eye, no sweet voice could charm him from his seclusion. But a trial awaited him, which in the event proved that he was formed of no "sterner stuff" than human nature universally exhibits.

He was fond of straying during the twilight of a summer's eve, by the bank of a little coy river, that like himself seemed to court retirement in the bosky dells at a distance from the village. It chanced one evening, as he wandered by that sweet stream, beneath a cloudless moon, that the thoughts of home came over him with a peculiar power, and he resolved to sit down and enjoy the quiet of their influence. Accordingly, he seated himself at the foot of a large beech, tho' threw its thick branches out over the stream, and yielded his mind to the pleasant associations of that distant home. Vacation was near, and in imagination he was just on the point of springing into his father's arms, when he discovered but a short distance from him an object, which no very lively fancy might have mistaken for the spirit of the stream. As it approached, he perceived that it was a young girl, bearing a basket on her arm, which apparently cost her considerable exertion. As she came near the bend of the river where the student sat retired and undiscovered in the shade, she paused for a moment, set down her basket, and advanced to the edge of the bank, which formed an almost perpendicular wall of some dozen feet, and gazed at the scene before her with evident delight. She wore neither bonnet nor shawl, and her delicate form, just expanding into womanhood, appeared like a vision of beauty to the eye that glanced out from the beech-tree's shade. She was evidently wearied, and as she surveyed the scene before her, her figure gradually assumed that inimitable gracefulness of attitude, so superior to the tact of affectation, and which nature alone can teach. Her hazel locks, unrestrained in their native luxuriance, fell in tendril-like spirals over a delicate uncovered neck, where the soft beams of the full moon slept as on a pillow of alabaster. Fixed, and almost as breathless as the trunk against which he leaned, the unseen student gazed on the fairy form. A spell unknown before was upon him, which the hour and place, and the peculiarity of his former habits, all combined to strengthen and prolong. Formerly he had fled from the fascination of female beauty with marked timidity, but now he made no effort to escape from the sorcery of its presence. At length the maiden turned to retire, when the bank on which she stood gave way with a hollow sepulchral sound, and was precipitated with its fair occupant into the depths of the river. George was an indifferent swimmer, but it was not a time for consideration. The remembrance of Leander's rashness, had it occurred, could not have deterred him an instant; besides, it were chivalrous to die in such a cause. He sprang from his covert with the rapidity of thought, and in a moment one arm encircled the waist of his recent enchantress, while the other made vigorous exertions to regain the treacherous bank. The stream at this time was swollen to double its usual size by one of those sudden showers so frequent among the mountains of New-England, and as it swept round in its graceful curvature, formed a powerful eddy, into which, in spite of his continued and unyielding efforts, the student with his fair charge was drawn. They were twice borne swiftly round this circle, and as many times carried almost within reach of the shore. Hope, when animated by even a slight modicum of a certain nameless influence, recks not of weariness, and our hero apparently now exhibited as much resolution as at the commencement of his hazardous adventure. At length, by one powerful exertion, aided by the rapidity of the current, he bore his prize to a part of the shore from which he first plunged in.

During the agitations of that fearful moment not a word had been spoken, while the terrified girl had unconsciously thrown her arm around the neck of her preserver, and reclined her head upon his shoulder. Thus situated he bore her up the bank, and laid her, all trembling like the aspen leaf, on the grassy slope near the beech-tree. There he bent over her with the deepest anxiety, parted the dripping tresses from her face, and suffered the light and the sweet zephyr to steal in once more upon her pale cheek. And then, too, he whispered kind words of safety and trust, in a tone that always finds its way to the heart, and awakens confidence wherever consciousness exists. The maiden opened her blue eyes, and looked up in her preserver's face, like one who awakes from some frightful vision, and finds a parent bending over his troubled sleep. He assisted her to rise, when, with all the ardour and artlessness of real gratitude, she returned her acknowledgments for his generous exertions.

"Name them not," said he. "I hope I may ever be as prompt in the performance of my duty."

"Call it what you will," she replied, "the value of the benefit is unaltered. You have laid me under an obligation for which I can make no return but my warmest thanks. Oh, with what emotions will my mother listen to the particulars of this night's adventure! You have not preserved my life only, but hers also; for she lives but in my welfare."

* This mountain, situated in the western part of Massachusetts, forms one of the highest peaks in New England, its summit being nearly five thousand feet above the level of the sea. It derives its name from the grey or hoary appearance its alpine forests frequently exhibit, and which is occasioned by the congelation of the vapours of clouds in the cool temperature of its summit.

"I am doubly happy, then, in being the fortunate instrument of your preservation. But," continued he, "suffer me to attend you home, for the night wind breathes chilly along the stream, and wet garments are a sad shield against its influence."

"Thank you," returned she with a smile, recovering in part her native buoyancy of spirits, "thank you; for my carelessness may well entitle me to a guardian. What a silly creature was I to venture so near that treacherous bank. But it was just like me; I was always in love with this wild stream, and here I have played Gondoline to the life. But it has forfeited my good graces for ever," continued she, glancing archly at the dripping folds of her white dress, "O, I am glad it is not day, for people might mistake me for a mad quakeress."

"And I," interrupted her companion, "will fancy you a water nymph, and believe that I periled my life rashly, if you continue to linger here in opposition to my sage advice."

"I beg pardon, sir; but you need have no apprehensions for my health. However, Mr. —"

"Barnard," said he, with an awkward bend of the head.

"Ah, yes; Mr. Barnard of the senior class?"

"The same."

"Well, then, Mr. Barnard shall have the honour with the inconvenience of seeing Ellen Mansell home."

The student could not but smile at what he considered her eccentric and ill-timed levity, and as he threw his arm into an angle of forty-five, from whose vertex the superabundant water gushed as from a fountain, he said, "I am sorry Miss Mansell has not a better support."

"O, it is good enough—excellent—for it is in fine keeping with my own trim," she playfully returned, as she shook from her bright ringlets a shower of liquid pearls.

There are certain incidents in the life of every individual that in their power of interest with the heart surpass the aggregate occurrences of whole years. These form, as it were, the great mirrors of the past, by which the light of memory is reflected back upon the mind, through the dim obscurity of the "days that were." Oblivion may bury up the more trivial objects and emotions of former perceptions, but the remembrance of those peculiar events, however unessential to his general well-being, is as fresh as the thoughts of yesterday. Who, for instance, that has seen the ocean, can forget the sensations excited within him, when, from some neighbouring eminence, it first broke upon his vision in its dark amplitude of rolling waves? And who that has wandered for years far from his boyhood's haunts, a stranger among strange men, unfriended and alone, does not remember the hour when he again lifted the latch of his endeared home, and felt himself once more encircled by a mother's or a sister's arms? Such a moment is worth an age of monotonous existence, and might almost tempt the wanderer to endure again the buffetings of the world that he might enjoy another such blissful meeting by the fireside of his youth. The calm and even tenor of the student's days had now been interrupted by one of these incidents to which he ever after looked back with the highest satisfaction. There was something enduring in the remembrance of the hour when he was so gallant, and the maiden so beautiful, and both so happy. Never did he forget the moment when she twined her delicate arm in his, and he felt at his own side the beatings of that young heart, which neither the quiet loveliness of evening nor the sense of safety had yet restored to its native tranquillity.

As they turned to depart Ellen discovered her basket, which stood too far from the bank to participate in her accident.

"I came near forgetting my errand after all," said she. "Here, Mr. Barnard, is some early fruit I was carrying to a poor friend of my mother's, who resides in yonder little cottage by the large willow. As I was plucking some for our evening's entertainment, I thought that an idle hour could not be better employed than in bearing a portion of our abundance to the good dame. I was a little selfish too, for you must know that I love a moonlight ramble, especially by this sweet stream; and then such thanks as the old lady returns, so simple, so artless, are well worth a little fatigue. Now as you would be my beau, what favour do you think I shall require?"

The student laid the basket on his arm with a complacent smile, and they turned towards the cottage.

"I see, Mr. Barnard," she continued, "you are resolved to rob me of half the credit of my labour of love."

"And share in its pleasure likewise, Miss Mansell."

As he spoke they turned an angle of the garden fence, and entered the shade of the venerable tree, which sheltered the lowly dwelling of the poor widow. The door stood ajar, and they discovered its humble inmate seated in her arm chair, and apparently absorbed in the contents of a volume she was perusing. There was an expression of deep and powerful emotion in the face of the venerable person before them, and the youthful visitors paused.

"She is reading her Bible," said Ellen, in a low and serious tone, as if unwilling to disturb the sacred occupation of that lonely heart.

"It were not well to enter, then," whispered George; but before his companion had time to reply, the lowly worshipper closed the sacred page, and kneeling down, bowed her head upon her withered hands, as if conscious of her unworthiness to look up in the presence she sought. No tale of conscious merit, no voice of repining—no; not even a breath of exultation broke the stillness of the peaceful dwelling; but the low sob, and the involuntary movements of that bended form, told that "The restless agony of thought intense,

Too stern for human utterance or ear,
Yet poured in the deep hush of prayer," had found entrance to that heaving bosom. The silent spectators remained riveted to the spot, for they felt that it was indeed "holy ground" on which they stood. At length, as if impelled by some irresistible impulse, they advanced nearer the door. Not the least motion was now perceptible in the living statue before them. It was evident that the calm of the glad spirit had succeeded the rush of its former emotions, and that the consolations of renewed hope had shed abroad their peaceful influence in her subdued bosom. At last she arose, with the elasticity which follows the unbooming of the full heart, laid her Bible in its accustomed nook, and resumed her former seat.

"Let us now enter," said Ellen.

George tapped lightly on the door, which swung back as if to welcome them across its quiet threshold.

"How does my good Mrs. Perkins this fine evening?" asked the kind-hearted girl, while she buried her small hand in the clasp of the surprised widow.

"Oh, well, my sweet lady," replied she, rising to offer the only chair that graced her poor cottage.

"Sit down," returned Ellen; "I will never suffer youth to steal the least comfort from age. Nor would my companion," she continued, glancing at the student, whom the old lady in her excitement had not yet observed, and who now came forward. "Mr. Barnard," bowed she, "my good friend Mrs. Perkins."

"He needs no introducing, for he has visited my cottage these three years," returned the widow, warmly grasping the proffered hand. "But where have you been," she continued, dropping her spectacles over her eyes, and gazing with an air of surprise at the strait costume of her visitors. "Ye're as wet as the water-lily after a storm."

"It is nothing; a mere trifle," returned the laughing girl, unwilling to disturb the affectionate heart of the widow by an account of her recent danger. "You know what a night-lover I am, and I must tell you that the wild grape-vines which overhang the pathway to your cottage are not at all sparing of their showers of dew this evening."

"But ye'll catch cold as sure's ye live," interrupted the old lady. "What! and nothing on neither but this thin frock; and bare-headed, too; and this damp night! Why, Miss Ellen, you're crazy; indeed you are, in very truth. Now, sit right down, while I make a fire, and get a cup of warm tea; 'twill keep the cold away. You must dry you, you must; and Mr. Barnard, too."

"Thank you," exclaimed both at the same moment; "but," continued Ellen, "you shall give yourself no trouble, Mrs. Perkins. I shall not take cold this mild summer evening; besides, it is a short way home; and then, my mother will be distressed should she notice my absence."

The kind creature remonstrated, but in vain.

"Well, then," said she, at last, "you shall wrap yourself in my cloak, poor though it be, and unworthy of that pretty form. 'Twill not be amiss this dampsome night."

As she spoke, she took from the white-washed wall the humble garment, and laid it carefully over the maiden's shoulders. It was neat, though patched till it would have puzzled a mantua-maker to discover its original texture.

"You are extremely good, my kind guardian," said Ellen, as she folded it to her delicate waist; "but you shall not dispatch me too hastily from your hospitable dwelling."

"Now, ye know ye're ever welcome here," returned the widow with touching simplicity, "for ye are as the sunlight to my cottage. But your mother, your health, my child."

"I will go," said the half serious girl; for she could not endure the thought of that parent's anxiety.

"But here, Mr. Barnard has brought you a basket of fruit."

"A blessing on the dear young gentleman," ejaculated the grateful matron. "It is just like him and his mates. They have opened the fountains of knowledge to many a poor man's child; eye, and let in the day-spring from on high where there was nothing but gross darkness," she continued, while a tear gushed from her eye, as it glanced to her treasured Bible.

"You must thank Miss Mansell for the present," interrupted George; "to her kindness alone you are indebted for it."

"Oh, the dear lady! I can never repay her; but she'll not fail of her reward."

"Come, come, no more, Mrs. Perkins; between friends, what were a thousand such presents?"

"A widow's blessing go with ye," said the affectionate cottager, as they bowed good night.

Dame Perkins was one of that happy few who have not an enemy in the world, and who are always welcomed wherever they go. The old respected her for her artless piety, and the example of resignation held out to them in her noiseless life; and the young loved her for the simple courtesy and kind attention to their welfare which she always paid them. There was not a house in the village, or among the hills, where she was not regarded with the kindest interest; for she had visited them all when sickness or sorrow were the inmates. She was particularly welcome at the house of Ellen's mother, where she sometimes spent whole weeks. She had been the nurse of the charming girl who looked upon her with almost filial affection.

Her youthful visitors left the peaceful dwelling with light hearts, and turned into the narrow pathway which lay near the stream, sometimes winding under the gold-threaded willows that fringed its margin, and then stealing along more remote through clumps of tall sycamores, which locked their white arms in a thousand directions, as if to protect the humble shrubbery that flourished below. The silvery cadence of gushing water out-rung from the green hill-slopes, and blended with the deep and irregular bass of the mountain torrents, came like the harmony of aerial spirits over the hush of the sleeping valley. The river, too, had its night music, while the zephyr breathed his wood-note from the distant pine-tops. Nor was the green grasshopper mute in his lowly perch on the blossomed clover-stalk, but he chanted away joyously as the whip-poor-will from his hazel-bower.

"Our valley needs no Orpheus," said Ellen, as they emerged from a small grove into the broad moonlight of a little meadow that skirted her mother's dwelling.

"Nor the castle-building genii of Aladdin," returned her companion, glancing at the beautiful mansion before them, as small portions of its white surface gleamed out through the moving branches of overhanging elms.

At that moment they discovered a figure approaching them at a little distance. "It is my mother," said Ellen, "I know that quick step of parental anxiety. The runaway is returning," continued she, raising her voice above the bubbling river that murmured near. The object paused, and the youthful couple soon came up. It was indeed Mrs. Mansell. She had missed her daughter, and apprehensive for her safety, was now anxiously looking for her.

"Ellen, my child," asked she with an air which displayed more of joy than displeasure, "where have you been this long evening?"

"Why, mother, answered the laughing girl, glancing archly in her parent's face; "I have been in the garden, and the groves, and the meadows, and — in the river withal."

"In the river!" ejaculated Mrs. Mansell, turning pale.

"Most assuredly; here now, is Mr. Barnard, to whom we shall ever remain indebted, shall vouch for the truth of what I say," continued Ellen, in a half serious, half playful tone. The student returned with tolerable grace the introductory courtesy of the surprised matron, whose quick mind had already suspected the cause of that indebtedness of which her daughter had just spoken.

"I am happily a witness in the case," said he, "but my testimony would be of no account."

"Well, now I will confess the whole," laughed the thoughtless girl. "You must know then, that while bearing some apples to dame Perkins, the thought occurred to me of looking into the river, to see which of the two was handsomest, her ladyship the moon, or my own sweet self. But pride must have a fall; so while I was attitudinizing and comparing graces, away went the bank and poor I with it sheer into the stream. Then appeared this worthy knight, and rescued my beauty-ship at the peril of his life. I have forgotten the result of the comparison, but presume it was in my own favour." The parent trembled as with an ague at the playful narrative of her daughter's peril, and throwing her arms around her orphan child, as if to be more perfectly assured of her safety, she said with emotion, "You are a wild girl, my Ellen. Your thoughtlessness has fearfully endangered a mother's peace with the life of this gallant stranger."

"Forgive me, my mother," sobbed Ellen, for the first time vividly conscious of the circumstances of her fearful exposure, and overcome by the anxious tenderness of her doating parent.

"It is enough: I cannot chide you. Heaven be praised that you are safe. And you, my dear sir, she continued, relaxing her embrace to address the youth, "accept a widowed mother's blessing." But the object of her benediction had retired. Assured of the daughter's safety, he fled from the voice of the parent's gratitude, and was now nowhere to be seen.

"He has gone," murmured Ellen, and twining her arm around her mother's waist, they turned towards the house. P.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

On the third instant, this theatre closed with the Beggars' Opera and other amusements. This piece having been performed but once this season, and with a considerable difference in the cast, is a fair subject for review. As a literary production, the Beggars' Opera having passed its centenary, the great judicial test of excellence, must be considered as a composition out of the reach of criticism. It is still a favourite performance, and has undergone the fiery ordeal of Swift, Pope, Addison, Johnson, Cumberland, Inchbald, cum multis aliis. Yet, in this country, it is undeniable that there is an antipathy entertained against this drama, on the assumed ground that there is an inherent indelicacy in the subject, and in the manners of the dramatic persons, which, it is affirmed, renders it unfit for public exhibition; accordingly the managerial pruning knife has been applied, and this, together with the dissecting instruments of the corps dramatique, has so metamorphosed the author, that poor Gay is hardly known by his best friends. Still, as a musical piece, the Beggars' Opera is highly esteemed in the United States (not a mean compliment this to their taste.) But let us inquire if the antipathy above mentioned be not a prejudice. What greater purity of manners has the brigand and bandit school to boast? If originality be worth anything, Gay has it, for he was the first who softened the harsh characteristics of vagabondism, and converted a mounted robber into a hero. If we were disposed to try our hand at a regular built rhetorical period, we should say he had waved the wand of Prospero over the transactions of priggery, had converted Newgate into a flower garden, and had produced delight where disgust was expected, by skillfully sliding into the mouths of "rolling kiddies" and "flash coveys," apothegms in disguise, and "showing them up" as human beings actuated by the same secret springs, motives and passions, as those far above them in station. But we shall not leave Gay in so degraded a state as that in which a parallel with the banditti school would place him. Indeed it is a bold thing to affirm, but nevertheless true, that Gay is the superior of Byron and Schiller, inasmuch as he has a moral design, which the analytical observer will find running throughout the dialogue of the opera—indeed the most pungent and biting satire pervades the speeches and songs of Macheath, Peachum and Lockit, and neither Swift nor Beaumarchais has gone beyond it. We admit that the peculiar state of England some centuries since, gave an adventitious éclat to the appearance of the opera; but in this Gay has pursued the course which the greatest writers in all countries have followed: he seized the prominent topic of the day, and the most flagrant abuses of the period, as the vehicle for reading a lecture on human nature. The freshness of the gilding and the paint have died away, but the solid oak beneath remains. The present generation in England is as ignorant of the historical fact of the profligacy and corruption of the English police at the end of the sixteenth century, as the visitants of theatres in the United States; but the peculiar simplicity, sweetness, and adherence to nature, which characterise Gay as an author; the bold pencilling, the judicious shading and contrast of character, and the originality of design, which are attributes of the higher productions of the drama, remain unaffected by the corroding tooth of time. We have no doubt that some of the gentlemen of the theatre, who so ruthlessly mutilate and interpolate the text of Gay, have good reasons for what they do, because they do so—but still we should be curious to hear them. Perhaps they imagine, they are kindly assisting the author out of a scrape. When, for instance, Mr. Barnes deems it necessary to add "the new rum and black pepper dram," of hard and hair-erecting swearing, to the original dialogue, it is to be presumed that the text is too watery, or that the coats of the theatre-goer's stomach are gone, and this condiment is necessary to produce tone; but Mr. Hilson, although having a decent voice, chose to cut his author and his songs at once, and contributed nothing to tone. And then the caricature of a fight! What a beautiful ad captandum flourish! What a delightful discovery! Broad farcical buffoonry ingrafted upon the genuine English opera! And all this gagery for the benefit of those who think by the second, and laugh by the hour! Why should not the text of Gay meet with as much respect as that of the old comedies by Beaumont and Fletcher, Sir John Vanbrugh "et id genus omne?" Can Gay's piquant and nervous dialogue be profitably displaced by the slang and vapid witticisms of Joe Miller and Co.? Let a similar experiment be made with the productions of the immortal Shakespeare, and watch the result. Messrs. Barnes and Hilson, both meritorious actors, have seen better practice. They have witnessed in Munden and Downton the wily Peachum and the sturdy Lockit personified: surely they need not blush to model after such men.

We are not disposed to compliment Mr. Placide (much as we respect his talents) at the expense of veracity; the utmost we can allow is that his Filch was a very pleasant searcher of pockets, and exhibited much sleight of hand in untwisting the handkerchiefs (Cliffordice, fogles;) but it was not the Filch of Gay: still he was perfect in his dialogue, as he always is. Mr. Richings is entitled to the same commendation respecting his author, with this special addition that he was truly characteristic, and in dress, manners, and slang, an unimpeachable and veritable Mat of the Mint.

The Lucy of Gay is drawn evidently in antithesis of Polly. The delightful feminine qualities of artlessness, tenderness, sincerity, unbounded confidence, unfathomable and unquenchable affection, mildness without gall, like the dove's, and even inherent gentility—all these are Polly's par excellence. On the other hand, Lucy is violent in her manner, and something approaching to coarseness is not inappropriate.—She is also jealous and fitful. In the text, Mrs. Blake was perfect, nor can she be accused of any misconceptions or overcharging—an error too common in personating Lucy. Mrs. Wheatley was also one of the number who gave the text, and we cannot deny her the justice of playing up to the spirit of the author. Her bursts of passion were very efficient. It remains for us to speak of the principal vocalists. Mr. Jones as Macheath, was successful in most of his songs and duets; but in the dialogue he was strangely at fault. The language he delivered was certainly, for the most part, not to be found in the drama; and he was guilty of incessant transposition of words. By mistaking his business also the ladies who were on the stage with him, were evidently put to much inconvenience. On the whole, he was too tame, and not sufficiently flash. Polly, of whose qualities a slight sketch has been given, was represented by Mrs. Austin, and this character is the Corinthian pillar of the music of the piece. We found on this occasion, in the performance of the numerous songs and duets assigned to Mrs. Austin, the same clear and full intonation as ever—the same musical truth and executional brilliancy, with the same distinct and fine shake. She looked the character well, and gave the dialogue scrupulously in its original form and with propriety. If we are disposed to find any fault with her, it is for introducing a song into such an opera as this. Surely the beautiful old melodies, and the peculiar and quaint poetry which is set to them, ought not to be mixed up with any other species of composition. Mrs. Austin stands so deservedly high as a vocalist, that she can afford to omit the introduction of a song, because it happens to be popular, and ought to set the example of good taste to the profession in this respect. A HYPOCHONDRIAC.

A prince of Bourbon imagined himself to be dead, and refused to eat. To prevent his dying of starvation, ten persons were introduced to him in the character of illustrious dead like himself, and they invited him, after some conversation respecting the world of shades, to dine with another distinguished but deceased person, Marshal Turenne. The prince accepted this polite invitation, and made a very hearty dinner. Every day, whilst this fancy prevailed, it was necessary to invite him to the table of some ghost of rank and reputation; yet, in the other common affairs of life, the prince was not incapacitated from attending to his own interests.

THE FINE ARTS.

MUSIC.*

THE song inserted in the Mirror of this day, is a pretty melody, which scarcely requires the name of Charles Edward Horn, to identify it with "I've been Roaming," "Cherry Ripe," "Farewell to my Harp," &c. Mr. Horn is more remarkable as a melodist than a harmonist; at the same time there is no lack of pleasant modulation to be complained of in his compositions. His ballads are decidedly of a dramatic cast, and appear to more advantage in a theatre than in a drawing-room. After Bishop we are inclined to place Horn next on the list of English dramatic composers; decidedly before A. Lee, who is merely an effective plagiarist, without one atom of originality; and before Barnett, who seems fated to copy himself in the "Light Guitar," and never to get beyond that song. The best samples of Horn, as regards compositions of a higher grade, are to be met with in the opera called the "Devil's Bridge," in the concerted pieces of which he proves himself to be master of counter-point; but it is perhaps necessary to add that in this great test of the art, we prefer both Bishop and T. Cooke; the latter of whom has made rapid strides in the estimation of the profession, by having latterly borne away several of the prize glees, against such competitors as Horsley, Attwood, Elliot, &c. who are men of the first standing. Mr. Horn has left a most favourable impression as a pianiste in this country; probably in Europe it would be difficult to find a professor superior to him in the art of accompaniment. His mastery execution in the ballads "Said a smile to a tear," "Lilla, come down to me," and last, but not least, Beethoven's "Rosalie," will not easily be forgotten. As a vocalist, Mr. Horn has considerable execution and excellent taste; but in his singing you easily perceive a first-rate artist, trying to subdue an unwieldy and refractory voice: indeed, to borrow an Italian phrase, his voice is "under a veil," and to make it emerge from its concealment with effect, would be impracticable to most other men. As a teacher of singing, we look upon Mr. Horn as very superior, and we are given to understand that his return to America, after the season at Hay-market theatre closes, is not improbable. As an actor, Mr. Horn is a great contradiction to himself. In the opera of Der Freischütz as Caspar, he is admirable; his Artabanus in the opera of Artaxerxes is not less so, and he is the best Macheath on the stage. After these three characters, we really should be at a loss to name one which he plays more than tolerably, and in addition to this, he is rarely perfect in the words of the author; consequently he is frequently at the mercy of the audience, on whose good nature and forbearance he has drawn heavily, and had his drafts largely honoured in the city of New-York.

PORTRAIT PAINTING.

The exquisite art of giving to inanimate canvass all that intellectual expression which lights the human countenance, can hardly be too highly appreciated by every lover of the arts. When we reflect that an eye, which has once beamed upon us with affection, but is now closed in death, can be restored to us again by the painter's skill, we experience a feeling of respect for the artist, almost amounting to reverence. For although the portraits of private individuals possess little or no interest for the public generally; still, in those circles where the originals are known, and perhaps beloved, they are and must be regarded with pleasure. But if the sanctity of that circle has been invaded by death, and a chasm formed that can never be refilled, the magic art of the painter is hailed with a peculiar fervour of enthusiasm. These ideas were forcibly impressed upon our minds, while examining the highly finished likenesses which adorn the apartments of Mr. Boudet, portrait painter, Broadway. This gentleman has lately excited much notice by the felicitous accuracy of his delineations in copying the human countenance; and we are convinced that his talents have not been overrated. We instantly recognised, among his interesting productions, many faces that were familiar to us, and do not hesitate to pronounce him an artist of no ordinary skill.

LITHOGRAPHY.

"A picture of Girodet," says the National Gazette, "thirty inches by twenty-six, has been lithographed in Paris. This is understood to be the largest work on stone ever yet executed in that capital."

* From the unavoidable absence of our composer, who is an invalid, we have been obliged to defer until next number a gem from the valuable selection of melodies presented to us from Weber's Obeon, five of which we intended to publish in succession. We have the satisfaction, however, of being able to substitute a song by C. E. Horn, which was prepared some time since.—Ed. N. Y. Mirror.

NATURAL PASSION.

The sounding cataract
Hausteth me like a passion; the tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep and vernal wood,
Their colour and their forms are all to me
An appetite; a feeling and a love.—Wordsworth.

TRIUMPHANT bard! I feel the truth that lingers in thy lay,
I see the gleams of nature rise, and in thy stanza play;
And echoing in my bounding heart each sense and sound I hear
That haunts the mead and upland green, or the void atmosphere;
The birds' clear voice, the chant of streams, the charter'd winds that Along the lake and o'er the vale, each flower-breath to reveal— [steal
They come to me like whisperings, borne from the climes of sleep,
And, kindling joyance in my breast, perpetual sabbath keep!

Oh, when in our voluptuous youth, midst visions unreprieved,
The o'erflowing heart is rich with love, and yearns to be beloved—
How, if the soul grows sick, and spurns the heartless and the vain,
Doth nature open to the view her glorious domain?
Where breathes a sigh like twilight air? What lip is like the rose
When its soft and balmy leaves are curled in beautiful repose?
What eye can match the violet, whose downcast chalice lies,
Blessed by the radiant hues of heaven, and blue of Eden skies?

If there be passion that hath power to thrill my soul with bliss,
Like earth in garniture of spring or summer's loveliness;
If there are purer raptures born than morning's living food
Can waken in the chaste mind by mountain, stream and wood;
If there are smiles like sunset's smile, or graces like its cloud—
Oh! I would be a worshipper, in adoration bow'd!
Then would I say with earnest heart, whose praise should soar above,
"Oh who on earth would love to live without he! ve to love!" W. G. C.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

Saratoga, August 6, 1830.

MY DEAR SIR—We have been busily engaged since my last in running the usual round of amusement afforded to the pleasure-seeking visitors at this resort, until satiety has taken place of the excitement, which on our arrival rendered even the smallest incident at once novel and interesting.

The lake of Saratoga, with its sailing and fishing excursions, has lost its charms; and its really beautiful scenery, bounded as it is by the prospect of the Green Mountains, only serves to add to our impatience for traversing those verdant hills of "old Vermont," which lie in our route to the Canadian frontier. The fact is, we have exhausted all the "lions" of the place, and have become impatient for some change. "Entre nous," I begin to suspect, that notwithstanding the aspirations towards good society, which a part of my fair fellow-travellers possessed, they have found it, upon a close inspection, rapid, heartless, and fatiguing. Another cause may exist in the person of a British officer, whom we have attached to our suite; or rather, Miss Elmira has succeeded in exclusively appropriating him to herself. Major J.'s regiment is stationed at Quebec, and he is anxious to return to headquarters. The advantage of this gentleman as a cicerone to our party, is acknowledged by all, and he appears indispensable to the ladies. The gallant major is no bad specimen of his class and countrymen; his apparent devotedness to the service of the fair sex, his ready compliance with their little humours and caprices, and the increasing and interminable stock of agreeable nothings which are ever at his disposal, make him at least an amusing and useful appendage to our groupe. I strongly suspect a flirtation has commenced between this gay Lothario and Elmira; harmless, I trust, for my friend H.'s national prejudices would never allow him to consent to the union of the parties.

Madame H. and aunt Experience are delighted with his attentions; the one from her inherent love of rank and titles, the other from that universal regard she possesses for any person who will do the amiable agreeably.

You may suppose that during our stay here I have had ample food for observing varieties of the human character. It is indeed a place where a microscopic view of mankind can be taken more readily than amid the hurry and bustle of crowded cities; a more general mixing of grades is to be found, and the different species are submitted to a closer inspection. Flirtations may be analyzed with the most perfect precision, and their length determined upon with almost mathematical exactness; for a new beauty, or a fresh imported millionaire, will inevitably supersede the reigning belle of the moment, and these in their place give way to aspirants of greater pretension. Liaisons, platonic or otherwise, are all denuded of the mystery which enshrouds them in the usual intercourse of society; and an observer may, without much effort, exactly define the "little arrangements" of his neighbours at the first glance. All this is very edifying, as you may suppose, especially to the young; fortunately, however, they are too much engaged in the all-important business of establishing themselves to trouble their heads about the elder part of their associates. I have before mentioned the "exclusive," who form an important sect here, but am at a loss exactly to state the pretensions which gain admittance to the privileges of the circle; wealth, however, is all-powerful, and fashion is an undeniable requisite. One family, whom we both know, rest their claims wholly upon their ancestors and the profusion and splendour of their winter entertainments, although I believe it would puzzle the worthy heads of the family tree to trace who were their grandfathers. Others, again, are only "Zoadees" of great people, and are more offensive even than their patrons. The most original class of visitors here are those "who come like shadows, and so depart;" they are our honest citizens, who, in an evil hour, have yielded to the solicitations of spouse or daughter, to whom an annual visit to the Springs is indispensable, as affording subject for boasting amongst their less privileged friends for the next twelvemonths. They are easily detected; an obscure boarding-house is their chosen residence; they neither know nor are known to the fashionables by whom they are surrounded, and appear for the few days of their sojourn like melancholy strangers in a strange land. Miss may be arrayed in the very latest Parisian costume, but the tournure is wanting to give effect; while pe's bluntness and ma's plainness stamps the seal of "exclusive" inseparably on the coterie. This, perhaps, is as it should be. Why, in the name of every thing rational, do people flock to these almost barren spots, when so many healthy and picturesque places in our country are left unvisited, because fashion has not taken them under her magic protection!

We have a numerous class of gamblers, and other worthies of a similar kind, who are ever on the alert for the unwary and ignorant. A humorous incident, connected with one of these gentry, came under my notice the other day, and as our learned Dr. Ganderluch was the suffering party, its relation may interest you. The worthy disciple of Galen, among his other qualifications, prides himself upon his knowledge of "horse-flesh." I have learned he was a tolerable jockey in his younger days, and he now evinces his love for this favourite propensity by keeping at all times a horse that is the "crack" of the neighbouring country where he resides. His present Bucephalus is a fine animal, that has been greatly admired by all the connoisseurs in these matters since our arrival at the Springs. The doctor, to vary his amusements, has made several trotting matches for his pet horse, in all of which he came off victorious. A few days since a long, raw-boned, country-looking man made his appearance at one of the hotels, who rode a particularly fine mare. The animal attracted the doctor's attention, and an acquaintance was soon formed with its owner, Mr. Zerubbabel L. Sykes, who proved to be from "down east." The relative qualities of their separate horses soon became the subject of discussion between the two worthies. The doctor maintained the superiority of his own, and quoted the many victorious trials he had made since his arrival; this ended in a challenge from "the Yankee" to trot his mare against the doctor's charger, for a bet of fifty dollars; the challenge was immediately accepted, and the doctor lost the bet, which he paid instantly, consoling himself, however, with the conviction, that there was not another horse then at the Springs which could match his own. Mr. Zerubbabel told him not to be so certain of the fact, and offered to bring another man's horse that should beat the doctor's for any given sum. The indignant and irritated practitioner closed the bet, and the evening of the same day was appointed for the trial. The circumstance got afloat, and a crowd of spectators were assembled at the starting-place to witness the sport. I attended the doctor. We arrived punctual to the minute; my companion was certain of victory, for he had taken the trouble of ascertaining the quality of every horse in the village, and found that not one could compete with his own. A few minutes elapsed before our "Yankee friend" made his appearance, and the doctor began to chuckle at the certainty of having won his bet. At length we descried him, walking leisurely towards the starting-place, followed by the identical mare he had rode against the doctor in the morning; that was now mounted by a friend of the sagacious Mr. Zerubbabel L. Sykes. Every eye was turned with astonishment on the scene, and Doctor G. loudly demanded where his horse was?

"I guess Mr. Doctor, if you use your specs you'll easily see," was the answer of the Yankee.

"What do you mean?" replied the irritated man of medicine. "That is the horse you rode this morning."

"Certain," responded he of the disputed animal, "and it was my property then, but I guess you'll find it is another man's horse now; and I calculate, it was another man's horse that I bet to ride against yours this evening."

"Why you swindling rascal," vociferated the doctor.

"Easy, easy, Mr. Doctor," was the quiet interruption of the Yankee, "don't you call names; there's such a thing as law; here is our bet in black and white!"

And there indeed, it was; the doctor had agreed to run against another man's horse a mile, said horse to be rode by the Yankee. Proof was now demanded of the property having been transferred. This was easily produced, regularly signed by witnesses, and nothing was left the indignant doctor but to try another race with the victorious mare, or quietly to pay the bet, and clear himself of his new acquaintance. He preferred the latter mode; but the execrations he lavished on Mr. Zerubbabel L. Sykes, were not few. The "cute" horse jockey thought it expedient to shift his quarters the next morning, and we have not since heard of him.

I have exhausted my paper and must close. You shall hear from me on our arrival at Montreal. Yours, H. I.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

CAN there be two things more unlike than the city and country? In the first, you have only air, light, and a piece of blue sky stretching above the compact rows of brick-walls to remind you of the original appearance of our planet. The very people seem animals of a different species as they push by, or peradventure almost run over you in the hurry of business. I have sometimes thought that real civility (I mean among strangers) decreased exactly in proportion to your approach to the metropolis. Away off in some obscure and quiet country village, you receive a polite salutation from every passenger; and troops of little girls and boys returning from school, address you with bows and courtesies of profound respect; but as you travel nearer the mighty Babel, you perceive a diminution of that pleasing tribute, till at length you reach the thronged streets, and like a drop in the sea, are melted into the general mass, where much care is requisite to preserve your neck and your pocket-book, two articles, which to a man of business as society is constructed, are of about equal importance. Nature is sadly metamorphosed in town. Only think that the tender grass and flower-bushes have been torn away to make room for these broad, well-worn flag-stones. Perhaps on this very spot once stood a grove of venerable trees, and a torrent poured its silvery and flashing waters on towards the river; and, in olden times, perchance the spotted panther hath paused to drink; or the eagle, or the wild and beauteous deer hath here in a depth of loneliness, suited to his timid spirit, regarded his branching antlers in the mirror stream; and the dangerous snake hath glided along unmolested, or basked him in the noontide sun. And what have we now? A row of three-story brick houses, a grocery store, a lottery office, a tavern: signs too, St. Croix rum and sugar; fashionable hat-store; commissioner to take the acknowledgment of deeds; John Thompson, shoemaker; Obadiah Todd, counsellor-at-law; and crowds of Presbyterians and Episcopalians, Adams-men and Jacksonmen pouring along like the tide of the pure and playful brook, above whose once music-breathing channel their shuffling footsteps fall. If we could know their history! Yonder is a noble looking gentleman. With what stateliness he moves along! I should esteem him a poet—an immortal poet. His eye is full of the fire of genius, and he treads as if he would disdain to save his life by means of a dishonourable action. Alas, for Lavater! and alas, for human nature. He is a poor devil of a fellow who lives by gambling. He has no more idea of poetry than his dog, and would betray his best friend for five dollars. But take care, or you will run over that little, insignificant, shabby man at your right. Your eye has passed him carelessly. Look again. He is one of the most gifted of men. The philosopher—the orator—the writer. He has in him the wonderful power to wake in you the highest feelings. He sheds a flood of light upon every subject which he touches—he could thrill you with his fervid and glowing eloquence, and force every chord of your soul to vibrate; and when he would speak, multitudes of the learned and great and beautiful flock to listen. Yonder is a crowd pressing together to enjoy the horror and anguish of that wretched woman. They say she has committed a crime. She has been ground down by poverty—perhaps by hunger, and her sacrilegious hand has snatched something which the law forbade. The people swear, and curse, and fight, to get near enough to witness her desperate struggles; but two well-fed, lusty constables, have dragged her feeble form towards a cart in triumph. As the loud laughter announces her defeat, an ashy paleness overspreads her face—her head falls back—miserable creature—she is dead!

I thought of these things as I wandered with a party of agreeable friends along a retired country road, which wound its way among gentle undulations occasionally shaded by rich cool forests. Here was a contrast with the hub-bub of the town. We stopped upon the old boards of a rough bridge (just such a romantic affair as in the theatre prepares you for some wonderful event or other) to admire the scenery—look into the brook—watch the fishes—and the turn of the shining water as it fell over a little bed of stones. At this crisis, a great green bull-frog, whether from vanity—for to say the truth, he was a fine, plump, gentlemanly-looking fellow—or whether the unfriendly fates, sporting with frogs as well as men, had led him to the identical spot of all the winding stream towards which our several prying eyes were directed, it is not for me to assert; but it is very certain that such an individual did issue forth from some nameless haunt or other, better known to himself than me, and with a gentle and brief exclamation expressive of content, as if the world went well with him, but rather difficult to translate into English, did place himself in a station, which, as the result will show, was a little too conspicuous. There he sat, with his great round eyes started both sides out of his head, and his countenance—which to his fellow frogs might have been a very fine one—expressive of an idea, that he had got into a very comfortable situation. Whether he was young and enthusiastic, and like ourselves, had come out to enjoy the beauties of nature, or whether he was an old and experienced member of the community, or as the newspapers express it, “an aged and respectable citizen,” silently meditating upon the affairs of his watery world, we had no method of ascertaining. Many little stones, however, were thrown down at him, with various degrees of skill and success, one of which, I regret to state, hit him on the head, whereat he discovered evident signs of dissatisfaction, and abandoning our society with some abruptness, plunged down to the bottom among the sand and sedges, ruminating probably, in no very pleasant mood, upon this additional instance of the instability of human affairs.

Blackberries grew in abundance by the road-side, which we were not particularly averse to appropriate to the purpose for which I presume they were placed there; and, merry as the birds which sometimes flitted across our path, we wandered as fancy led over these summer scenes—by the bay, through the woods, over fences, and down valleys; breaking the silence of the green forest, and startling its timid and various inhabitants with the unaccustomed sounds of frequent laughter.

Time has a fine fashion of slipping along on these occasions: we are surrounded by so many innumerable objects which attract the eye and captivate the imagination. The bargain-driving, calculating, slavish varlet, whose life is frittered away in the narrow haunts of a great city in petty schemes to extort money from all persons and on all occasions, finds among these winding roads, these lofty hills, built up by the ancient hand of nature, and sweetly decorated with her playful fancies, pleasing feelings are stirring which have been long idle in the depths of his character. The world, in his imagination, shows like some stupendous animal pursuing at a distance its uncouth gambols, and amid these overshadowing branches and wild ravines, he seems to find a shelter from its vague and unhappy dangers. Shakespeare, in many instances, is full of this delightful imagery. As you read you seem absolutely to wander along verdant glades. Some object singularly beautiful, and sketched with the very force of reality, continually breaks upon your enamoured fancy. It is not like the efforts of other writers, merely ornamented with happy allusions to the scenes which he would delineate, but the scenes themselves seem rising around you—not faintly drawn—not dimly coloured—not caught by glimpses in pieces and again lost—but in all the rich, wild, vivid, delicious profusion of nature herself. Other poets recall nature, but nature herself brings back to the recollection the impressive and wonderful pictures of Shakespeare. I scarcely ever wander through a wood without remembering Oliver's story to Rosalind.

When last the young Orlando parted from you,
He left a promise to return again
Within a hour; and, pacing through the forest,
Chewing the food of sweet and bitter fancy,
Lo, what befell! he threw his eyes aside,
And, mark, what object did present itself!
Under an oak, whose boughs were moss'd with age,
And high top bald with dry antiquity,
A wretched, ragged man, o'ergrown with hair,
Lay sleeping on his back: about his neck
A green and gilded snake had wreath'd itself,
Who with her head, nimbly in threats, approach'd
The opening of his mouth; but suddenly
Seeing Orlando, it unlinked itself,
And with indented glides did slip away
Into a bush: under which bush's shade
A lioness, with udders all drawn dry,
Lay couching, head on ground, with cat-like watch,
When that the sleeping man should stir; for 'tis
The royal disposition of that beast,
To prey on nothing that does seem as dead:
This seen, Orlando did approach the man,
And found it was his brother.

OH, EARTH, HOW BEAUTIFUL ART THOU.

BY PROTEUS.

“A change comes o'er the spirit of thy dream.”
Oh, earth, how beautiful art thou
To the unclouded mind!
When round thy fair and peaceful brow
Spring's blossomed wreaths are twined;
And from the sinless heavens afar
Comes the rich light of sun or star
In kindly influence down.
Circling the forests' dreamy bowers,
And the proud city's gorgeous towers,
As with a radiant crown.
But nought to me of hope or joy
Thy glittering charms impart
A darkness shrouds my vacant eye,
And loneliness my heart,
Whose full warm pulses of boyhood's day—
Life's Geyser spring—has passed away
With cherished things that were—
I feel no more as erst I felt,
When at thy hallowed shrine I knelt
A willing worshipper.
Yet art thou still the same, glad earth,
As in thy budding prime:
Thy wealth of beauty and of worth
May mock the waster time:
As gay thy birds, thy shrubs as fair,
As clear thy crystal depths of air,
And rich thy perfumed bloom.
As those sweet woodland choir that sung
And skies that bent, and flowers that sprang
O'er the first shepherd's tomb:
As brightly beams night's azure bow
With living gems enshroued,
As when from the lone midnight tower
The searching Chorus sang:
As deep the voice of summer woods,
As wild the ocean's solitudes,
And loud its thundering flow;
As when, in sound or vision clear,
They met the patriarch's eye or ear
Five thousand years ago.
But man, the accepted lord of all
Thy glorious expanse,
In grief or gladness, hut or hall,
Is yet the slave of chance:
In his wild boom every power—
Thought, feeling, fancy—hour by hour,
Like magic forms are changed—
Warm beams at noon that fondly met,
Ere evening's starry watch is set,
Are off for aye estranged.
There be who in my better day
Went bounding on with me,
Mid fairy tales that smiling lay
On fortune's sunny sea.
Who, when hope's beacon light was lost,
And on a bleak untrodden coast
My foundering bark was thrown,
Sent off the deep no playing sigh,
But with the favouring gale swept by,
And left the wrecked—alone!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THOUGHTS.

BY THE PRINCESS DE SALM.

1. It is one of the most difficult things in the world to persuade ourselves that any one can love those whom we ourselves hate.
2. We always fancy there is something ridiculous about those sentiments which we ourselves have never felt—still more about those which we have ceased to feel.
3. The habit of despising that which is respectable or praiseworthy leaves an injurious impression upon the mind, which nothing can wear out.
4. Experience gradually teaches us, that the greater part of what we look upon as misfortunes, arises from our endeavouring to hasten, to change, or to constrain the natural course of events. It would almost seem as if there were a secret chain of connections, of cause and effect, which would conduct us naturally and necessarily to the object of our desires, if the restless character of our minds did not from time to time lead us astray.
5. There is, in regard to great misfortunes, a moment which causes even more pain than the misfortune itself—it is that in which we can no longer doubt of its existence.
6. There are griefs which no time or circumstances can totally cure or eradicate the sentiment of; they seem to retreat into the recesses of the soul, there to remain ready to present themselves whenever we feel a tendency towards unhappiness.
7. Petty and shuffling excuses, which satisfy vain and little minds, do but irritate generous ones, still more than the fault which they would explain away—there is no valid repentance but that which is full and sincere.
8. One of the greatest misfortunes in life is that of being compelled to live with those who, by the very character of their own minds, are prevented or incapacitated from appreciating ours.
9. There are people whom we love when they are absent from us, but who, when present, cause us to feel a repugnance towards them which engenders a temporary dislike, and consequently an unjust appreciation of their character.
10. Who can explain the operation of that sentiment which creates around the one object of our love a halo of life and beauty, which extends to all animate and inanimate nature; and of that other sentiment which, when we cease to love, strips the object of our late passion of all its adventitious charms, and reduces it to the ordinary level?
11. Love is the fever of the soul; passion is the delirium of that fever.

12. If a person in whom we have been accustomed to place implicit confidence, and who we do not believe to have ever yet deceived us, does so once in the slightest particular, by a falsehood, a subterfuge, or even a mere finesse, the charm is broken for ever, and the person seems changed and deteriorated in all they do, even to their personal appearance, the very traits of their countenance, the character of their expression, and the sound of their voice.

13. The spirit of intrigue causes in upright and honest minds a sort of dread, analogous to that which springs from personal dangers which may threaten us in darkness. This arises from the impossibility of our forming any exact judgment as to the nature of what we have to expect.

14. There can be no doubt that there are certain evil qualities of character which, though we cannot comprehend them in consequence of having nothing analogous to them within ourselves, we yet feel the presence of, and shun by a sort of instinct; like a blind person on the edge of a precipice, we feel the danger which we can neither see nor comprehend.

FRANCIS THE FIRST IN SPAIN.

When Francis the first was carried as a prisoner through part of Spain, his journey was more like that of a conqueror than a captive. At every place through which he passed the Spanish nobility endeavoured to surpass each other in generosity, and the display of their wealth. On his arrival at the houses of the nobles, a splendid dinner was immediately prepared for him, which was generally succeeded by a magnificent ball, in which the prince, out of politeness, always joined. On one occasion he asked two young ladies, remarkable for their beauty, to dance with him. They were the daughters of an old nobleman. The proud dames, who were exceedingly patriotic, instead of answering the prince, immediately turned their backs towards him. Their father was extremely displeased at his royal visitor being thus insulted, and he flew into a most violent passion, and taking them both by the hairs of their heads, dragged them from the festive scene. One of the principal nobles of Spain, Don Diego, Duke del Infantado, displayed on this occasion, by a singular ruse of self-love, a spirit which was thought very magnificent at that period, though at present it has something of a ludicrous air. Pretending to be afflicted with a severe indisposition, he caused himself to be brought out on the steps at the entrance of his chateau, seated in an arm-chair—and thus received the king in a sitting posture, while the latter was standing! At that period it was looked upon as a matter of great state and luxury among the nobles to possess a menagerie of wild beasts. The same nobleman above referred to, Don Diego, had one, from which, in the midst of the entertainment given to Francis the first, a furious lion broke from his cage, to the indescribable terror of the company, each person expecting to become a prey to the infuriated animal. But the major-domo of the chateau, immediately on hearing of the accident, went down to the kitchen, in which all the servants had fastened themselves, and taking in one hand a flaming firebrand, and in the other his sword, he rushed, thus armed, in front of the lion. The animal, terrified at the sight of the flames, drew back, and the major-domo pursued him till he reached his cage, in which he shut him with as much sang froid as if he had merely been correcting a hungry dog that had been caught in the act of stealing. The king admired this trait of courage more than any thing he met with during his abode with Don Diego. On concluding his visit, Francis said to the old noble, “Duke del Infantado, a servant like yours gives one an exalted opinion of the master whom he serves.”

RIDICULE AND THE RIDICULOUS.

“Ce n'est pas un crime, ce n'est pas un vice, c'est pire encore, — c'est un ridicule!” — JOURN.

The fear of ridicule may be classed with equal justice among “the follies of the wise,” and “the wisdom of the foolish.” Many a human mind, of ordinary endowments or extraordinary incapacity, is restrained within an orbit of discretion by apprehension of the sneers of society, and ears wholly imperious to the voice of the charmer, shrink with instinctive terror from the searching echoes of the world's loud laugh. In its accomplishment of good and evil, the omnipotence of ridicule maintains a pretty even balance of power; the mighty majority, the foolhood of the earth, is subdued into decency by its scorpion scourge; while the minority—the good men and true, the erudite and the wise, shroud themselves from the lash within the foldings of their cloak, and shun the publicity which alone originates the anguish of the wound.

There was a time when France, or rather Paris—which is to moral France as the oyster to its shell—boasted its pre-eminent subjection to this grinning tyrant of the social world.

"In Spain, avoid the inquisition;—In England, the mob;—in Paris, le ridicule," was a popular proverb of the last century. But in this folly of fashion, as in most others, we island imitators have already far outstepped the modesty of our continental origin; and in London, as in the Faubourg St. Germain, a caricature, a paragraph, a burlesque cognomen—the persiflage of the club, or the biting jest of the coterie, assumes a more terrific power than the racks and dungeons of the sons of St. Dominick, or the factious energy of Pennenden-beath. We English, who proclaim ourselves the most phlegmatic and unsusceptible of heaven's human creatures,—who brave unscathed the snows of the Pole, and the fervour of Timbuctoo,—fly like babes and weaklings from the mosquito-stings of satire, and acknowledge that "there lies more peril in a sneer than twenty of their swords!"

"Mettez les rieurs de votre côté, et chantez victoire!" is another axiom of those cunning miners into the darker depths of the human heart,—the filosofastri of Paris; and it is singular with what alacrity the public seekers after verbal conquest have adopted the injunction. It is now more than a century since Pope, in his capacity of satirist, boasted himself

"Proud to see
Men not afraid of God, afraid of me."

But a mightier master of the craft has since arisen; and Voltaire
"Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer,"

has been seen to effect a far more miraculous operation by the powers of ridicule. Even the brightness of divine revelation was for a time obscured by the baneful fogs and mists produced by the fiendish wand of this powerful necromancer! The best or worst arguments of Helvetius or Diderot were powerless compared with the scoffs and scorn of the jester of Fernay.

As a political engine, we have seen the powers of ridicule exerted with incredible skill and success. Canning, from whose lips they derived the polish and keenness of a Damascus blade, with which he could dazzle the eyes of his opponents, even as with the flaming sword of the cherubim, rendered this weapon of offence a talisman to the party it protected.

The truth is, that the power of ridicule consists not in its own strength, but in our weakness. It is a halter fitted to every neck—a bit applicable to every mouth. The criminal and the vicious are comparatively few in number; but we have all our weak points, and can be rendered ridiculous with very little effort on the part of the satirist. "Trust me," says Sterne, in his dissertation upon satirical wit, "when it is once resolved that an innocent and helpless victim shall be sacrificed, it is an easy matter to pick up sticks enough from any thicket where it has strayed to make a fire to offer it up with."

Having alluded to the use and abuse of ridicule in the skirmishing warfare maintained by the disaffected against church and state, it may appear an anti-climax to treat of its powers as an instrument of criticism; but of late years, and especially of late days, the whip has been so harshly and inconsiderately wielded; respectable and popular authors and works have been so coarsely quizzed into vulgar contempt, that we cannot overlook the means employed to effect this invidious disparagement. Leaving the fashionable novelists to human or divine indignation, we are inclined to feel and believe that such poets as Campbell and Moore are deserving, even in their weakest works, of graver criticism than mere snip-snap personality. Hamlet has been successfully travestied, and Milton parodied; nor does there exist a work of excellence, however sterling, which may not assume a character of absurdity when exhibited through the distorting medium of irony. Now this is a fact so universally admitted, that a man of real talent as a critic should spare a talented brother the torture of such a paltry infliction: ridicule, in the hands of a gifted writer, is as the jawbone of an ass in the hands of Sampson, contemptible in itself, but fatal in execution. It is not till the white lady of Avenel has levelled her palpable mockeries at Pierce Shafton in the shape of the tailor's bodkin, that we feel her to be

"No boding maid of form divine."

Had she, like Ariel, "done her spiriting gently," and forborne to "quizz" the Euphuist, we might have continued to regard her as "some gay creature of the elements," and prolonged our worship; and in like manner, the moment a critic forsakes the lofty dignity of argument, and replies "with a fool-born jest," we are apt to suspect a lamentable degree of weakness either in his victim, or in himself. The entreaty of the Prince of Denmark,

"I pray thee, do not mock me, fellow-student," might be fairly urged among our living literati, and more especially among those who, like the hero of Gay's epilogue are apt

—to build their fame
On ruins of another's name"

THE ARAB MAID TO HER LOVER.

A lonely Arab maid,
The desert's simple child,
Unskilled in arts, by which, 'tis said,
Man's love may be beguiled.
Like some uprooted flower am I,
Upon a river flung,
To float a little hour, then die,
Unheeded as I sprung.

But if thy friendly hand
Should lift me from the tide,
And bear me to some distant land,
To bloom, thy bosom's pride;
O, sooner from his darling rose
The nightingale shall roam,
Than I disturb that heart's repose,
Which love hath made my home.

A CHAPTER ON WALKING.

Man may be defined "a walking biped;" for no creature on two legs can walk except man. Ducks and stout elderly dowagers may waddle; grampusses and gouty aldermen may roll; dancing-dogs, dandies, and dancing masters may trip; sparrows and young spinsters may "hop, skip, and jump;" but man alone walks. Moreover, it is difficult "to read the mind's construction in the face;" and still less easy to predict the nature of a man's character from his words and actions; but you may judge of these with absolute infallibility from his walk—and may even determine by it his vocation and his rank in life.

Every class has its appropriate walk. It is impossible to mistake that of the physician. The repeated jump in and out of the carriage, gives him a throw or jerk of the knees upwards, like Scotch highlanders accustomed to go up and down steep hills. He alternately throws the knees up or the legs off, as if the tibia were to be dislocated. If the physician is fat, his gait resembles that of the Irish bog-trotter, who labours at every step to lift his encumbered foot from its deep impression in the bog. And there is the mock solemn, the dolorously soft creeping pace to the patient's bed-side or elbow chair—the right hand protruding a little before the body, the palm upwards and half-exposed. This is the hint professional.

The lawyer has a hurried, shuffling gait; his head like that of the Chinese mandarins in the wax figures in perpetual motion; never looking straight forward, without a slight twinge to the right and left.

The woolly-headed negro is not more distinctly marked from the pale flaxen-headed Swede than the eastern and western population of London are distinguished by their walk. Woe be to the exquisite who attempts to lounge, or to "twitch his cane" east of Temple-bar.

In the city, no man walks at his ease. It is the only part of the British empire in which that peculiarly English word comfort—comfort in walking—is unknown. Every man "bustles along" empresé, his sallow face elongated, or his full face swollen with a smoky importance. He jostles, and is jostled, and threads the crowd with a tact superior to that with which Arethusa is said to have threaded the woods. It is wonderful to see the peristaltic walk of a citizen. Like a corkscrew he twirls in and out, and though Cheapside may appear too crowded to admit of locomotion, he goes zig-zag—pointing or rounding his angles, and is presently at the other end of it.

It is different in the west. The most remarkable of walkers is Sir W. W. Wynn. His immense height, his huge bulk, his enormous stick, like a sapling oak—his capacious skirted coat, broad-brimmed hat, and thick ten-leagued boots—remind one of Gog and Magog. It is curious to see his ponderous rolling gait; his foot seems to sink the flag-stones. Onward he moves, caring not for the pigmies; never does he deviate an inch from the straight line, and if you did not move out of his way, he would walk over you, unconscious of the obstruction.

There is the double of this Welch baronet—a gentleman yclept "the city baby," and by some "the giant." He would walk like the baronet, but the city has impressed its gait upon him, as far as it can be impressed on such bulk. J. R. the bank director, when he travels to the west, reminds one of "the currency question."

We would swear the peace against Mr. Peel for his style of walking. He is always alone, with business and stern cares impressed on his face; his motion is that of the athleta, and his arms either swinging terrifically to and fro, or the elbows pointing out, and the doubled fists pointing in, reminding the alarmed spectator of the statesman's favourite exercise with the gloves at Mr. Jackson's rooms. He seems to carry the house of commons in his closed palms.

What a contrast is the walk of Jack Calcraft, the son of "honest Jack Calcraft," as he was called in days of yore, notwithstanding he was an army-clothier at a time when contractors had but an indifferent reputation. Jack's soft patting, short pace, with his self-satisfied unabashable face, and his well-brushed hat, knowingly on one side, en garçon, are full of character. Jack never looked so ill as by comparison, when he used to walk with the luxurious, full-blown, expansive Miss C.—but no comparisons.

There is another Jack—the lion of England—tall, stout, of rubicund visage, hirsute and setaceous, with hurly-burly expression, and with ponderous jaws, and huge pouting lips, that remind us of the very scene where he kicked the chair from under the Earl of Chatham, and roared to the speaker, "You, there, the little man with a wig."

Of all walks, that of the Duke of Wellington is the most characteristic: albeit his legs are remarkably short, his walk is firm, quick, precise, and decided. His whole expression is that of concentrated energy—nothing superfluous—it looks like "business to be despatched immediately."

The most extraordinary walk recently on the tapis, is that of Lord Lowther, who at the witching hour of night, paced the fronts of the houses in Cockspur-street, and found that the architect had cribbed some feet of frontage from the government.

But how full of individuality of character, and of the state of mind and feeling of the moment, is the walk! Look at young Spencer, of the Life Guards: how unrestrained, firm and bold is his gait! he is every inch a soldier. What a perfectly self-complacent, luxuriating state of mind,—what a délassement de cœur is in the lounge of Moore; whilst the saunter, rather than the lounge, of Harria, speaks flute-tongued, not trumpet-tongued, a weak mind and relaxed body. What a saucy indolence, and insensible enjouement are in the lounge of young Lord B.; whilst the firm, positive carriage, and assured step of his friend D. speaks a mind stern of purpose, and created to command.

I never could endure the stealthy pace of Lord Buxley. It is like that of a mouse creeping into a cupboard.

Walks may be accurately described or defined by single terms. There is the "as-good-a-man-as-you" walk, the "noti me tangere" walk, the "can-I-do-any-thing-to-serve-you" walk, the "how-do-you-think-I-look" walk, the "town-is-very-dull" walk, the "'tis-extremely-hot-weather" walk, the "curm-cold-walk"; also, the walk courteous, the walk repulsive, the walk pugnacious, and a score of others, which the man of discernment in London can well understand. But, doubtless, all appertaining to this matter may be found in Walker's dictionary.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.

A most tragical occurrence has just happened at Trenton Falls. The subject of the melancholy catastrophe was a Mr. Charles Oliver Bill, a student of the medical college at Fairfield, a young man about one and twenty, who is said to have been of much promise, and universally esteemed. It seems that he was conducting several young female friends around the first point of rock, a few rods above the lower fall, when, incautiously stepping into the edge of the current, his foot slipped, he was drawn into the stream, and swept from the spot in an instant. While borne along by the current the young man made repeated and violent efforts to regain the shore, but the torrent was too strong to resist, and his friends saw him hurried over the fall without the ability to afford him assistance. His look, as he was carried over is represented as heart-rending in the extreme, and the more so as they were unable from their position to assist, as he seemed by that look to request they would do. He was precipitated a descent of forty feet into the gulf below, from which he was never seen to rise. The party was composed of his sister, uncle, and two cousins, the former of whom immediately ran towards the public house for assistance; but she was so much distracted when she arrived, that it was some time before the by-standers were able to learn what she wanted to make known to them. Her appearance was distressing to every one; she had lost her hat, and in running for help her hair had fallen over her shoulders, and she was in a state of mind little short of distraction. A number of persons immediately went to the falls, and found the rest of the party almost overcome with grief, but no traces of the deceased could be discovered. The body was found on Wednesday below the lowest fall.

LITERARY NOTICES.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

The Undying One, and other Poems. By the Honourable Mrs. Norton. Colburn and Bentley, 1830.

SAY what we may about poetry being "out of fashion," it is a thing of which, if it deserves its name, the world will never tire—not even the world of fashion itself—which tires of every thing else—its gay self included. Here is a volume of the true material, emanating from one of the most graceful and accomplished pens of the day, and one from which every succeeding emanation is more bright and beautiful than the last. Let not our too critical readers carp at our repetition of the phrase "emanating"—which is, we can assure them, an advised and appropriate one in this instance—howbeit, somewhat euphuistical; for these charming verses seem to emanate from the mind which has engendered them, like a lovely halo from the features of some sainted beauty; softening the loveliness which it heightens, and giving to that which is evidently of earth an air and hue that assimilate it to the heaven which it sighs for, and towards which it is ever pointing. As the new volume will, as a matter of course, be shortly in the hands of all our readers at least, (for it will, doubtless, be read as a duty by the few who may not read it as a pleasure) we shall not enter into any of those minute details respecting it which would, by reason both of time and space, compel us to defer our notice of it till another opportunity. We must state, however, that it consists of one long poem, occupying more than half the volume; and a variety of shorter ones. Of the latter we need say but little, as the characteristics of Mrs. Norton's minor productions are well known to our readers. It is by the longer poem contained in this volume that the lady's poetical pretensions will chiefly be tried, both now and hereafter; since it is by far the most elaborate she has yet produced, while its subject is incomparably more difficult of treatment, and more susceptible of producing poetical effects.

The "Undying One" is written in an irregular measure, or rather, almost every variety of measure is adopted successively, according as the nature of the thoughts, sentiments, images, and incidents of the story may direct; and the story itself is calculated to create a deep and intense interest in the minds of those among whom chiefly the readers of poetry are to be found, and among whom alone they are to be found in any great numbers in the present day—namely, the lovers of the romantic, the strange, the fearful, the mysterious, and the superhuman. "The Undying One" is, in fact, no other than the traditional being who is supposed to have been cursed for his sins with an earthly immortality, commencing from the era at which his tribe were made the instruments of consummating the redemption of an otherwise condemned world:—he is "the wandering Jew!" The scene of the poem is laid in an eastern land at its commencement, and at a recent era; and three-fourths of the book consists of a relation—to the objects of his last love, Lina, the only other person of the story—of the "Undying One's" adventures, connected with and growing out of his human passions, as modified by the strange fate that is upon him. The remaining portion of the poem relates the further circumstances attending the mutual love of Lina, and "The Undying One," and its fatal close, which leaves the latter as it found him, undying and alone. It should be stated, too, that love is almost the sole subject matter, even of that part of the tale which "The Undying One" relates himself—thus preserving to the poem a unity of sentiment and of result, which any other mode of treatment would have sacrificed.

In speaking briefly and generally of the manner in which Mrs. Norton has treated the extremely difficult theme she has chosen to adopt, we must at once state our impression that she has, in every particular (except perhaps the mere concatenation of events—the mere conduct of the plot) very far surpassed even the sanguine expectations which her previous productions had excited in us, and has fully entitled herself to rank among the real poets of the day—in distinction from the numerous elegant and accomplished versifiers with whom our literature at present abounds, and among whom (we may now venture to confess it) we had placed Mrs. Norton herself. There are passages in this book—and those not brief nor few—in which may be found every quality required for the production of high poetry—namely, depth and originality of feeling, force and freedom of thought, vigour and vitality of imagination—fancy, eloquence, imagery, a fine ear for musical expression—and withal, a philosophical cast of mind; which latter we cannot but think (contrary we believe to the general opinion on this point) is of almost as much importance to the production of high poetry as it is to that of every thing else of real and permanent value. As the work is scarcely yet before the public, we must not refuse ourselves the pleasure of copying out a few passages, illustrative of the fine powers which almost every page of the work displays.

We know of few things more delicately, yet passionately beautiful, than the following description of woman's love:

To worship silently at some heart's shrine,
And feel, but paint not, all its fire in thine;
To pray for that heart's hopes when thine are gone,
Nor let its after coldness chill thine own;
To hold that one, with every fault, more dear
Than all who whisper fondness in thine ear:
To joy thee in his joy, and silently
Meet the upbraiding of his angry eye;
To bear unshrinking all the blows of fate,
Save that which leaves thy sorrow desolate;
Nor deem that woe, which thou canst feel is still,
Borne with him, and for him, through every ill;
To smile on him—nor weep, save when apart,
God, and God only, looks into thine heart;
To keep unchanged thy calm, pure, quiet love,
If he, Inconstant, doth a new one prove;
To love all round him, as a part of him—
E'en her he worships; though thine eye be dim
With weeping for thyself—to pray that not
One cloud may darken o'er their earthly lot;
With the affection of true hearts, to see
His happiness, which doth not hang on thee;—
Oh! this is woman's love—its joy—its pain;
And thus it has been felt—and felt in vain.

The following lament is equally beautiful:

We shall meet no more on the sunny hill,
Where the lonely wild-flower springs and dies;
We shall meet no more by the murmuring rill,
Where the blue cold waters idly rise.
The sunshine and flowers all bright remain,
In their lonely beauty, as of yore;
But to me 'twill never be bright again;
We shall meet no more—we shall meet no more!

We shall meet no more in the lighted halls,
Amid happy faces and gay young hearts;
I may listen in vain as each footstep falls—
I may watch in vain as each form departs!
There are laughing voices; but thy young tone
Its cheerful greeting hath ceased to pour;
Thy form from the dancing train is gone;
We shall meet no more—we shall meet no more!

As the poem is chiefly a narrative one, we shall give one specimen of the writer's mode of placing pictures before the reader's eye, and educing from them those poetical feelings and associations in which the value of writing of this nature consists. The following is, for the most part, no less exquisite in style, than it is in feeling, thought, and imagery. The concluding passage, of the flowers and pebbles, is the very perfection of this class of poetry:

One eve, at spring-tide's close, we took our way,
When eve's last beams in soften'd glory fell,
Lighting her faded form with sadden'd ray,
And the sweet spot where we so loved to dwell.
Fondly and dreamingly she sat her down
By the blue waters of the Guadalquivir,
With darkness on her brow, but yet no frown—
Like the deep shadow on that silent river:
She sat her down, I say, with face upturn'd
To the dim sky, which twilight was forsaking;
And in her eyes a light unearthly burn'd—
The light which spirits give whose chains are breaking!
And, as she gazed, her low and tremulous voice,
In murmuring sweetness, did address the earth
With mournful rapture, which makes none rejoice,
And gladness which to sorrow doth give birth.

The spring!—I love the spring; for it hath flowers,
And gaily plumed birds, and sapphirine skies,
And sleeping sunshine, and soft cooling showers,
And shadowy woods, where weary daylight dies;
And it hath dancing waters, where the sun,
With an enamoured look at the light waves,
Doth hush himself to rest when day is done,
And sinks away behind their rocky caves.

I love the spring, for it hath many things
In earth and air that mind me of old days;
Voices, and laughter, and light murmurings,
Borne on the breeze that through the foliage plays;
And sounds, that are not words, of human joy;
From the deep bosom of the shelter'd wood,
Woods dimmed by distance, where, half pleased, half coy,
The maiden chides her broken solitude.

She paused, and on the river bent her glance,
As if she loved to see the waters dance,
And dash their silver sparkles on the shore,
In mockery of ocean's giant roar.
And a half smile lit up that pallid brow,
As, casting flowers upon the silent stream,
She watch'd the frail sweet blossoms glide and go,
Like human pleasures in a blissful dream.
And then, with playful force she gently flung
Small shining pebbles from the river's brink,
And o'er the eddying waters sadly hung,
Pleased, and yet sorrowful, to see them sink.
"And thus," she said, "doth human love forget
Its idols: some sweet blessings float away,
Followed by one long look of vain regret,
As they are slowly hastening to decay;
And some, with sullen plunge, do mock our sight,
And suddenly go down into the tomb,
Starting the beating heart, whose fond delight
Chills into tears at that unlook'd for doom;
And there remains no trace of them, save such
As the soft ripple leaves upon the wave;
Or a forgotten flower, whose dewy touch
Reminds us some are withering in the grave."

We cannot take leave of this elegant volume without congratulating its accomplished writer on the rare powers which it displays; and we must add our regret at being precluded from gracing our pages with more than the foregoing brief examples of its many beauties.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Intercourse with the states.—In one of the numbers of the Federalist, written by Mr. Jay, is this prophetic remark—"This country and this people seem to have been made for each other." That illustrious patriot lived to see its verification; and for many years enjoyed the glory and tranquillity which were the rich reward of those noble efforts and sage counsels that led to a revolution, which will never cease to be the admiration of mankind. Every returning season is a new illustration of the sentiment. A free and powerful people are making rapid advances towards national greatness. Unclogged in the full exercise of their energies, and having entire scope for the display of their enterprises, their united operations have already produced a spectacle of striking magnificence, and their combined force exhibits the indisputable evidences of a giant's strength.

The facilities now presented to travellers through every portion of our immense territory by the agency of steam, and by means of canals, substantial highways and bridges, and sumptuous hotels, in which every comfort and every enjoyment is found, are altogether so extraordinary, that it seems difficult to point out an inconvenience or an impediment. Accordingly, in the pleasant months of the year, we find multitudes incessantly in motion, either in the pursuit of pleasure or of business. In the hot season a northern tour is thought indispensable to the preservation of health. New-York is the first point of destination; and from this point the numerous migrators shape their course, as they are either led by fancy or inclination. Some prefer the ocean breezes of Rhode-Island, others seek the refrigerative atmosphere of the Catskill Mountain, but the larger portion congregate at the Springs, where mirth and enjoyment abound, and where those powerful attractions are concentrated which are universally acceptable to people of refinement and cultivated taste.

It is universally conceded that our southern neighbours rank among the first in the Union for their liberal acquirements and polished manners, as well as for their wealth. The advantages arising from their annual visits, and from that free and unrestrained intercourse which is so congenial to their habits, cannot be easily estimated. In every point of view it becomes of importance. It roots out local feelings, subdues narrow prejudices, and paves the way for the universal prevalence of those kind and generous sentiments so inestimably valuable in a country of such vast extent as ours, and one exclusively subject to popular forms of government. Who can withhold his tribute of admiration, or conceal those emotions of delight, which spring from the contemplation of such a rare assemblage of national blessings and of individual benefits? Where is the man whose pride is not flattered on beholding the picture, or who is not conscious of the mighty destinies that await us, provided we can exercise so much wisdom only as shall enable us to preserve what God in his mercy has vouchsafed to bestow upon us? The rich products which are the yearly growth of our splendid union, are such as must immeasurably transcend the views and calculations of any mind, however comprehensive or gifted. How persuasively, then, does this interesting and imposing theme address itself to every man not dead to reflection; and how infinitely great are the consequences that hang upon it!

The New-York Monthly Review.—This is the title of a new periodical just commenced in this city, and the first number, for July, is now before us. It is published by Elam Bliss, whose name is a sufficient guarantee for accuracy and neatness of typographical execution. The present number comprises eighty octavo pages, enclosed in a printed cover. The work is edited, we understand, by a young gentleman of genius and education. From a hasty glance at the contents we perceive that several fine writers—Wetmore, Neal, Palmer, Gates, Miss Bogart, &c.—are among its contributors. Although many previous attempts to establish works of a similar character in this city have failed, we have no doubt that talent and perseverance may ultimately effect so desirable an object.

Everard and W. G. C.—Among the writers of talent in the United States, Willis G. Clarke is deservedly one of the most popular. His productions, both in prose and poetry—for he enjoys the rare faculty of writing in each with equal felicity and ease—have recently met with general favour on both sides of the Atlantic. His contributions, which are characterised by no ordinary interest, have frequently graced the columns of this miscellany, and it is to be hoped will often do so in future times. The signatures which we have placed at the head of this notice, are those under which his communications have been published. There will be found in this number some exquisite verses of his, which will ensure the admiration of all worshippers of the muse.

THE CHIMES OF ZURICH.

AS SUNG BY MADAM VESTRIS WITH UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE.—MUSIC COMPOSED BY C. H. HORN.

Pensive.

SECOND VERSE.

The shades of eve were on the wave,
And twilight's fairy dells,
Whilst echo answer'd from her cave.
The distant ev'n'ing bells:
Wild birds were singing,
Flow'rets were springing,
Sweet chimes were ringing,
I hear them yet:
Wild birds were singing,
Flow'rets were springing,
Sweet chimes were ringing,
I can ne'er forget;
Sweet ev'n'ing chimes,
Sweet ev'n'ing chimes,
I can ne'er forget.

VARIETIES.

CURE FOR A PASSIONATE TEMPER.—A merchant in London had a dispute with a quaker, respecting the settlement of an account. The merchant was determined to bring the question into court, a proceeding which the quaker earnestly deprecated, using every argument in his power to convince the merchant of his error; but the latter was inflexible. Desirous to make a last effort, the quaker called at his house one morning, and inquired of the servant if his master was at home. The merchant hearing the inquiry, and knowing the voice, called aloud from the top of the stairs, "Tell that rascal that I am not at home." The quaker, looking up towards him, calmly said, "Well, friend, God put thee in a better mind." The merchant, struck afterwards with the meekness of the reply, and having more deliberately investigated the matter, became convinced that the quaker was right, and he in the wrong. He requested to see him, and after acknowledging his error, he said, "I have one question to ask you—how were you able, with such patience, on various occasions to bear my abuse?" "Friend," replied the quaker, "I will tell thee; I was naturally as hot and as violent as thou art. I knew that to indulge this temper was sinful; and I found that it was imprudent. I observed that men in a passion always speak aloud; and I thought if I could control my voice, I should repress my passion. I have, therefore, made it a rule never to suffer my voice to rise above a certain key; and by a careful observance of this rule, I have, with the blessing of God, entirely mastered my natural temper." The quaker reasoned philosophically, and the merchant, as every one else may do, benefited by his example.

GEORGE THE THIRD.—Some years since, the royal artillery changed the cocked hats, which they had long been in the habit of wearing, for caps, which were remarkably ugly and unbecoming. Soon afterwards, the king was present at a grand review, at which an artillery company or two assisted, and he was observed to look with some surprise at the men. Upon the conclusion of the review, the king sent for one of the officers in command of the commissaries, and, in his quick manner, asked, "What are those—what are those—those things on the men's heads?" "Caps, sire," replied the officer: "please your majesty, the new caps." "Bad, bad," said the king; "don't like them at all; ugly, ugly, very ugly." "But," continued the officer, not a little chagrined, "permit me to assure your majesty that the men like them much; they find them very comfortable." "What! what?—comfortable, eh?" retorted the good-humoured monarch with a smile, "ay—ay, very comfortable, no doubt—so are night-caps—so are night caps."

QUEUES.—The late Lord B. was one of the last adherents to the exploded fashion of queues, his pigtail being one of unreasonable prolongation. His lordship's groom having been one day delayed on the road, inquired of a countryman, "Hollo! my man—have you seen a tall gentleman go by, on a long-tailed horse?" "No!" replied Clodpole, "I ha' oonly seen a long-tailed gentleman on a tall horse!"

FOUNTAIN AT SMYRNA.—A fountain at Smyrna is said to possess this remarkable quality, that the man who has once drank of its waters cannot depart without taking with him a wife of the place.

TO A YOUNG FRIEND.

BY THYRA.

Few are thy years, thou happy boy,
And little of this earth's alloy
Can yet thy heart have entered;
For thine are now those happy hours,
Where all the poetry and flowers
Of life have ever centered;
And never did its morning shine
Upon a fairer path than thine.

Blest in a lot which from thy birth
Had little of the thorns of earth,
Nought of its gloom and sorrow;
Thou dost but lift thy sunny eye
To read in thy unclouded sky
The promise of a morrow
As bright as ever welcomed one
Whom fortune e'er hath smiled upon.

Thou com'st a vision to our sight,
Of all that's beautiful and bright—
Thy peerless beauty lending
A charm unto the slightest glance;
The least play of that countenance,
Where grace and sweetness blending,
Softens the meaning proud and high
Of that fair brow and soul-lit eye.

Well may those noble features seem
Some sculptor's bright embodied dream;
Although that cheek is glowing
With the first bloom of boyish grace,
A lofty spirit can we trace,
Its energy bestowing
Even now upon each faultless line
Of that expressive face of thine.

The lip of firm resolve, the high
And richly shaded brow, the eye
So full of noble daring—
Do not these speak a heart and mind
When generous feeling is enshrined,
And each high virtue sharing?
Have not thy matchless features caught
Their light from pure and lofty thought?

Youth's sweet unconsciousness is thine,
Not yet thy heart is made a shrine
For vain and wayward feeling;
Thou dost not know that thou art one
Whom all will love to look upon,
But soon the full revealing
Of all thou art and yet may be
Will burst like sudden light on thee.

Go forth—and may thy path be bright,
And all of earth's least sullied light
Be shed for ever round thee;
And oh! may every trial still,
Whether it be of good or ill,
Leave thee as it hath found thee:
So live that on thy vanished years
Memory may never look with tears.

A DESCRIPTIVE TALE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER II.

It was an elegant mansion, and stood on a gentle eminence, round which the river swept in a graceful curve, sending up the music of its tuneful waters in sweet concert with the ever-whispering elms. The door-yard was a wilderness of beauties. Here the white rose grew beside its damask sister, while the hollyhock and sweet-briar bent over them in their vigil of loveliness. Edgings of violet and moss-pink bordered the graveled walk, and neat rows of geraniums, with their breath of Araby, stood in the checkered moonlight on the white doorstep. The honeysuckle, too, living emblem of woman's weakness and clinging love, was therein its profusion of charms. Here a branch had wedded a neighbouring lilac; there, another embraced the lightning-rod, while a third stole up the green window-blinds, and threw its flowering trellis over the opening between. The scenery around and at a distance was equally charming. Meadows and pasture-fields, neat cottages with their surrounding orchards, and gentle hills mantled with yellow harvest, lay full in view. A wide lane, skirted by thrifty nurslings of sugar-maple, stretched off to the neighbouring road; while a narrow footway wound down the slope in the rear of the building to the stream, whose channel was spanned by a rude bridge of loose timbers leaning on the shoulders of two or three low rocks, and so frail that it shook beneath the light tread of the house-dog. From the opposite bank the path crept over a narrow alluvial flat, thick set with birch and hazel, and then bent its zigzag course around the end of a high mountain that runs parallel with the river. In a line with this ridge, and some few hundred yards to the south, rises another mountain of about the same height. In the rear of this opening, or rather ravine, and through the deep and converging sweep of its opposite sides, rock-ribbed and shaggy, with their dark mantle of hemlock and fir, peers up the gigantic Greylock into the very clouds. Its dark form, scarred by the alpine tempests, exhibits broad yellowish channels, which the mountain torrents have been delving for centuries. Down these they have swept, year after year, huge rocks and masses of earth, with their uprooted cedars, into the wild pent-up gulf below.

Such is a faint outline of the scenery in the vicinity of Mrs. Mansell's dwelling. Is there any wonder, then, that her child was artless and blithesome, and "wild" withal; for her days had been passed among those bright flowers, and by that glad river; and she had breathed full many a time the fresh air of those hoar mountains, and listened to the harsh music of that hidden glen? Nor is it strange that she loved moonlight rambles, for she had a thousand times watched that fair orb, as it stole up from behind those shadowy peaks, throwing a robe of beauty over the still valley, and inviting the spirit to come forth among the forms of sleeping innocence, and enjoy the calm of contemplation awakened by their influence. And besides, she knew where the zephyr dallied oftentimes with the night-flowers; where the harebell opened its velvet bosom to the dew-drop; and where the whippoorwill was wont to rest, while he continued his evening song.

The maiden had now forgotten the subjects of her moonlight musings in the deep sleep which succeeded her late excitement. She may have dreamed, but doubtless no "fearful phantom" than that of her youthful preserver, visited her slumbers. He too had thrown himself upon his couch, but no oblivious influence subdued the restive wakefulness of his spirit; and what was sleep to him, while conception bodied forth the living image of that joyous one, in all the characteristic beauty and power of its first perception? The airy form, the blue eye, the arch smile, and the sweet voice of gratitude, were all present to his mind; and he would not have exchanged that ideal portraiture for the brightest vision of paradise that ever gladdened the slumbers of the Mussulman.

From that time forward George Barnard appeared a different man. He seemed like one who had acquired another sense, higher and better than "a' the rest," and who was absorbed in the emotions awakened by new and delightful perceptions. A new spirit had in fact been breathed into him, and there was an expression of joyousness in his countenance, a buoyancy in his movements, which formed a striking contrast with the sedate step and abstracted air that had recently characterised the cloistered student. Bezout and Biot were banished from his table, and condemned to the oblivion of the upper shelf; while Scott, and Byron, and even Anacreon Moore, usurped their places, and entered largely into his lucubrations. He no longer fled that society which gives to enjoyment its best zest, and which is skilful to smooth down the numerous asperities of scholastic habits.

Senior vacation commenced soon after, but George did not return home to make the preparatory arrangements for commencement. He had resolved, he said, to spend those few weeks in the study of botany, as he was under no necessity of "leaving." He was now absent whole days from college, during which he almost invariably called in at Mrs. Mansell's. Sometimes that lady and her daughter would ramble forth into the adjoining fields with him, and sometimes Ellen accompanied him in his mountain excursions in search of alpine flowers; for she delighted to look upon nature in her rudest and most romantic forms, where the owl slept in his listlessness, undisturbed by the wild jay that prattled near; and to pursue paths untrod by any human foot, save that of the lone hunter in his perilous chase. And who that has known the endearing simplicity of an innocent girl, can find it in his heart to censure the unsuspecting fearlessness of Ellen Mansell? She had seen little of the world beyond the borders of her own native valley, and therefore knew nothing of it. Those artificial proprieties which cramp the intercourse of fashionable society, planting barriers between heart and heart "that had else like kindred been mingled into one," making life the studied mockery of a pantomime, and love a star that dwells apart—had not thrown their paralyzing restraint over her buoyant spirit. Besides, it may be that that passion which never harbours a fear, ruled in her bosom, for hers was a heart most susceptible of love; and he to whose arm she trusted in her thoughtless rambles was one to awaken it, if a graceful exterior, a courteous deportment, and an accomplished mind, are fitted to captivate the young affections of an imaginative girl. The forms of nature, too, amidst which she had been nurtured, had given a character of wildness and loftiness to her feelings that ill could brook the check of those heartless formalities, which, however salutary and imposing in the city, degrade the simplicity of country manners. Therefore it was that Ellen walked fearlessly forth, with a light step and lighter heart, to mountain or glen, at mid-day or twilight, with the contemplative student.

I know one who in his earlier years passed the brightest and most sinless hour of his existence with such a being. The sky was serene above, while the moon and stars looked holly down upon them as they stood alone, as if to hallow the whispering of waters, and the music of stirring branches, and the pensive note of the night-bird, and the glance of sunny eyes, and the quick joyous beatings of young hearts, and the melody of soft words, which passed so low and silvery on the air, that echo, with her many tongues, could not repeat them, though heard in her wildest retreat and at her favourite hour. The moonbeam still visits the scene of that meeting—the brook murmurs by it, and the note of bird and branch is awakened above, but now only one melancholy voice is heard, and one poor solitary being seen there at night—for she who once accompanied him sleeps chilly beneath. Yet sleep sweetly on, beautiful one! thy life was a star-lapse of innocence, and the recording angel hath no dark memorial of its brief transition!

During ~~one~~ these rambles a day or two preceding commencement, the lovers stopped to rest at a little spring that gushed out from the base of a tall granite cliff, which stood like a tower amidst the dwarf trees that nodded around it. Ellen sat on a fragment that time had quarried from the mass above, playfully sipping from a yellow hare-bell, which she had just filled from the sparkling fountain. George stood near her, his hat thrown carelessly on the bank, and his eye fixed in a thoughtful gaze on the vale below. There was a cast of sadness in his countenance, which escaped not the observation of his companion.

"George," said she with an arch smile, "do you ever write poetry?"

"Why do you ask?" he replied.

"Because you look so abstractedly. Now I will be your muse, and this shall be Castalia; and here is a goblet fit for a true poet," continued she, reaching the flower to him filled with the crystal water.

"Never," returned he, "had poet a fairer muse or a sweeter vale in which to string his lyre; but alas! poor prosier, I am unworthy of the former, and to the latter I must soon bid farewell."

"But you will visit us soon again?"

"And why should I? I am known to few here except my youthful companions, and a few short years will hurry them forth into the wide world. The voices of strangers in yonder halls will soon chase away the last echo of our parting adieu, and who will think of me then?"

"Come, come, you shall not be forgotten if you will not be so melancholy."

"And is Miss Mansell?"

"Miss Mansell?" interrupted the laughing girl.

"Is Ellen then," he continued anxiously, "sure of this?"

"Most certain," she returned; "how can I forget a benefactor?"

A momentary silence ensued. At length, seating himself beside her, and taking her delicate hand in his, he continued, "I may not longer dally with hope, though disappointment should overwhelm me." He paused. Ellen appeared agitated. "And do you promise?" said he.

"George," returned the sweet girl, recovering from her confusion, and looking up in his face, "my conduct may seem to need palliation, but let that pass to the charity of friend ship; I promise that the heart of the mountain girl will ever hold in affectionate remembrance the preserver of her life, and the companion of her happiest hours."

"My happiness is confirmed for ever," exclaimed the enraptured youth, and for the first time he ventured to print a kiss on her burning cheek.

The sun was now setting, and a few level beams shot through the thick forests on the opposite mountain-peak and across the quiet valley. The fox had stolen from his secret den, and his shrill bark echoed along the woods, hushing the chatter of the squirrel, and startling the partridge from her dreamy recess amidst the tangled laurels. The crows came winging their clamorous flight from the far meadows to their upland perch. The bat crept from his lichen cranny and sprang away whirling and careering in the still air, while the catiff owl hooted the evening star, which now glanced in through the thick foliage that overhung the mountain spring, and warned the lovers to retire. They arose, and turning away into the winding path soon reached Mrs. Mansell's.

And now came commencement—that interregnum of care—when the favoured of science, whom successive years have thrown to the four winds, return to pay their grateful homage once more in her peaceful temple—to welcome a new band of kindred adventurers to their brotherhood of soul, and to rekindle at the altar of youthful friendship the light of memory, which the rude breath and conflicting passions of the world are ever tending to extinguish. The father of Barnard was there, for he had spent the "autumn of his teens" in those quiet halls, to which his son was now to bid adieu. The day passed off with its full quantum of intellectual festivities, and before the next sunset the voice of George was heard in his own dear home. Here he remained till the following spring; but in the mean time his health had materially declined. His former severe habits of application had evidently impaired his constitution, and his father now requested him to visit more southern latitudes.

"My means are ample," said his parent; "go to the West Indies, my son, and if you receive no benefit from that climate, turn to Italy, France, or any country you please."

The proposal was readily accepted, for the idea of rambling amid the hallowed scenes of Italy was peculiarly pleasing to the classic imagination of the youthful student. The necessary preparations were soon made, and after a hasty visit at Mrs. Mansell's he set forth on his long journey.

Ellen received letters from him every few weeks, conveying the pleasing assurance of his improving health and unaltered attachment. She too remained unchanged—the same being of artless and confiding loveliness, living her life of innocence amidst those beautiful scenes, and framing visions of future happiness which the sober certainty of time perhaps never realized. Love seemed to be a deep principle of her nature, which ruled not the heart alone, but the imagination also. It was not like the momentary glance of the fire-fly, which yields a dim and uncertain light, but like the sunbeam that shines on, giving life, and beauty, and strength to the object which it invests.

George had now been absent more than a year, and his last communication, dated Paris, conveyed the intelligence that after spending a few weeks in England, he should set out for home.

Autumn had commenced, and his arrival was daily expected. It was during a bright afternoon in the latter part of September that Ellen had gone out to a little arbour near the river to arrange the seats and remove the few sere leaves that had fallen from the overhanging foliage. The old house-dog lay by the entrance carefully eyeing his young mistress, and occasionally snapping at a rude fly that had the audacity to perch on his mustachios.

"Carlo, Carlo," said a well-known voice, and the affectionate animal sprang up to receive the caress of the old widow, who came winding down the walk near the bower.

"Come in, madam," said Ellen, kindly; "come in and find a seat in my summer parlour."

"I am something tired, Miss Ellen," she replied, sitting down and placing a small basket which she carried on the green turf before her. "I could find no work to-day in the village, and so I went to the west mountains for chestnuts. It's a long way for such a poor old body as I, and as the frosts haven't quite undid the burs, I almost had my labour for my pains. But you must have some of what I have."

"Thank you," returned the latter, taking two or three from the offered handful which had drawn largely on the contents of the little basket. "But here is something which you just dropped," she continued, picking up a small parcel which had fallen on the ground, and returning it to the dame.

"It's a newspaper they gave me over to the village, and as I left my spectacles to home, I've brought it along with me to read of a spare hour."

"With your permission," said Ellen; "I will look at it a moment."

"Oh yes, for sartin—as long as you please."

She opened the sheet and glanced unconcernedly along the motley page. At length she grew pale—her lip quivered—a tear shot into her eye—her limbs tottered, and she sunk upon a heap of leaves, which she had collected near the middle of the alcove. The old nurse shrieked as she sprung from her seat to the side of the apparently lifeless girl. She bent down and laid her furrowed cheek to the white lips of the maiden, but no warm breath was perceptible. "She is dead," cried the affectionate creature, and the big tears gushed down like a shower. "No, no," she ejaculated, dropping the delicate wrist from her bony hand; "life is yet here"—and flinging from her the rude mantle which enveloped her tall and muscular figure, she raised that still form to her bosom, seemingly with as much ease as if it had been an infant's. At that instant a gentleman sprang lightly from his jaded horse, and before he had time to fasten him, the cry of distress brought him to the spot. In a moment the stranger's arms encircled the motionless form of the maiden.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE ANGEL OF TIME.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

THE angel of time being instructed by the Supreme Governor of the world, made proclamation that he had a hundred thousand years of additional life to bestow on the inhabitants of the earth. His trumpet echoed far and wide, penetrating the cities, the valleys, the mountains, and reaching the uttermost extremes of the universe. The people flocked eagerly from all points of the compass, to prefer their claims to a portion of the beneficent gift; but it was surprising to see that the crowd consisted of the aged alone. The children were enjoying their youthful sports, and paid no attention to the proclamation; the youths and maidens were wandering in the labyrinths of love; and the men and women of a middle age were too much engaged in the pursuits of life to think on death.

The first who preferred his petition for a few additional years, was an old man of four-score and upwards, bent almost double with age.

"Thou doubtless wishest to live a little longer for the sake of thy children, and the companions of thy youth?" said the angel.

"Alas!" cried the old man, "they are all dead."

"Thou art in possession of wealth and honours?"

"Alas, no! I have lost my good name, and am miserably poor. Yet I wish to live till I am an hundred, and enjoy life yet a little longer."

The angel bestowed upon him the privilege of living an hundred years, and he went on his way rejoicing and trembling.

The next applicant for lengthened years, was a feeble old man who was carried in a litter. When he had preferred his request, the angel replied:

"I understand. Thou art enamoured of the charms of women, of the beauties of the earth, the waters, and the skies, and wishest to behold them yet a few years more?"

"I am blind these ten years," said the old man.

"Thou art delighted with the music of the birds, the murmuring of the waters, the echoes of the mountains, and all the harmonies of the universe, and wishest to hear them a little longer?"

"I am deaf, and scarcely hear the sound of thy trumpet."

"Thou art fond of the delicacies of food?"

"Alas! my feeble health will not permit of such indulgences. I have lived on milk and crusts of bread these seven years past, and more. I am a miserable sickly old man."

"And still thou wishest to lengthen out thy miseries. What pleasure dost thou enjoy in this life?"

"The pleasure of living," said the old man; and the angel granted him a few years more.

The third who approached the footstool of the angel was a decrepid female, almost bent to the earth, and trembling with a palsy. Her teeth were gone—her eyes buried deep in their dark blue sockets—her cheek hollow and fleshless—and she could hardly prefer her request, for an incessant cough, which drowned her voice, and almost choked her.

"I am come," said she, "to beg a score of years, that I may enjoy the pleasure of seeing the cypress trees I have planted over the graves of my husband, my children, my grand-children, and the rest of my dear relatives, spring up and flourish before I die. I am bereft of all that were near and dear to me; I stand alone in the world, with no one to speak for me; I beseech thee, Oh! beneficent angel, to grant my request!"

"Though I grant thee lengthened days, I cannot remove thy infirmities and sufferings. They will increase upon thee," answered the angel.

"I care not, since I shall know they cannot kill me before my time."

"Take thy wish," said the angel, smiling; "go and be happy."

"Strange!" cried a learned man who had come to petition for a few years to complete an explanation of the apocalypse, and had witnessed the scene. "Strange," cried he, curling his lip in scorn, "that the most helpless and miserable of human beings should still covet a life divested of all its enjoyments!"

"Silence, fool!" replied the angel in a voice of ineffable contempt; "it rather becomes thee, ignorant mortal, to adore the goodness of Providence, which having ordained that men should live to be old, mercifully decreed at the same time that the love of life should supply the absence of all its sources of enjoyment. Go! take thy wish, and finish thy commentary on the apocalypse."

MATRIMONY.

The number of respectable young men who are daily falling victims to matrimony, is really alarming. There used to be a fine aristocracy of generous, careless, free spirits, always ripe for any pleasant mischief. Societies were formed for the promotion of good-fellowship, for the discussion of knotty questions and oyster suppers. We had pedestrian excursions in the summer, to fish, shoot, ride, swim, and seek pleasure in her wildest and most delightful haunts. Now, these merry associations are all broken up. Look for our choicest and rarest fellows; the drollest, the freest, the most daring and reckless, and you shall find them men of families, established in business. They have stores and offices; they have degenerated into brokers, doctors, merchants, auctioneers, and lawyers. They are getting economical. You shall hear them gravely talk of "my eldest boy," and "my little girl," till you can scarcely credit that these are the untrammelled companions of your earlier and happier days.

It is interesting to look around upon the crowd of our youthful playmates, and trace them in their various and often deeply contrasted paths, from the green meadow and the shaded pond where we sported together, up to their present stations in society. To count over the "Bills" and the "Bobs," the "Toms" and the "Harrys" of old times; to remember the clear, uncovered foreheads—the smooth voices, which leaped with the stirring of every boyish feeling—the frank hand—the happy heart; and then to mark how they have all been borne along by their unshunnable destinies; some to an early grave; some to wealth and fame; others to poverty, dark misfortune, blasting guilt. All as they advanced losing some precious gift of youth, and discovering in greater or less degrees the impress in mind and body which time is for ever stamping upon the children of life. And then to see how inevitably they slip into the matrimonial noose; and with what quiet submission, with what resignation and Christian fortitude they allow themselves to be harnessed up in the various appendages of married men. As for me, I hold it a dangerous thing for a man of warm feelings to marry, unless independent of the world. It may do for those who are distinguished rather by strong common sense than feeling; and the latter is much more frequently met with than the former; but for a youth, unblest with wealth, and at all inclined to the romantic, to fall into the flowery trap, is almost certain disappointment. Yet, notwithstanding common sense and sage maxims, is there a man who has not in certain moments, under peculiar circumstances, experienced a desperate temptation to take the plunge "come what come may?" I have also observed, that the very persons whose susceptible feelings most easily betray them into sudden and warm attachments, are often the last to marry, or perhaps die bachelors, while your plain, quiet young men, who attend to business, and who would not step across the street to gaze on the loveliest face under heaven, are the very ones most likely to disappoint general expectation by silently choosing some soft-voiced companion, whose endearing attentions can fill up and decorate all the little vacancies of life.

I cannot bear to see a dashing young fellow at length fairly caught. Much as the poets talk about the union of hearts, and so forth, there is still something serious in the sight of a man voluntarily pledging all the affections of his future life to one individual. It puts me in mind of going into a convent. The feelings which he has been in the habit of cherishing for other females, the very pleasantest of which his nature is capable, are hereafter to be eschewed. He has entered into a species of bondage, which, in all probability, will be for the term of his life. He is to yield in a great degree the right of indulging his own tastes, and of following his own inclinations; and yet how often this dilemma is run into in the most careless manner! Every one does not sufficiently appreciate the value of perfect independence until it is gone for ever; others, like Othello, seem crossed by a vague presentiment that they are rather getting into a scrape, and excuse themselves to their friends on the score of love:

"For know, Iago,
But that I love the gentle Desdemona,
I would not my unhoused free condition
Put into circumscription and confine,
For the sea's worth."

If the thoughts and affections, the little local attachments, and sudden temporary relations which are continually arising in society and then passing away, could be made palpable to sight, what a curious prospect would be presented! How many innumerable passions between the young, the warm-hearted, and the handsome of the two sexes, would continually appear like beautiful bubbles, and break like them. Notwithstanding the watchful anxiety of shrewd mothers, argus-eyed fathers, of matronly old maiden-aunts, and particular friends, who make it their business to keep a look-out over such things, it is wonderful how slyly these lovers can carry on their correspondence with each other; how they make a language of all the events around them; how they speak to each other out of the mouths of the good people in whose society they happen to be. It would be another curious subject of investigation to find what an incredibly small proportion of the large quantity of billing and cooing that is carried on in the world ever comes to any thing. It is perchance very difficult for the youthful portion of my readers to realize; but the more advanced understand well enough the excellent precepts of Polonius to Ophelia:

"I do know
When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul
Lends the tongue vows; these blazes, daughter,
Giving more light than heat, extinct in both,
Even in their promise as it is a making,
You must not take for fire. From this time,
Be somewhat scanter of your maiden presence;
Set your entreatments at a higher rate,
Than a command to parley."

WEST POINT.

Since Colonel Thayer became the superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, his taste and genius have been every where visible in the embellishment of this magnificent spot. The roads to the lower landing on the river, from the height above—which is one hundred and seventy-four feet from the surface of the water—are highly improved. The grounds around the professors' houses are levelled, and an avenue of a double row of ornamental trees is so disposed as to form a beautiful and refreshing shade. A very spacious and convenient house (excellently well-conducted by Mr. Bispham) has lately been erected, with one of its aspects embracing the enchanting view of Polyple's Island and Newburgh, seen as the majestic Hudson winds through the highlands, with the eye resting on a richly cultivated country beyond, and in the distance, on a clear day, disclosing here and there the blue summits of the Catskill mountains. On the river may be seen ships or other square-rigged vessels, sloops and steamboats, the evidences of an active and extended internal commerce. This large house, independent of its captivating site, is most judiciously planned for the comfort and convenience of the numerous visitors who are attracted to the place. Within view from the piazza may be distinguished three monuments, erected to perpetuate merit, and all constructed of native white marble. Towards the west, at no great distance, is one erected by the late Major General Brown to the memory of Colonel Wood, a pupil of West Point, who fell at the sortie of Fort Erie. On the east, occupying classic ground, not far from the house, is a monument to the memory of Koeciasko, that gallant Polander who devoted his youth in the revolutionary war to the service of this nation, and on the very spot where his garden, dilapidated by time, but not forgotten, was cultivated for his amusement. This well-designed monument, chaste and expressive of correct feeling, was raised by the cadets in 1828. Towards the north-west is another, at a considerable distance, shaded on almost every side by a thick wood: it was erected to the memory of a cadet who was killed by accident in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. Gimbrede, the professor of drawing at the West Point

Academy, is a Frenchman of practical science, and being acquainted with the culture of the grape, has, in his experiments, arrived at many important results. Reflecting on the variety and difference of climate between the same parallels of latitude in Europe and this country, which is not less than ten degrees, he perceived at once the errors which had heretofore misled horticulturists on this subject. The latitude of West Point, where Mr. Gimbrede has established his nursery of native grapes, is not far from 41° 30' north. This parallel, extended to Europe, would reach to a climate almost as dissimilar from West Point as the temperature of the tropics is from Georgia or South Carolina. Mr. Gimbrede conceived the idea, that in order to be successful in the cultivation of the grape, native stocks alone should be selected. His successful practice on this idea deserves the highest commendation, and proves that it is founded in nature and the analogy of things. This gentleman has cultivated the native grape procured within a range of two miles from his residence, and has now more than one thousand plants growing in perfect luxuriance, and has already, from the seed of these and others, propagated at least twenty different kinds. This we conceive is the great desideratum. Instead of importing the roots of the grape from climates entirely dissimilar to our own, with which none of the features of vegetation agree, we should profit by the plan of Mr. Gimbrede and cultivate the native stock, capable of enduring the rigour of our winters, on which the best fruits of the world can be engrafted. Some gentlemen being more learned than experienced, will have it that the juice of the American grape is not calculated to make wine; that its acetous fermentation is not like that of the foreign grape; that it is deficient in saccharine matter; and, on the whole, though a grape in appearance, not a grape in character. This opinion is founded, we presume, in ignorance and false philosophy, and in prejudices which must yield to further experience. Mr. Gimbrede offered us a sample of wine made from his nursery—the flavour was exquisite, and we can readily believe would compare with the best produced in any country in the world. M.

BULWER THE NOVELIST.

Edward Lytton Bulwer, the novel-writer, resides at an ancient seat of his family, in Norfolk, called Heydon Hall. He is an only son, and his mother, who is a widow and a lady of fashion, dwells in London, where Bulwer himself has lived during the greater part of his life.

In England his name is pronounced as if it were spelled Buller. The curacy of Saul, near Norwich, and two or three other small livings, are in the gift of the family. There are three brothers of his father still living—General Bulwer, Doctor Bulwer, and the third is a curate, who has two sons that are clergymen. Two of his cousins are also clergymen. This circumstance has given rise to a report that the author himself was attached to the church, and is a minister of the gospel. Bulwer is about thirty-five years old. In his last work he has been charged with the vanity of endeavouring to underrate his age. His appearance, however, is youthful, and the strict attention he pays to dress, gives him the look of quite a young man. He has rather a thin and thoughtful-looking visage. His features are somewhat sharp and shrewd, and he is much addicted to satire in his conversation. He is fond of the chase, and is an object of much attraction in the neighbourhood where he resides. He was married several years ago in Liverpool to a daughter of General Gascoigne, and he has now four or five children. S.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

FRENCH OPERA.

THE manager of the French troupe has taken possession of the Park theatre for a few nights; and commenced on Monday to a very good house, with Boieldieu's chef d'œuvre, "La Dame Blanche." The advertisement announced that several persons had been added to the corps dramatique, and that a newly imported singer from the Feydeau theatre, Paris, and a basse-taille were about to make a debut. As regards the latter gentleman, he was stated to be from the Conservatoire, and a pupil of Garcia and Pellegrini. We are not apt to place much dependence on a boast of superior tuition, especially in a theatrical affiche, because we know that no master can give either voice or ability, although he may cultivate them; and that out of a thousand pupils a score of decent professors will hardly spring up, and we also know that masters seldom permit very promising pupils to wander far from home. Before we proceed to criticise the performance it may not be amiss to say a word or two of Boieldieu and his works. This great master has been very properly termed the Mozart of the French school: ask a Frenchman as to his merits, and he will assuredly reply that Boieldieu is the first composer of the age; but as this is the age of Rossini and Weber, we are not quite prepared to acquiesce in such an assertion, although no one can refuse to Boieldieu his just right of being considered one of the first of existing musicians, and for originality perhaps the first. Among the peculiar beauties for which Boieldieu is distinguished, is the extraordinary and marked character which his music bears, and its identity with the subject of his drama. Examine "Le Calife de Bagdad," and the music will at once decide the piece to be oriental. In his "Nouveau Seigneur du Village," he has hit the style of the old Provençal melodies. In his "Jean de Paris," the bold and gay bearing of the gallant young prince claims one strain of martial melody, to be found in almost every piece in the opera. The music of the princess insists upon a plumed and robed dame of birth and breeding to execute it; and the romance sang at table recalls the days of knight and troubadour, and again you are transported to the classic regions of Provence.

In "La Dame Blanche" Boieldieu has maintained a Scotch character, and actually introduced two Scotch melodies. Monsieur Scribe, one of the most popular dramatic writers, has manufactured this drama, (on the strength of the great popularity of Sir Walter Scott's works in France,) from the novel called the Monastery, or the White Lady of Avenel, with which, however, it has nothing in common but a lady in white. With the monstrous incongruities of the plot, the introduction of Prince Charles Edward the pretender, to the throne of England, although he does not figure as one of the dramatic persons, we have nothing to do: touching such a trifling anachronism, Mr. Scribe knows best, or probably would say he did; we have only to notice the piece as an opera, and our warmest commendation must follow.

The overture, containing the well known Scotch air the "white cockade," we have heard better executed on former occasions; indeed, in this piece, the band did not play particularly well together, the trumpet was rough and the trombone coarse; the violins, however, were generally speaking admirable, and the rest of the band in keeping with them. Mons. Letellier, the new singer from the Feydeau, is a very tolerable actor, with a better person than his predecessor, Alexandre; but we cannot go much further; he looked and gesticulated his music with great unction, but his little penny-trumpet of a voice made no way among the splendid and full accompaniments of the orchestra. He sings with the regular French méthode, indulging in the use of the falsetto, and concluding all his cadences with three semitones—Jenny, (for on such names as Jenny and George Brown, the French pique themselves when the plot of their piece embraces the natives of Great Britain) was entrusted to Madame Berdoulet, of whom, suffice it to say, that she is engaged to play the "rôle de Du-gazon," which she may act very well, but her voice is thin, wiry, and hardly audible; and in this character she was decidedly less capable than her predecessor, Madame Alexandre. The prima donna did not appear; but Madame Milon supplied her place very tolerably, omitting the grand morceau de bravure. The basse-taille, Monsieur Curto, made his debut on any stage in the character of Gaveston. His voice is mellow and good, but shows no great traces of superior cultivation; his acting, of course, we ought not to criticise, and we hasten to add, that acquired confidence may place his singing in a more favourable point of view.

On the whole, the French corps in opera, without any individual and intrinsic talent, presents an ensemble of a very pleasing description; every member of the company is compelled to appear in the chorus, and no petty pride seems to interfere with their strenuous exertions. The chorus is very effective, without being very correct; indeed, they regard the author but little in this department, and generally sing the melody in utter neglect of the harmony—but they make a great noise and are greeted with the same in return by the audience. To those who heard the division of voices in Garcia's company the meaning of this will be plain—the chorus there was much more correct, although not so powerful, but to musical ears more grateful. We would recommend the gentlemen who form Mr. Simpson's chorus at the Park theatre, to take an example in one respect from the French comedians; instead of standing like so many ill-looking statues, shuffling into the rear and trying which can do least, if they were to feel a little of the "esprit du corps" of their Gallic brethren, and try to acquire some of their vivacity, their superior knowledge of music would cause them to be much better appreciated. With this piece of advice we come to a conclusion. E.

THE EXILE.

BY ISIDORA.

Yes, ye are fair, ye sunny skies,
Fresh fields, and rivers broad and deep;
Mountains that, piled in mid-air, rise
Sublimely proud—yet must I weep.

And ye are fair, ye fertile vales,
With shelter'd cot and splendid dome;
But ah! ye tell me mournful tales,
I think but of my own lost home.

My own loved land has skies less fair,
And nature with less bounteous hand,
Perchance has spread her beauties there,
But 'tis my own—my native land.

I cannot smile—the starting tear
Still answers to the tone of mirth;
Though kindly smiles salute me here,
I sit beside a stranger's hearth.

The cup that's offered with a smile
Is often dash'd with bitter tears;
Why swells my bursting heart the while?
A stranger's hand the draught prepares.

Though kind the tone and sweet the look
Of her who decks the stranger's board,
That smile, that tone I cannot brook—
They open memory's madd'ning hoard.

In mine own land are eyes whose beam
In fondness dwell on me alone;
Less bright perchance those glances seem,
But oh! they were my all—my own!

The prattlers, who at evening hour
Are clustering round the stranger's hearth,
Remind me of a distant bower—
I cannot brook their cruel mirth.

Yet there is one, whose blue eyes shine
So like those eyes of starry ray;
Whose flaxen curls I fain would twine—
But my heart swells—I turn away.

And one who runs with noisy joy
To bid me share his wanton glee—
How often would I clasp the boy
Who climbs so fearless to my knee!

I cannot—in my own loved land
A rosy boy, with sunny brow
Would run to catch my clasping hand—
My wife, my babes, where are ye now?

Yes, stranger land, your skies are fair,
And lavish nature blesses thee,
And bright and mild your daughters are,
But what, alas! are these to me?

A clouded sun, a sterile soil,
A lowly roof, and scanty store,
Won only by unceasing toil,
In mine own land delight me more.

For kindred hearts and kindred hands,
And kindred wishes, hopes, and fears,
Were there to form the sacred bands
Which native soil and home endears.

My footsteps press a foreign soil,
None greets me save a stranger's hand,
No kindred smile rewards my toil—
My native land—my native land!

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY,

To the Editor of the Mirror.

Brandywine Springs, (Del.) August, 1830.

DEAR M.—The substitution of epistolary conversation for personal is so common in this age of wonderful improvements, that garrulity itself can be indulged on paper, and find a prompt response. Having much of "the parlance in my travel's history" to unfold, and no particular thing to prevent the revelation, I have placed myself in my airy and beautiful room, in the hotel which is, from all the country round, observed as the temple of those chalybeate waters, I design on the instant to "prate of my whereabouts." I have just returned from a hunting excursion in the neighbourhood of this romantic spot: before me sits a flask of claret, which was my companion, and whose contents are partly passed away, after the deglutition of the dinner board had been completed, and I had become friendly to vinous liquids by exercise. The view from the hotel here is of a character entirely rural. To the south, west, and north, as well as to the south-east, the eye rests on swelling uplands, dotted with farm-houses, and interspersed with fields, "white with summer and glowing with beauty." The domestic itself is crowded with the élite of Philadelphia and Baltimore; and seldom have I witnessed a more brilliant assemblage than may be found promenading beneath the tall white pillars of the portico just after supper and sunset. The view of the clouds at that hour—for there are always a few to brighten up like crowns of glory in the occident—is superb. As I saw the radiant array of ladies, in the bloom of their being, moving gracefully along the ar- a at that particular period, apparently engaged in some deep and engrossing conference with their beaux, I thought that the young gentlemen never would find a more opportune moment for a declaration. There was one pair of amants to whose happiness I was not an unwelcome spectator, being a friend of both, and being one to whom, in case of a lover's quarrel between them, they would apply for aid in producing an éclaircissement. The fair one is emphatically such a being as should be loved. As I participated in the pleasant topics which they introduced, I was delighted to see the fondness and assiduity which she evinced in seeking to know his opinion before she expressed her own—the sweetness of her acquiescence, or the gentleness of her dissent. Permit me to say that she is one of those angels that take upon themselves the form of quakeresses, and she lives in the city of brotherly love. It may be said of her as of another in Telemaque: "Cette femme était belle comme une déesse; elle joignait aux charmes du corps tous ceux de l'esprit;" and her lover knows it right well. Such pleasant passages in life are worth a record, for they occur too seldom.

There are two things, yea three, at Brandywine Springs, worth a journey hither from any city in the Union: the sunset, the moonlight evening, and the country round about. I speak not of the exclusive charms belonging to the polished society, the living waters of the springs, or the excellence of the condiments prepared by the inimitable Page—the presiding genius at the tables—the magician, by whose "potent art" the arrangements of the feast are introduced. Let these speak for themselves to the traveller, who must feel when leaving them as though he were departing from Eden, before whose portal the igneus gladius forbade his return. In the woods on the north-east a place is found for any who feel disposed to play the venator; though one poor fellow whom I witnessed exercised his functions in that line to too great an extent for comfort; his gun had burst in his hand, and rendered his face so inexcusably dun and powder-sprinkled, that he was forced incontinently to "take the veil," which descended in green folds from his white beaver. He was yeelp'd, for the sake of distinction, the prophet of Korassan; but unlike that oriental personage, appeared to enjoy in no small degree the favour of the ladies.

The scenery on the Pennsylvania shore of the Delaware to Wilmington six miles easterly from hence, is decidedly of an agreeable character. The borough of Wilmington is rich in suburban scenery; the distant Delaware, with its sails, the intervening meadows, with their clumps of heavy and verdant trees; and the hills around, covered with clover, or golden with the harvest, and crossed at right angles by soft dark hedge-rows, in the English fashion, all conspire to render the town attractive. It is the residence of Mr. M'Lane, our minister to the court of St. James. I attended a "meeting" at the town-hall, where he took his farewell dinner, to hear a Maryland negro preach on the floor where a famous female reformer lately edified the canaille. After having gone through the first division of his subject, he commenced the "second section" in words following—"I reckon, as my hearers will say, 'seem' I have did pretty right smart onst or twyst on the first part, they will be glad for to hear the second and last. Truth is truth, I reckon; and I suspect you'll love to hear it, if I am as black as the acc of spades. And why? says you; cause folks does like to hear truth of they cant go for to speak it." I am unable to supply all the beautiful balances of his antitheses, or his reverence for the king's English. The music of the "first set of cotillions" is in my ear, and I must say, with Dorothy Ramsbotham—"Adoo, chair Morris!" Yours sincerely,

EVERARD.

MADAME DE STAEL AND TALMA.

The following is a version of a spirited but very untranslatable letter from Madame de Staël to Talma, on his performance of Hamlet, lately published in the "Courrier des Etats-Unis."—Correspondent N. Y. Mirror.

Thursday morning.

Don't fear that I shall act like Madame Milord, and place a crown on your head at the moment of the deepest pathos; but as I can compare you to nothing but yourself, I must say, that yesterday, Talma, you surpassed even yourself. We see in that piece, faulty as it is, the wrecks, as it were, of a higher order of tragedy than ours; and your talent seemed to me like the genius of Shakespeare, but without his inequalities and vulgarity, to rise at once to the summit of earthly grandeur. That depth of natural feeling—those questionings as to our common destiny, in presence of that crowd of dying mortals which seemed to listen to your voice as to the oracle of fate—that appearance of the spectre, more terrible in your looks than under the most hideous form;* that profound melancholy, that voice, those looks which reveal a character and sentiments far beyond the proportions of humanity—admirable! thrice admirable! And my friendship for you has no part in this emotion, the most profound the efforts of the arts ever caused me. I admire you in those parts in which you are still our equal; but in that character of Hamlet, with such enthusiasm do you inspire me that I no longer recognise you or myself; I see only a poetry of look, of tone, of gesture, to which no author ever attained. Adieu. Excuse me for writing when I expect you at one o'clock this afternoon and at eight this evening. Were it not that all must yield to the inexorable decencies of life, I don't know but I would have been proud to have come forward myself yesterday to offer you that crown which is due to such a talent as yours above all others, for you are not an actor, but a man who, presenting us new views of human nature, exalts it in our eyes. Adieu till now.

P. S. Do not send me an answer, but love me for my admiration of you.

THE FINE ARTS.

THE MERMAID SONG OF WEBER.

THE song which will be found on our last page is worthy of the deepest attention of musicians, and will claim admiration from both the learned and the ignorant, provided they are gifted with the usual and natural faculty of appreciating sweet sounds, or, to use the common phrase, if they have an ear for music. The poetry of Mr. Planché is exquisite, and is as beautiful a description of the joys of mermaidism as can be well conceived; but if he has handled his fanciful subject in a masterly manner, Weber has far exceeded him; and if the poetry of music ever existed, it reigns triumphant in this glorious composition. The melody is remarkable for a plaintive and flowing sweetness; and the minor mood is introduced occasionally with great effect, but with brevity seldom exceeding the duration of a bar. Weber has entrusted to the voice the charge of conducting the melody throughout, and to the accompaniment he has given a second subject, which is in itself a melody, supported by the most variable and fitful modulation possible, which commands the astonishment of the professor.

It is not however to the professor that we so immediately direct our remarks, although we are equally prepared, either to acknowledge ourselves flattered by his acquiescence in their justice, or to pick up his gauntlet if he should differ with us, and "girding up ourself, go down to battle with him;" but it is to the amateur who delights a private circle by the exertion of a talent which is admitted to be one of the most delightful ornaments of refined society, and in behalf of an art which requires not the aid of our feeble pen, that our remarks are now addressed to the public; and if we succeed in interesting one of the fast increasing numbers who cultivate music as the most pleasing and agreeable of accomplishments, we are amply repaid. Such persons then, we invite to examine this melody—to observe the air of repose which pervades the accompaniments in support of the sentiment conveyed in the poetry, an accompaniment which strikingly gives an idea of the tiny and sleepy ripple of a tranquil and moonlit sea upon the pebbles of a shingly beach—an assent to the truth of our observations will follow, and then it merely remains for us to say, that if this song be beautiful as viewed on the desk of a pianoforte, its effect is doubly enhanced by the addition of the orchestral accompaniments written by Weber, and over which the mellow tones of the horn cast an almost magical influence. The scene chosen in the drama is a beautiful marine view with rocks of spar and coral; the singer, a mermaid; her auditors, Oberon, Puck, and the inhabitants of fairyland.

At the Park theatre, this song was sung by Miss Pearson, with much sweetness. It requires little more than good intonation, good quality of voice, and a strict adherence to the text. Miss Pearson was not wanting in any of these particulars; Weber has supplied all the rest, and the band did him justice.

B.

* Our readers are doubtless aware that the critical etiquette of the French stage never allows the spirits of the unbodied dead to tread its boards. Hamlet, throughout the play, can see his father's ghost only "in his mind's eye." A great stretch certainly on the imagination of the audience; but Talma's genius gave terrible reality to the illusion.

A SERENADE FOR WARM WEATHER.

AIR—"The Young May Moon."

THE dog-star now is raging, love,
The heat no air assuaging, love;
Then seek the shade,
Or the cooling glade,
Where the gnats are not so engaging, love.
Come! don thy calash and away, my dear,
While yet the young morning is gray, my dear;
For nought so composes
The cheek to its roses,
As a walk ere the sun sheds a ray, my dear.
No mortal sleeps this morning, love,
Nor lady dreams of adorning, love,
While young mosquitoes,
Determined to eat us,
Keep buzzing around their awning, love.
Then steal at once from the window, my dear,
Ere the scorching heat shall hinder, my dear.
For when the sun rises,
His beams will surprise us,
And burn us quite into a cinder, my dear. C.—.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

INDIAN SUPERSTITION.

Among the more innocent superstitions of the Indians, of which there are as many as among my countrymen in the Emerald Isle, I shall relate the following, as I happened to be personally concerned in it. A fine Indian youth, of shining copper-colour, with hair of jet flowing down his shoulders, called at the great gate of the house at which I lodged, and requested "for the love of Maria Santissima!" to be permitted to pass into my room, for he had a subject of infinite importance (suma importancia) to communicate. He passed on, and entering my room, threw himself on his knees in an attitude of supplication, from which I with difficulty raised him, saying, that that was the posture for addressing heaven, but not me. He replied, that "I could now be of more use to him than heaven; and implored, with tears in his eyes, that I might assent to his prayer."

I was all amazement, and after forcing the man to rise from his kneeling posture, he said, "He was a servant of the Condesa, who had turned him out of her house in consequence of a silver dish having been stolen last night, and his fellow-servants having accused him of being the thief. He knew," he said, "that I was in possession of an armadillo, which had discovered to me on a former occasion the thief who had stolen my silver plates. He now threw himself again on his knees, and prayed that I would consult the armadillo as to the facts, and thereby relieve him from a charge, of which I should soon know that he was altogether innocent." Being aware of the strange superstitions of the Indians respecting these little animals, and having heard several curious stories concerning them, this application was not altogether a surprise to me. I, however, assured the Indian that I did not possess an armadillo, but only the shell of one, which I produced, in the hope of satisfying him on that point; but I was mistaken, for he insisted that "it was well known I had one alive, and that by means of it I had detected the thief who stole the pick-axe, as also several other evil deeds in Potosi, and that I was in the habit of conversing with it every night at twelve o'clock." My assurance that I possessed no armadillo, and the declaration of my belief that if I did I could gain no information from it, seemed only to distress the Indian, without producing any conviction of the unreasonableness of his request, which he felt persuaded I refused because it was not accompanied with a fee. He pleaded poverty, but vowed his services in any way that I should think fit to command, if I would but consult my infallible oracle, which it was in vain to deny that I possessed, for "my nocturnal conversations with the armadillo were notorious through the whole neighbourhood." The earnestness of the Indian so plainly bespoke his honesty, that I was induced to intercede with the good old lady Condesa, and had him restored to favour. He was afterwards proved to be innocent. SUPERSTITIONS OF THE HINDOO FARMERS.

I walked out this afternoon at three o'clock, which is usually as hot as any hour in the day, and did not return till near seven, when it began to grow dark. I made a circuit of about ten miles without once thinking of heat. At this season of the year I take so much pleasure in these rambles that I find it difficult to confine myself to my tent. They are not so solitary as I could wish, for I often fall in with story-tellers, who keep me company all the way. The farmers of this country are, I believe, the most talkative race on the face of the earth. A party of them met me this evening with a complaint against some unknown conjurer who had set fire to their village twice in the course of the year. I told them I had a great antipathy to all conjurers, and would give them satisfaction on their producing him. They said they had concerted a plan for discovering him, but that it could not be executed without my assistance. I was to take my station at a little distance from the village with a spying-glass in my hand; all the inhabitants were to pass in review before, when I could not fail, by means of the virtues of the glass, to discover the felon who had done so much mischief. I answered that it was an excellent thought, but that the trial must be deferred till I should get a new glass, as my old one was broken; and as we should then certainly catch the conjurer, I asked what punishment it would be proper to inflict upon him. They said, no other than drawing two of his teeth, with which he would lose all his magic powers. I replied, that this could not be done till he was taken, but that, in the mean time, there was another remedy equally simple at hand to defend themselves from him in future: any person who had any suspicion of his having evil designs upon himself had only to get two of his own teeth drawn, which would secure both himself and his property against all the art of the enemy. I said I had some years ago parted with two of my own teeth, and offered, if they would accompany me back, to get them all made magic-proof at the same cheap rate. They asked leave to go home and consult about my proposal, and promised to give me their answer in the morning, but I suspect that I shall hear no more of the matter. Among the natives of this country the belief in all kinds of witchcraft, goblins, and elf shooting is universal among all ranks. They frequently take the conjurer by surprise and draw his teeth themselves without applying to justice. The cattle of the farmers seldom die a natural death. If any accident happen in any of their families when they begin to plough a field, if a snake run across the path, or if they see a land-crab they abandon it, and say that it is in possession of the devil: it lies waste for several years, and if then some bold fellow ventures to break it up and loses neither his life nor his bullocks, it is supposed the devil has, for the present, relinquished his claim. I once had a complaint from a man of a conjuror's having killed his wife and mother, and about twenty cows and bullocks. I thought, at first, that some of the characters in the Arabian Nights had again started up, but, on further inquiry, I found that he had taken fourteen years to effect all this; and I thought it possible that within this period time alone, without any foreign aid, might have dispatched a couple of women and a few cattle.

Life of Sir Thomas Munro.

TERMS OF MARRIAGE.

Sir Thomas Munro, on being pressed by his sister to take unto himself a wife, gave the following as his ultimatum on the subject:—"You see," said he, "how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking home instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet: as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it on certain conditions. If she is not, or even if I fancy she is not, so charming as Clelia or Rosamond, I am to be at liberty to look for one that is. I am to eat and sleep whenever I please, without any questions being asked. No private orders are to be given to the barber or tailor about the decorations of my person. I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors; neither the superintendence of the kettle nor tea-cups is to be considered as a part of my duty. I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for caps or frocks for any lady. I am not to go out to tea or supper, unless I choose. I am not to be ordered on any duties of danger, such as escorting young ladies home in a windy, or old ladies in a frosty night. I am to have liberty of conscience, and to attend church as often as I think proper. And, lastly, when I am tired of home, I may return to India alone. N. B.—Should any doubt hereafter arise about the meaning of these clauses, my interpretation is to be received as infallible; and should I explain the same article different ways at different times, I am not to give any reason for so doing. These are my terms, from none of which I can recede." Bid.

HOW TO GET UP A REVOLUTION.

In a country where, in every class of life, there are but few occupations, there must of necessity be many idlers, and idlers are generally the most discontented of mankind. These meet at corners of streets, in pulperias, and in coffee-houses, to pass the time in smoking cigars. One of the party accidentally mentions that "Don Palano has got an appointment under government of fifty dollars a month." "How came he to get it?" says another. "I have more right to it than he," says a third. "Let us have a revolution," says a fourth. "Corriente!—with all my heart!" is the unanimous exclamation of the party. Fresh cigars are immediately lighted, and before they are smoked out, the "revolution" is planned. Guns, swords, and pistols are talked of, and some few are probably obtained; but, being more for the presumed object of protection to themselves than of injury to others, arms are not of paramount importance. If the "revolutionists" understand that their plot has been discovered, they abscond in all haste to distant towns and villages, where they reside in quiet till their scheme has been forgotten, which generally happens in the course of a few weeks. If they have not been able to effect their escape, and are made prisoners, ten to one but they are thrown into gaol, where they probably remain also a few weeks, and are again let loose, one of them in the mean time being selected to be shot in the great square, pour encourager les autres. But, if they prove successful, which sometimes happens, they turn out of office the existing authorities, and install themselves and friends. The first act of the new government is always to repeal some measure of their predecessors which had not met with public approbation; this, with a proclamation of pardon and oblivion of all past political offences, obtains popularity; a ball is given at the cabildo, and every thing goes on smoothly for a whole moon, perhaps; when another cigar-party assembles, and acts, with little alteration, the same farce over again. But what, it may be asked, are the military doing all this time? Smoking their cigars! Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the South American choppings and changes of government have been thus effected; some few, and only a few, have been more serious and more destructive of life and property; but then they are much more likely than the former to tend ultimately to permanent security and peace. Temple's Travels in Peru.

THE POLISH JEWS.

As none of them are engaged in agriculture, they are but rarely to be met with in the villages; and being thus assembled in the towns and cities, which are but few, they seem in most of them to form a very large majority of their population. The men have, for the most part, much finer countenances than the other Poles; their forms are better, as well as their attitudes and paces, [action?] and the long, flowing, black dresses which they commonly wear, form altogether a striking contrast with the appearance of their slouching, loitering, idle neighbours. Their eastern countenances and complexions, and the waving beards of many, especially of those advanced to middle age, presented a new and striking feature. They seemed to be always in motion, and yet doing nothing; and it was natural to inquire how such numbers of them could procure the means of subsistence, especially as their wives and daughters seemed to be decorated with jewels or ornaments much more expensive than were to be seen among the inhabitants of the same class in the neighbouring provinces of the Prussian domains which had just been passed through. It appeared extraordinary in a country where the laws prohibited them from possessing land—where their own indisposition to a rural life prevented them from renting and cultivating that of others—that they should not address themselves to some manufacturing or handicraft pursuits; but such the editor had reason to believe was the case; and all of them subsist by being the retail distributors of the labour of their neighbours, in some way or other. They have in their hands all the intermediate operations of the commerce of the country to such an extent, that every one who wants either to buy or sell any commodity, performs the operation, however minute, through the instrumentality of his Jew. A lady of the highest rank in Poland affirmed, that if she wanted to purchase household linen, clothes, or furniture, she was obliged to employ her own Jew, or she was sure to be cheated. This kind of trafficking habit, though it leads to great wealth with some few individuals of the nation, leaves a great part in the most miserable state of poverty, a state which can only be encountered by the extreme of frugality, approaching to a kind of half starvation; whilst the rags which cover their persons are hid from the eye of the observer by the long dresses of black stuff, which composes their principal but cheap garment. Munro.

SOCIETY OF POTOSI.

There is not, probably, in the world a town of such extent, and possessing so many inhabitants as Potosi, where there is so little society, and where there are no means of amusement, beyond the resources that persons may possess within themselves. Society is confined, literally, to two or three families of two or three persons, to whose houses we sometimes go for half an hour in an evening to sip mate through a tube, to hear a guitar ginged, or to sit on a bench against a wall, wrapped to the chin in our cloaks, replying "Si, Señor," to every body's tale concerning the severity of the cold winds from the south. The ladies, squatting on a rug upon the floor, huddled in a corner, and covered up in their woollen mantles, occasionally press us to take another mate, but complete the scene of ennui by their total want of occupation, than which nothing can be more unsightly and repugnant to those who have been accustomed to female society in England; where, from the nursery to the age of spectacles, the needle is actively plied, even until its eye has become undistinguishable to the eyes of the person who employs it, and who may frequently be seen fencing at it in vain with the sharpest-pointed thread, until a grandchild or some accommodating friend, when all hopes of success have failed, kindly undertakes to hit the mark, and thus furnishes the means of pursuing this habitual pastime, infinitely preferred by English ladies to that state which has already been described as a délicieux repos. Temple's Travels in Peru.

HORSEMANSHIP OF THE PERUVIAN LADIES.

The ladies of Tarija are celebrated for their horsemanship, and frequently distinguish themselves at public races, which are here a very favourite amusement among all classes; and on these occasions, difficult as it may appear, the jockeys, male or female, ride bare-backed. The usual seat of the ladies is the same as that of the English; but their saddles have no crutch, nor support of any kind, being precisely of the make of a man's common saddle in England, only much smaller, and over it is thrown a pellon, (a worsted saddle-cloth of fancy colours) on which they sit with ease and confidence. Sometimes females may be seen sitting en croupe behind the horseman, and once or twice I observed them get into that seat by means which prove at least the gentleness of the animal. A knot was tied in the horse's tail, into which the lady introduced her foot; then, giving one hand to the horseman, she was assisted into her place on the animal's back. Ibid.

WIRT'S ORATION.

A lady of New-Brunswick, in a letter to the editor of the National Intelligencer, speaks in the following terms of the address delivered by Mr. Wirt, before the Literary Societies of Rutgers College. Those who have enjoyed the pleasure of hearing this distinguished orator, on any occasion, will not deem the description extravagant.

"I have not language to express the effect produced on my mind by Mr. Wirt's oration. The manner, style, sentiments, eloquence, were all so peculiar—so different from any thing I had ever heard before, that I hardly know how to describe my feelings. You know his appearance, and how well it is calculated to call forth admiration and conciliate regard. Before he uttered a word I was prepossessed in his favour; and when he spoke, his first sentence won the heart. There was something so delicate, so veiled, in the modesty of his apology—such an appearance of truth, yet so much refinement—that like the dew of mist to the landscape, his talents became more admirable by the shade he threw over them.

"I cannot attempt an analysis of the address. It will doubtless be published; you will then judge of the excellent sense, the sound maxims of life, drawn, as he said, from his own experience; the beauty of his classic allusions, the variety of his topics, the lucidness of his arguments. But the graces of his manner, the rich and mellow intonations of his voice, not even your imagination can supply. It was the highest burst of eloquence I ever enjoyed.

"Notwithstanding the heat and the crowd, I listened nearly two hours with unwearied and unabated interest, only dreading, at every pause, that he was coming too soon to a close—that the charm of his eloquence was to be dissolved. His last sentence completed the captivation commenced by the first; and when he ceased to speak, there was a silence of many seconds throughout the whole audience, as if they were spell-bound. Such an effect I never witnessed before; similar to the feeling produced by fine music, when the suspended sense seems to linger on the departed sounds.

"What a magic is there in eloquence! How I wish he was in the pulpit, and these noble talents were consecrated to the noblest cause. But it is possible, nay probable, that his wise admonitions may come with more power to the hearts of the audience, than they would from a preacher or a professor. To hear a man of the world, who knew what the world could give, pronounce it wholly insufficient to fill the heart, and recommending religion as the only solid good, must carry conviction to the youthful mind."

CRITICAL NOTICES.

It is not easy to exhaust the interest of a novel of the Pelham family, and we therefore admit the following article. To pay the writer no more than a just compliment, his manner of treating the subject has novelty to recommend it. We do not, however, feel bound to subscribe to all the opinions it contains.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

PAUL CLIFFORD.

A novel is in more respects than one like a picture. A picture, to please that many-headed monster, the public, must be brilliant, warm, and joyous—so must a novel. Sprightliness, glibness, a certain undefinable faculty of reeling off the narrative and dialogue, scarcely suffering the reader to take breath—the power of heaping object upon object, and group upon group—the art of setting trifles in a prominent light—all these are indispensable in a novel. To be sure, the practice is in this respect different. Some painters slight all the parts of a picture but the foreground and the principal figure. And in novels, some authors reserve themselves entirely for the catastrophe, or great crisis—walking over the course in the preceding stages. It would appear to be almost impossible to unite the immensely distant departments of scene and enamel painting. And yet it is in the approximation towards the accomplishment of this apparent impossibility that Bulwer has acquired so much popularity—carelessness is no where discernible; even in the first volume there is an activity and a creative power evinced in incident and dialogue which forcibly impel the attention, while the figures are all rounding into distinctness, taking up their stations and moving forward towards the dénouement. It is pleasant to remark how necessary an ingredient to the hero of a novel is the obscurity of his birth. And this seems to be, with the exception of Smollet and a few others, the general practice since the appearance of Fielding's Tom Jones. If to this can be brought in aid, a shipwreck, or a fire at sea—a battle or two, a gorgeous court entertainment, a masquerade, (rather passé this,) a perilous adventure for the heroine, and from which the hero extricates her, in plain terms, saves her life, a tournament, an attempt to murder, or all of them—it is not for the reader to inquire how they came there. Consider with what a burden upon your shoulders you set out. You have to conduct your cléee through the mazes of boyhood and youth, and bring him up to the great zenith of his novel existence, that is, within a few pages of the conclusion; and how many pages have you to cover with English words before this can be done? That there is a secret in doing this, none can doubt; and that there are many very well-disposed, clever persons who are desirous of figuring as novel-writers, is a truism too awful to question. It so happens that we have had access, by a most fortunate concurrence of circumstances, to the porte-feuille of one of the greatest novel-writers of the day, who was also an amateur painter in the early part of his career; and the examination of his almost illegible notes induced us to make the sapient and admirable parallel which stands at the head of this article, between painting and novel-writing—but which we have the magnanimity to acknowledge we have borrowed. Amongst these curious memoranda is the following, which we copy verbatim:

"When a great picture is demanded, to colour after nature would indicate too tame and lack-a-daisical a spirit. Throw over your skies the warmth of a red-hot poker, and sober them down with a little roll of brimstone, the effect you will soon perceive will be capital. Draw your figures all of the herculean proportions, so that if the crowns of the hats of your men are brought on a level with the roofs of the houses, and the horses' heads range with the windows in the steeples, so much the better, because a groveling genius would never think of such a flight, and you will be pronounced to possess talents of the first order." Here he drops the painter, and falling into the common tongue, continues, "Then about dates; what a ridiculous figure a novel writer would cut in defending himself against the charge of anachronism; you are at full liberty to introduce the costume of the Normans into the age of Elizabeth; and again, you may carry back the full-bottomed periwig, no collar, and ruffles of Queen Anne, to the days of Henry IV. Recollect, also, that perfection of body and mind is demanded for your hero or heroine. As to the strength of the muscles of the former, that must be proportioned to what he has to do—when did you know any hero faint under any task imposed upon him by his author? Never; he knows better." After these quaint, and as some of our readers may suppose, very singular remarks, we stumbled upon a few observations, headed "The Formula of an Author's Training for writing Tragedy." Four hours' sleep—rub body on rising with thick, coarse towel—dumb bells half an hour—compose—breakfast—raw eggs, toasted bread, strong coffee—two cups—read some anatomical work and the Newgate Calendar for an hour—think hard, if you can—bring all the dramatis personæ in review—if any charcoal by you draw them on the wall—rehearse every line as you proceed to acquire euphony—have roomy chamber and practise the starts of your hero in order to be able to give directions to the players—dumb bells hour before dinner—dinner—beef-steaks underdone—no vegetables no watery fluids—raw brandy—with and after—strong coffee for dessert—music in afternoon—visit evening—compose from nine till midnight." Now all this to an unthinking reader might appear very ridiculous; but when it is known that by adhering exactly to this formula of training, some have arrived at such a felicitous state of the imagination, as that on shutting the eyes only, anthropophagi, or men with their heads under the arm, griffins, dragons, sphinxes, mermaids, and all manner of "airy and fantastic shapes," have been spontaneously painted on the retina, and thence immediately sent to the brain: the result appears to be certainly worth the pains-taking.

Raw meat is said to have been the material of the novels of the Monk Lewis and Radcliffe schools; and it is more than insinuated that Mr. Maturin derived some of his most terrific thoughts and images from black puddings, eaten while the blood was warm, with which they were composed!! And Mr. Fuseli, it is credibly related, while about his famous drawings illustrative of Milton, fed upon strong beef tea. On the other hand, we have authentic intelligence that several gentlemen now composing comedies and farces are giving extensive orders to the French confectioners in Broadway for bon bons, puffs, (a species of pastry, gentle reader,) macaroni, and imperial pop. But reenons à nos moutons—which, as all our readers are not learned in the dead languages, we translate—"It is high time for us to return to Paul Clifford." As has been very judiciously observed by a writer in the Albion, the hint for the general design is taken from Gay's Beggar's Opera; but afterwards, in the first volume particularly, the expert novelist makes every thing his own by the great fertility and transparency of the scenes, and the close familiarity he discovers with low life; and every one who has tried his hand at novel writing cannot but discern the great proportion of dialogue in the novel. Dialogue we find in one of our friend's notes aforesaid quoted, is to novel writing what foreshortening is to drawing. Among the defects of the novel may be noted the allegorical sense which is constantly confusing the reader; this defect throws moreover a discrepancy over names, and interrupts the smooth flowing course of the piece—exemplar:

"Excellent," cried Gentleman George, lighting his pipe, and winking at Attie. "I hears as how you be a famous fellow with the lasses."

Some of these personal portraits are also confused, because though the allegorical sense may be in the mind of the writer, they are not necessarily in that of the reader, especially if he be a foreigner. Such objections cannot hold against the following:

"As they proceeded Paul questioned his friend touching the name and character of mine host, and the all-knowing Augustus Tomlinson answered him, quaker-like, by a question:

"Have you never heard of Gentleman George?"

"What! the noted head of a flash public-house in the country? To be sure I have, often; my poor nurse, Dame Lobkins, used to say he was the best spoken man in the trade!"

"Ay, so he is still. In his youth George was a very handsome fellow, but a little too fond of his lass and his bottle to please his father, a very staid old gentleman, who walked about on a Sunday with a bobwig and a gold-headed cane, and was a much better farmer on week-days than he was head of a public-house. George used to be a remarkably smart dressed fellow, and so he is to this day. He has a great deal of wit, is a very good whist-player, has a capital cellar, and is so fond of seeing his friends drunk that he bought some time ago a large pewter measure, in which six men can stand upright—(the wine-cooler.) He is a nice, kind-hearted man in many things. Pray heaven we shall have no cause to miss him when he departs," &c. &c.

Now in all this we must confess we see nothing, nor in the general portraiture of "lelle Paul," to alarm either the English government or the chiefs of civilized society. The intelligent editor of the National Gazette might, we consider, upon the same, or as good grounds, object to the fascinations which Milton "hath" so skilfully thrown round the person of Satan. The worthy editor seems to apprehend that the novel of Paul Clifford is powerful enough to loosen the fabric of social order. As this latter stands, perhaps, without imbibing the reasonings of Paul Clifford, (and we impute them not personally to Bulwer as his creed,) it might be proper to call the present state of things disorder organized; but it would puzzle any reader to pronounce whether the discords or the chords were in the majority.

It does not admit of doubt enough even for a question that a highwayman might conduct his depredations in such a style as to cause regret for his fate, and excite active interposition to prevent it when he came to be hanged; and there can be as little doubt that some "decent" men are continually committing within the pale of the law depredations, for which in equity they deserve hanging, and for which many would gladly see them hung.

And this, if we understand right, is the amount of Mr. Bulwer's conception of Paul Clifford. But Lucy Brandon—we beg her pardon for this tardy notice—she is indeed woman such as the poets describe her, single-eyed in her love; nor unworthiness nor crime can quench the never-dying flame—only neglect. Mr. Bulwer at any rate is orthodox here, nor can any one deny but that she is a regular-built heroine after the Moore, Byron, and Scott school; in other words, Lucy Brandon when she once loves, loves madly and for ever. The spirited portrait of Judge Brandon, and the whimsical parenthetical likeness of the old squire, yield considerable indemnity for the rather per contrast insipid characters of the gang, as Long Ned, Old Bags, &c. McGrawler has our best commendation, by way of national justice. But it is a melancholy reflection that poor Bulwer is one of the ephemera who now, it is true, sports his gossamer wings in the sun's rays, and skims through the summer air with all the gaiety of the insect tribe, although the time is fast hastening when he too must be laid upon the shelf, and like Mrs. Hemans, (who is just now dipping, as the sailors call it,) and almost all the fashionable writers of the day "leave but a" book "behind;" which may (as Swift, and Irving after him, have so finely shadowed out) from its dusty abode pour forth a torrent of reproaches upon the fickleness of public taste, the unworthiness of successors, the horrors of a gone-by fame, and a literary existence, similar to that of the swallow in caves, or the toad enclosed for centuries within his block of marble, forgetting or ungrateful for the popularity enjoyed in previous stages of existence.

SAFETY PUMP.

A PUMP of this description has lately been invented by the Rev. J. F. Schroeder, for detecting and removing the noxious gas found in wells.

Having particularly examined into the advantages that may result from this improved pump, it being given to the world without an application for a patent, or any reward whatever, by its scientific, ingenious, and humane inventor—we cheerfully recommend it to the notice of our citizens. It may be used for ventilating sick rooms, churches, theatres, and crowded assemblies, by constantly pouring into them a current of fresh air, and expelling at the same time that which is impure, and rendered unhealthy and offensive by being breathed through the lungs of the audience. The Rev. Mr. Schroeder has prepared a communication, on the subject of this invention, to be submitted to the New-York Literary and Philosophical Society.

A new well in the rear of Union church, at the north-east corner of Orange and Spring streets, in this city, was infected with a most deadly gas. On Friday, July sixteenth, a man, attempting to descend into it, was instantaneously deprived of life; and a few moments afterwards, another shared the same miserable fate, in an attempt to rescue his unfortunate companion. On the following Tuesday morning, the Rev. Mr. Schroeder, in company with some friends, visited the melancholy scene of the calamity. They found the well, by actual measurement, to be thirty-one feet deep. On lowering a lighted candle into it, the flame, when it was six feet from the surface of the earth, was suddenly extinguished. Impure air, it was inferred, occupied the remaining space of twenty-five feet below.

The safety pump was placed on a bench near the mouth of the well; a conduit, attached to the inhaling pipe, extended to the bottom of the well; and another conduit, ten feet long, attached to the exhaling pipe, extended to an adjoining vacant lot of ground.

The pump was then worked. Some of the vitiated air was obtained in a glass receiver, placed at the end of the exhaling pipe; and by the application of the usual chemical tests, this vitiated air was proved to be carbonic acid gas, or what is commonly termed choke damp.

The safety pump had been in operation for the space of seven minutes, when a lighted candle was again let down; and the flame was not extinguished until it had descended nearly ten feet further than before. The safety pump was then worked again for ten minutes; and the candle, being then let down to the very bottom of the well, burned with a clear flame. In seventeen minutes all the deadly gas had been entirely expelled.

This experiment was made before a company of gentlemen, one of whom, Dr. Stephen B. Whiting, after the above operation of the safety pump, went to the bottom of the well, and remained there for a time, without any injury or inconvenience.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Correspondents.—In addition to the list of distinguished contributors to the Mirror, which we published some time since, we have the satisfaction to state that several other writers, some of them enjoying the highest rank in the literature of the day, have communicated to us their intention of occasionally furnishing us with articles. These unsolicited favours, conferred in the kindest manner, derive no small additional zest from the fact that they came accompanied with the gratifying assurance of approbation of the course hitherto pursued by this paper, and of the most friendly wishes for its continued success. The sanction and support of such authority animate its editor with renewed zeal, and give promise of increased interest and value to the character of his miscellany. Among those from whose efficient aid we hope to derive equal instruction and delight, the writer of a sketch on another page, will ever stand conspicuous. It will be seen that the "Angel of Time" is from the pen of the author of "John Bull," the "Chronicles of the City of Gotham," and many other deservedly popular productions.

Walter Bowne and pure water.—We had believed that his honour the present mayor of this city was about identifying himself with one of its most necessary and beneficial improvements. Every distinguished civilian endeavours to illustrate his official career by some signal act which shall confer utility on the community, and hand his own name down to posterity as that of a public benefactor. Such we believed to have been the laudable ambition of Mr. Bowne when, on his inauguration into the office of mayor, he pointed out the indispensable necessity of procuring pure water for our population. We considered his honour pledged to this great object, and mortified are we that he has not redeemed his pledge. We have shown that this evil has existed, and been loudly complained of in New-York for near a century. What more proud or gratifying evidence could Mr. Bowne give of the usefulness and efficiency of his administration than by its removal? We call upon him now, and we shall do so again and again, to make good his promises—to give the people wholesome water.

Female wages.—It is with deep concern we learn that our indefatigable and philanthropic friend, Matthew Carey, is about abandoning his laudable efforts in behalf of female labourers as utterly hopeless. In a private letter, with the perusal of which we have been favoured, he observes: "My patience is exhausted, and I must give up the subject of trying to procure relief for the suffering seamstresses. I have formed this resolution with deep regret and with deeper indignation and disgust at the apathy and indifference I have found on such an important subject, particularly among the ladies, who ought to have made exertions in the cause. If they had, it would have been crowned with success. It is a vile world—and man is a sordid, miserable, selfish animal." Who can read this honest expression of mortified humanity without a blush? What female can brook this merited reproach without feeling her cheek mantle with shame over the unpitied and unrelieved woes of hundreds and thousands of her own sex, doomed by the chill hand of penury, and the more cutting decree of sordid avarice, to toil and waste their energies for a most scanty and hard drawn pittance which scarcely yields bread and raiment for themselves, much less for their families? We did indulge the anticipation that the untiring exertions of Mr. Carey to make the facts connected with the lamentable condition of a most interesting and numerous portion of the female community generally known, would have stirred up a share of that public sympathy and active zeal which have been so freely and readily poured forth in behalf of philanthropic objects possessing far less immediate claims to regard. If his benevolent and enlightened enterprise has failed of success, he enjoys, nevertheless, the delightful consolation of having done his best for the public good—a time must and will arrive when his object will be accomplished.

N. B. A number of Mr. Carey's essays on the public charities of Philadelphia are still to be had, gratuitously, at the office of this paper, if applied for immediately.

Going out of town.—The life of an editor is labour without cessation. Every one is starting off into the country, but we must stay at home and cater for the tastes of our readers. It was about half after four in the afternoon. A carriage was at the door; trunks were strapped together behind; handboxes before. The old gentleman, the old lady, the children, and the pretty eldest daughter, shared the interior with those numerous knick-knacks invariably borne about by travelling families, and which, trifling as they appear, add so many items to the great sum of human comfort. "Steamboat starts at five," said the coachman as he folded up the steps and closed the carriage door. "Make haste, driver," exclaimed the lady, "or we shall be too late." Her voice was succeeded by one of those decisive cracks of the whip with which these earthly Phœbusses intimate their desires to the horses. The patient animals took the hint, and with a faint effort at a prance, which immediately sunk into a jog-trot, dragged onward in the sun—and so our friends started for the country.

There is a feverish desire in the mind of one long pent up in a city to escape from its narrow prospects and its continual crowd, and to be abroad in the still woods and the wide spreading meadows. His long estrangement from these attaches to them an importance even higher than reality; for

"It so falls out
That what we have we prize not to the worth,
Whiles we enjoy it; but being lacked and lost,
Why then we rack the value; then we find
The virtue that possession would not show us
Whiles it was ours."

As we inhaled the air warmed by heat reflected from the pavement and brick-walls, and then vainly quickened our pace to avoid a cloud of dust raised by the passage of a thundering cart, a thought of the quiet and refreshing loneliness of the country, its cool transparent streams, the paths winding in among the mingling branches, and the beautiful green forest-light which reigns in the woods—these images

"did sweetly creep
Into our study of imagination;
And every lovely feature of the scene
Did come appa'led in more precious habit,
More moving, delicate, and full of life,
Into the eye and prospect of our soul,
Than if they lived indeed."

With such feelings we bid good by to our fair friends who are flying off east, west, as fancy calls, all in search of pleasure, while we are doomed to remain hunting up subjects for paragraphs, correcting, rejecting—thermometer at ninety—stunned with the noise of carts, and languid with tedious application. Well, the next thing to being happy one's self is to see one's friends so. Some prefer it. Therefore, happiness to all our indulgent readers who have gone off gaily through the romantic windings of the Hudson, the picturesque beauties of Trenton Falls, the stupendous magnificence of Niagara, the fashions of the Springs, or the quiet and loneliness of Lake George—health and pleasure go with them. May they come back refreshed with the contemplation of nature, and be prepared to enter upon the duties of the vague future with rational hopes lighted by pleasing recollections.

Dyspeptic's Monitor.—An interesting treatise on that most annoying and frequently incurable malady, dyspepsia, has just issued from the press. The author is Samuel W. Avery, M.D., of this city, who will, in our opinion, reap no ordinary share of praise for this contribution to the stock of popular knowledge. We shall hereafter notice his little work in detail.

The Atlantic Souvenir for 1831.—We have, even thus early, been permitted to see a specimen of this forth-coming annual from the press of the Messrs. Carey & Lea. The typography and plates possess the same rich splendour of appearance which has hitherto beautified this work, and made it so deserved a favourite with the patrons of the fine arts. The engravings are an exquisite portrait of the "Marchioness of Carmarthen," grand-daughter of the venerable Charles Carroll; the "Shipwrecked Family," (an old subject by the way) and the "Fisherman's Return," a beautiful print.

Patent for stopping carriages.—Mr. Enoch Walker, of Pennsylvania, has applied for a patent for a mode of stopping carriages, suddenly and safely, when descending steep hills, or checking their descent when too rapid.

Steam-packet opposition.—So great is the opposition between the steam-packets plying from London to Calais, that the fare has been reduced from ten shillings to half-a-crown.

SECOND VERSE.

O 'tis pleasant to flout on the sea,
When nothing stirs on its breast but we:
The warder leans at twilight hour,
Over the wall of his time-worn tower;
And signs himself, and mutters a prayer,
Then listens again to the witching air.

THE VALLEY OF THE GREYLOCK.

A DESCRIPTIVE TALE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER III.

AT the conclusion of the last chapter we left our heroine in the arms of the stranger. The name of this gentleman was Mortimer, a brief sketch of whose former life and character will be now necessary to a clear understanding of the story. He had been Barnard's class-mate. An incident long passed away had made him his enemy. It was a trifle, which Barnard himself had forgotten. He had rescued a fine young boy at school from his threatened resentment, and in the course of the affair the usually pensive student had discovered some unexpected flashes of anger and character. Bold words passed between them—and angry looks: some plain truths were spoken, and the pride of the bully had been wounded, and his revenge baffled. From the mind of Barnard the shadows passed away as lightly as summer clouds float from the face of heaven. But there is a kind of man who notes down in the secret pages of his bosom the offences of the world—who reads them over in solitude, and hatches out and cherishes dark feelings of malice and hopes of vengeance—covering up these serpent thoughts under the flowers of gentle words and actions. Such a creature was Mortimer;

"A fellow by the hand of nature mark'd, Quoted, and signed, to do a deed of shame."

He had beheld with all the tenderness of which his nature was capable the budding charms of Ellen, for the ruggedest hearts are sometimes softened by love. He had even suffered his mind to forget Barnard, and the influence of his opening attachment had revealed in his gloomy bosom the sources of some brighter and higher feelings than those which usually possessed it. Perchance if he had won her affections, and been united to her in prosperous circumstances, the tendrils of happier hopes and wishes, which had already sprang up in him, might have wound themselves around his heart, as forest vines cling to a ruin and cover the barren fragments with their green and living beauty. But fate ordained it differently. He had acknowledged to himself that she was a creature of loveliness, well calculated to render him happy, and had resolved to effect an union at all hazards, when the accident, related in a former chapter, occurred, and he perceived his old enemy, favoured by fortune, snatching from his eager grasp the affections of the glowing girl, as he had already gained those of the world. It was an unlucky coincidence, and the moment which convinced him that Ellen was indifferent to him—that she loved another—and that other Barnard—was a gloomy one for both his happiness and his honour. His first experiment of virtue was thus unsuccessful; his peace, his pride were both wrecked, and his thoughts assumed a fearful character, while he beheld the very man whom he hated, and would have visited with vengeance, revelling in joys which should have been his own. He acquainted himself with the circumstances of their engagement, and engendered a plot by which their peace should be destroyed as his own had been. He had, therefore, by the most subtle insinuations and in various ways—all the while professing for his friend Barnard the most sincere attachment—infused into her mind vague apprehensions of her lover's infidelity, and reports of his attentions to the gay and wealthy beauties of the sunny regions whither he had gone—his letters had been intercepted. He had inserted in a newspaper an advertisement of Barnard's marriage with a rich and fascinating heiress, and procured the paper to be handed to the old lady when he knew she was on a visit to his intended victim. For a long time his cunning and dark surmises had filled her with melancholy presentiments, which she struggled hard but unsuccessfully to overcome. The glow of health had gradually faded from her cheeks, and her sweet lips wore less often the smile of careless pleasure. A constitution naturally delicate had in some degree already suffered from the wearing of these unhappy thoughts, so strange to her light and innocent bosom; and when she beheld at length in the newspaper which the unconscious old lady gave her, the marriage of her lover, it seemed the realization of her worst fears, and the anguish which she had long smothered up burst forth and overwhelmed her. Immediately previous to this crisis Mortimer had heard of the arrival of Barnard, and stung to the quick with anticipations of his rival's bliss, had resolved in a personal interview once more to prefer his addresses, hoping that the slighted girl would be inclined to favour them while in the warmth of indignation at the treachery of her lover. He reached her dwelling just in time to behold the effect of his plans, and to obtain many grateful acknowledgments from her afflicted family for the tenderness with which he bore her into the house, and the sympathy which he evinced for her distress.

When the maiden recovered she was as a different being. Her woman's pride was roused, and supported her through the pangs of disappointed love. The crimson tide mounted into her cheek and temples at the pressure of unpleasant thoughts which filled and came, still thronging on her mind. The crafty Mortimer was at hand, and became not only a familiar visitor at her mother's house, but an intimate companion of her own. He was so friendly in his manners—such a general spirit of benevolence breathed in all his words and actions—he spoke so well of every person, even the guilty and convicted felon—pointed out with such quiet pleasure the fine and vivid charms of nature—and had so many pleasant and instructive things to say upon all passing scenes and events, that she unconsciously became attached to his society, partly as the friend of one whom she had once loved, and partly as a kind of brother to herself, for his actions had as yet aspired to no nearer relation. These were sufficient to insure him the grateful esteem of his Ellen. For the mother he had additional attractions, for he had recently become possessed of considerable wealth, bequeathed to him, as he reported, by a distant relation. He was therefore enabled to promise many advantages to the family in case an alliance should take place, and the matter, which had been much thought of by the mother, was at length explained to her in very clear terms by the arch demon, who hoped much from her interference. As yet, however, the unconscious girl was ignorant of the nets which they were gradually winding around her, and suffered her imagination to dwell almost perpetually upon the image, the graces, the virtues of Barnard. Sometimes she drooped beneath the weight of tender recollections, and her blue eyes trembled with tears which fell upon the grass in the most secret recesses of the forest—and again, she would arouse her from what she deemed a weakness, and give vent to feelings of shame and anger at the wanton and deep slight which had been put upon her. The former moods were generally indulged in solitude, and all traces of her watery tributes to the seemingly false Barnard carefully wiped from her cheeks—the latter burst forth often when she was not all alone, as the sly and unperceived art of Mortimer touched the chords of her vanity and pride, and produced the feelings most favourable to his purpose. It was thus that he, who sought to enfold all around him in error, erred himself, in believing that her affections for his foe was at length deadened or destroyed. Alas! she had woman's pride—but she also had woman's love, which may be lightly concealed or interrupted, but not suddenly banished.

"Love may sink by slow decay,
But by sudden wrench believe not Hearts can thus be torn away."

It was a fine afternoon in autumn. A youth who, however his dress and manners bespoke the stranger, seemed by no means unacquainted with the paths which crossed each other through the forest, had left his horse at the neighbouring village, and was proceeding on foot and alone along a green and shady road which wound in among the trees, and led towards the dwelling of Ellen Mansel. The young man was handsome; but an expression of anxious doubt and apprehension fitted occasionally across his face, and as he hastened along with a quickened step, it was evident he was urged onward by an emotion of no ordinary nature. It was George Barnard. Sickness and other accidents had delayed his return—he had failed to receive the letters, which at first had come frequent and full of matter—and as he now traversed the scenes of his boyish gambols, traced the winding of the stream from whose dangerous waves he had snatched his lovely burden, passed the little bower, and drew near the mansion where she resided, his eagerness seemed suddenly checked with fear. What awful reality was he about to encounter—sickness, death, or indifference, almost more difficult to be borne than either. He paused a moment and leaned against the trunk of a rugged oak to compose his thoughts—to overcome with reason the dark presentiments which floated over his fancy, and to prepare himself for the worst that could occur. At this moment two figures passed near him, in earnest conversation. Ellen, dear Ellen, was just bursting from his lips when the sound of his own name in the voice of her companion stilled his words and arrested his steps.

"Ay, Ellen," he said, "even George Barnard. I know he was born to be the ornament of society, but some evil worldly influence has ruined his noble nature."

"Still," said Ellen, "it is—at least it was a noble nature."

"Yet," said Mortimer, "much as I have loved that man, in this he betrays a cowardly and dishonourable character. He has forgotten your feelings, your reputation—the ridicule which must attach itself to you—"

"He is indeed a villain," exclaimed Ellen.

Barnard's heart swelled in his bosom, and tears would have started into his eyes had not anger as well as curiosity absorbed them.

"He is indeed," said Mortimer. "If he scorned you, he need not have thus blazoned forth his scorn to the world."

"If he loved me not," said the girl, her cheeks mantled with crimson, and her eyes moistened with tears, "why came he not frankly to me. I should rather have pined with hunger and thirst in the loneliest dungeon than have flung any constraint over his affections. There are fairer than I in the splendid scenes where he has been bewildered; better, wiser, happier; but oh! there are none will love him half so dearly."

"As you did, Ellen," said Mortimer, "not as you do. Surely you have too much pride to still dream of him who spurns you. Ah! lovely girl," he continued, softly taking her hand in his, and lifting it slowly to his lips, "if I had been blessed with your affections—"

"Mr. Mortimer," exclaimed the astonished maiden, attempting to withdraw her hand from his grasp, and turning upon him her full deep eyes as if they read then for the first time the dark secrets of his soul, "I have been betrayed by one man—I hope I am not to be insulted by another."

"Insulted! sweet girl," he cried, "he who betrayed you was a scoundrel; but I would rather be your protector."

"Let go my hand, sir, as you are a gentleman."

"But I," continued he, "would rather protect than injure you. Not for the world would I insult you. But if I can ever meet the coward who has basely deserted you, he shall be the object of my insult and my revenge."

"You meet him now," said a calm voice, in a tone so quiet and yet so startling, that it resembled the low sound of a swift deep current.

Mortimer turned, and encountered the full flashing eyes of the man he hated. They perused him from head to foot. He seemed to cower beneath their fixed fierce gaze, as he would have recoiled from a poisonous snake. His presence of mind and natural impudence for a moment deserted him. He even forgot to release the hand of Ellen, who, motionless with amazement, suffered it to remain in his grasp.

"You will have the goodness to release the lady's hand," said Barnard, in the same subdued tone of deep passion.

But Mortimer regained his composure by the very bitterness of his returning hate.

"I shall obey you, Mr. Barnard, when you are my master; not before."

"Coward, slave, base dog!" cried George, "dare you beard me to my face, as well as slander me behind my back?"

"Take your hand from my throat," said Mortimer, "on the peril of your life."

"The lion will sooner release his trembling prey just as his claws are crimson with its gore," shouted Barnard.

The young men grappled, and a struggle of desperate hate had just commenced, when Ellen's screams attracted two persons, who separated the combatants in spite of their scowls of bitter revenge, and the half-uttered exclamations of unsated malice, which broke forth like the bubblings of some boiling stream, while George flew to the side of Ellen. One of these worthies who held Mortimer by the arm was addressed in the coarsest language by that hopeful young gentleman; but he had no sooner mentioned his name than the men exchanged significant glances, and one of them taking from his pocket a slip of paper, addressed the dissatisfied person who still muttered forth abuse, in the following terms:

"Hark ye, my friend, if dress made a gentleman you would doubtless be one. If language betrays a vulgar scoundrel, you would be a vulgar scoundrel. If I had no business but my own to attend to I might take the liberty of boxing your ears or pulling your nose, but I have at this time other fish to fry. I am a constable."

Mortimer started, and seemed much frightened, struggling to escape; but his companion was strong, and held on to him like a vice.

"You need not try to get away from my grasp, my young chicken, I am used to such chaps as you. As I was saying, I am a constable. I'm sent out, ye see, to catch a fellow who has committed a forgery to the amount of twenty thousand dollars. His name is Charles Mortimer. Your name is Charles Mortimer. I take it you are the man—so if you have no objection, or whether you have any objections or not, you must come along with me."

It was true. The villain who had violated the confidence of friendship was not too virtuous to break the laws of his country, and the property purporting to be the legacy of his relation was in fact the spoils of his guilt. A short explanation dispersed all the fears of Ellen, and re-assured the heart of Barnard. The wretched Mortimer was condemned to the meanest labour of a prison, while they who so narrowly escaped from his artful net are happy in the tranquil blessings of domestic peace. P.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THREE EVENINGS AT THE FRENCH OPERA.

On the eighteenth instant the French company performed Boieldieu's opera called Jean de Paris. In a previous number of the Mirror we took a cursory view of this and some of the leading operas of that highly talented master, and consequently our present task may be confined to the mode of its representation. The overture was played with force and precision; still, as there are some leading passages for the viola, or tenor violin, this overture can never be executed to much advantage unless there is a competent number of such instruments, and we remarked but one. The lively and beautiful opening chorus was very neatly executed. Madame Berdoulet made her second appearance as Olivier, the page. She possesses a naïveté and ease of deportment, which, with fire and tenderness equally at her command, make her truly a delightful acquisition to the company. Her singing is the desideratum; she sings flat, and her voice is powerless; yet her archness in the beautiful duo, "Rester à la gloire," made us even pardon these defects. Monsieur Letellier, who, in the language of the French stage, is the haut-contre of the troupe, acted Jean de Paris tolerably; his singing has been rightly described as being weak and by no means in good taste, but he has one recommendation, he generally sings in tune, which Alexandre did not. We watched for him in the trial song of the piece, "Tout à l'amour, tout à la gloire," of which he made nothing. Monsieur Privat, Le Martin of the troupe, dressed and acted the part of the Senechal admirably; the music he gave correctly, as far as his powers would permit him; but, unless a singer has a remarkably fine and extensive voice, the chief morceau is lost. The original Senechal was Martin, for whom the song, "C'est la princesse de Navarre," as well as the "C'est chambertin," in "Le Nouveau Seigneur," was written, and his voice was of prodigious extent and cultivation. Since the retirement of Martin, the particular line of business he played, has bestowed upon the actor of it, in all companies, the title of "Le Martin." The same remarks will apply to Madame Berdoulet: the characters in which she now appears were formerly represented by the famous Dugazon, and she is consequently "La Dugazon" of the company. Elleviou also has handed down his name to be maintained by those who act his parts; and there are several other examples which we cannot recall at present to our recollection. But to return to our subject: having premised that Monsieur Privat had a most difficult vocal task to perform, a word or two on its performance may not be amiss. We give him every credit for his management, and to Monsieur Paradol, the leader, unlimited praise for his watchfulness and tact, particularly in that song, "C'est la princesse de Navarre." It was curious to observe the anxious solicitude which he manifested for the singer. When, for instance, he observed Privat give demonstrations of being about to attack a note a little above his compass, which is perceptible to the vigilant leader by sundry signs of inquietude, such as a wrinkling of the forehead, and a projective erection of the chin, instantly seizing his violin he would give such a powerful coup d'archet on the note, that the effort was concealed, and no person could detect that "ce fauxcibus hæsiti." On the contrary, when his sagacity prompted him to discover that Privat was about to search the depths of his person, his very penetralia, for a low note, demonstrated, as such efforts generally are, by a portentous frown on the singer's oe frontis, and a burying of the chin in the neckcloth, quick as lightning, snatching his baton of command, he would bring in the band strong on the note, and add to the effect by sundry blows on the wood of his desk; again the singer is safe! Such traits mark the consummate leader, and we can name but one man whom we think might claim superiority over Paradol in that respect—T. Cooke. Madame St. Clair, la première chanteuse, now claims our attention. Her voice is pure, and her intonation generally correct; her execution is not by any means first-rate, and the besetting fault of the company equally attends her; she has little power. In the great finale to the first act, where she has a leading part, full of roulades, she could not be distinguished from the rest, consequently the piece lost its chief characteristic—the supremacy of the princess, to whom the other voices ought to be subservient. However, from the first mentioned qualities it is clear, we think, that although Madame St. Clair may fail in bringing her allotted music as forward as the author might desire, she is not likely to offend her audience.

On the twentieth instant Auber's opera of "La Fiancée" was performed. The overture of the piece was beautifully played. Auber may perhaps, when compared with Weber, Rossini, and Boieldieu, be accused not only of imitation of the two first, but of a certain vulgarity in his orchestral arrangements, from which Boieldieu is wholly exempt. The frequent use of the octave flute and drums of all kinds, we consider comes under this denomination, and his recurrence to ear-startling discords, after the manner of Weber, without the judicious application of them, evidently denotes that he has studied Weberian effect without having quite mastered it; his voice parts savour a good deal of Rossinian mannerism, but his melodies are generally delightful. By the introduction of the Italian mode of writing for the voice; he has decidedly enlightened the barbarity, and removed much of the prejudice entertained by the French in favour of their own peculiar méthode of singing. Letellier acted Fritz, and the famous "Garde à vous," song he sang with much spirit. We wish this gentleman would leave out his interminable cadences in the falsetto of his voice; it has not the originality but all the defects of a Swiss peasant howling the "Rans des vaches." Frenchmen, who have ever been at Paris, must have had an opportunity of witnessing how differently the Italians manage their voices; it is the glory of their art to unite, so as scarcely to be perceptible, the one or two falsetto notes at the farthest which they are compelled to add to their natural compass. Madame Berdoulet found Auber's music, beyond her powers; but, if fidelity to nature, and chaste, yet impassioned acting are claims upon public favour, this lady possesses them in the highest degree. We consider it almost impossible to portray the heart-broken feelings of the ill-treated Henriette with more force and propriety; she produced on her audience a deep and thrilling effect, and proved herself an artiste of a very superior grade. Privat, as the gay Chambellan, was excellent, and the music he executed correctly. The only person we consider ourselves bound to mention in addition, is Madame Milon, and she both acted and sang well.

On the evening of the twenty-first instant "Le Barbier de Séville" was produced. We have already so fully particularized the merits and demerits of the various vocalists, that very little is left for us to add. We do not consider the music of Rossini calculated to call forth a favourable display of their talents. Monsieur Privat, however, acted Beaumarchais' roguish valet perfectly, and gave considerable effect to his share of the music; and Monsieur Curto, as Basil, (his second appearance) improved greatly upon us, and we are confirmed in the opinion that his voice is of very considerable compass, and excellent quality. He appears to be a musician. Neither the band nor the singers give the same expression to the music of the Barber which we have been accustomed to hear given by Italians; but if you were to point out to a French musician this evident truth, and propose an alteration, his answer would inevitably be, with a shrug, "Mais, Monsieur, on ne fait pas ça à Paris," which answer, in a Frenchman's opinion, amounts to argument, proof, and conviction. IL FANATICO AND CO.

The "Denounced" is the name of a new novel, announced by the author of Felham and Paul Clifford

THE FINE ARTS.

THE CELEBRATED PREGHIERA FROM OBERON.

THE melody which appears on the last page of this number may not be the most captivating morceau to the gods and groundlings of a theatre, but it undoubtedly is a composition of the most masterly description. Sir Huon, of Bourdeaux, and his mistress, Reiza, are shipwrecked on some unknown and desert island, during their escape from the court of the Caliph Haroun the just, where Sir Huon had fulfilled a romantic and knight-errant act of derring do, as Sir Walter Scott calls it, which might be construed fool-hardiness, and which he was bound to complete or never return to his native France, by the stern decree of Charlemagne. This modest and reasonable obligation (par parenthèse) forced our knight to go to the court of the infidel caliph, strike down the nobleman at his right hand, pull a quantum sufficit of hair from the great potentate's unshorn chin; and by way of making him some amends for such treatment, the knight was strictly enjoined to steal the caliph's daughter and produce her at the court of the French emperor. All this having duly taken place by the aid of Oberon and the loan of a charmed horn, the knight and his eastern bride are cast ashore on their return by a tempest, and while the lady reclines on a bank in slumber, with long and streaming hair, (of course habited in white muslin, the most approved costume on the stage for swimming and going mad) her faithful knight, who has contrived to swim ashore in armour, sings this beautiful prayer, or invocation for her safety—and we do not believe a more perfect specimen of the same description of music can be found. It is replete with melancholy and pathos; the accompaniment consists of long, holding notes, admirably suited to an organ; the modulation is peculiarly adapted to give force to the supplicatory passages; the wind instruments (in writing for which Weber has no equal) are quite in keeping with the subject. The horns are most prevalent, and their soft and subdued tones on their open notes only, form a fine contrast with the wailing of the bassoon, which occasionally relieves them; indeed, when the accompaniments are well executed their effect is sublime. If Weber had been spared a few brief years, and had turned his great and versatile genius to the composition of music for the church, judging from the Preghiera, above alluded to, what might he not have accomplished? It is almost unkind to the amateurs of music of the present day to venture a speculation on such a subject, as it must awaken regret. B.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

DANCING OF TAGLIONI.

TAGLIONI, says the Court Journal, has three times repeated her exquisite performances at the King's theatre, with a success which does honour to the taste of our audiences, and proves that they can appreciate a style of dancing which ought to create a new era in the art. We do not believe that anything in the least degree resembling the dancing of this delightful artist has been seen in modern times; nothing, we mean, approaching so near to that ideal character which an art like this must necessarily assume before it can deserve to rank among those which call for, and are susceptible of a critical examination, with reference to their power of appealing successfully to the intellectual passions and affections. We have of late years had some (female) dancers, who were, and are, exquisite in their way; indeed, as much so as a conformity with the received rules and practice of their art would admit; but those very rules which the dancers in question—Fanny Bias, for example, Biggotini, Ronzi Vestris, Noblet, and others carried into practice with so exquisite and happy a skill, were at absolute variance with the very principles (or rather, the one fundamental principle) on which the art should rest; they were to be followed with success only by forsaking nature; whereas the art has never deserved to rank among those which we consent to denominate fine arts, and it never can rank with those (we mean the arts of painting, sculpture, music, and acting) but by following nature. The secret of Taglioni's success is to be found in the approaches which she makes to (not the actual movements of the human form, under the existing circumstances in which it is found, but) the actual movements of the human form under certain supposable circumstances, consistent with those attributes which are inherent in it in virtue of the intellectual qualities with which it is allied, and which no qualities, as no circumstances can divorce them from it, so none can prevent them from at least recognising the symbols by which their presence is indicated.

Taghioni's dancing is like the talking of the females in Shakspeare and Beaumont and Fletcher. No one will assert that any woman ever did talk as Aspasia does in the "Maid's Tragedy," or Euphrasia, in Philaster; or as Juliet does, or Viola, or Imogen, or Desdemona: yet the absolute nature of those divine creations is the chief, nay, the sole ground of our admiration of them. And thus it is with the dancing of Taghioni; it is the natural movement of the female form, refined and elevated in poetry. She moves, not a goddess, or queen, or fairy, but a mere woman. She is apparently (and this is her great secret) unconscious that she is doing any thing but moving from place to place, or that she is doing so in a manner different from that assumed by any other person under similar circumstances. Look narrowly at every other dancer, and you will perceive that they perpetually remind you of the diah which seemed to say "come eat me!"—"Come admire me!" is ever the language of their looks, when they have completed any given operation of their art. It is never so with Taghioni, for she never sets about, or completes any movement, but gradually and imperceptibly rises or subsides into it, as a cloud or a wave does, which, while you are looking upon it as one thing, becomes another. It is the ineffable ease and quietude of all her motions which constitute the chief novelty and charm of her style; for we can scarcely admit that she has more of what is called grace and elegance than some others have, Brocard, for instance; and she has no more of what is called science than several others; not more, perhaps, than Julie Varennes. We may have another and more favourable opportunity of treating this matter at length.

REMINISCENCES OF NEW-YORK.

There are in the clerk's office in this city records of 1656, another of 1657, orders of the burgomasters in 1658, another of their resolutions and orders in 1661 and 1664. The English records are complete from the present day back to 1675.

Extracts and notes from the first of these volumes:

Oct. 1675.—Order: The canoes of the Indians, wheresoever found, are to be collected to the north side of Long Island, as a better security to the inhabitants in case of their [the Indians] having any intention to aid the Canadian enemies. At the same time, ordered: "All Indians near New-York make their winter quarters at Hurl-Gate, so as to be ready of control or inspection."

1675.—Gov. Andros, [the English governor] orders: That by reason of the change of the government, the inhabitants must take the oath of allegiance to their new sovereign.—There are only thirty-six recorded names who conformed.

1675.—The mayor, on the approach of new year's day, commands the disuse of firing guns.

1675.—The city gates are ordered to be closed at nine o'clock, and to be opened at daylight. The citizens to serve in turn as watchmen or be fined.

No cursing or swearing shall be permitted under heavy penalty. The watchmen are carefully to go frequently near the bridge (meaning the bridge in Broad-street,) and every citizen is [for the purpose of guard] to keep in his house a good firelock and six rounds of ball.

1675.—The rates of tavern fare are thus decreed and ordered.—For lodging 3d. for meals 6d. brandy per gill 6d. French wines per quart 1s. 8d. 3d. "syder" a quart 4d. "double beer" 3d. and mum a quart 6d.

1676.—Tanners pits declared a nuisance within the city; ordered, they (i. e. the tanners) shall exercise their functions out of the town.

"Ordered, innkeepers be fined, from whose houses persons may come out drunk."—If a similar order were issued in 1830, what a revenue the city would have.

1676.—A fine of twenty guilders imposed on all sabbath-breakers.

It is ordered, for the better securing a supply of bread, that no grain be allowed to be distilled. How many families of the present day could now profit by such a restraint, who abound in whiskey and lack bread.

In 1676, there were only three hundred property holders in this city—they were assessed one half a dollar a pound on 99,695 pounds. The pre-eminently rich among the English families of that day were John Robson, Edward Griffith, James Loyde, and George Heathcott. These families are now extinct.

Public wells, hooks, ladders and buckets ordered, (and places to put them designated,) for the use of the city.

A mill house is taxed in Mill-street lane, indicating the fact of a water course and mill seat at the head of what is now called Mill-street.

1730 to 1750.—In New-York boots were rarely worn—never as an article of dress—chiefly when seen they were worn by hostlers, seamen, and watermen. The sailors wore great petticoat trowsers, reaching to the knee, and there tied close—common people wore their clothes much longer than they do now—a garment was only deemed half worn when it became broken.

There were very few carpets on floors before the revolution; when first introduced they covered the floors outside the chairs around the room; some few families had carpets, but then they procured them through merchants as a special importation for themselves.

Mahogany was not in use prior to 1770, and at most it was displayed in a desk or small tea table—the latter was always round. The general furniture was made of Billethead, i. e. maple. Coaches were very rare; there were not more than four or five of them in the city. Men were deemed rich who kept a chaise; the governor had one coach, and Mr. Walton had one.

Lieutenant-governor Colden also had a coach, Mrs. Alexander and Mr. Murray also kept coaches. The latter being a quaker, called his a leather convenience, to avoid scandal.

The first umbrellas worn in this city were by the British officers, and it was deemed effeminate in them. Parasols were unknown. As a defence from rain the men wore "rain coats," and the women "camblets."

Gloves came into use in this city about the year 1765.

All the houses were sanded with white or silver sand, in figures and devices.

Almost all the articles now made of china or glass, were in olden times made of pewter.

There were no daily gazettes till after the revolution. Weyman and Gaine edited a weekly paper.

About the year 1750, the lots fronting Vly-market were sold by the city corporation at one dollar a foot—twenty-five dollars the lot. The same lots are now worth ten thousand dollars each.

In 1750 the name of "Greenwich" was unknown; but the Dutch, when they spoke of the place, called it Shawbackanica, an Indian name.

In 1750 the Dutch yachts took about two weeks to make a voyage from New-York to Albany.

The first methodist preaching in New-York was at a house in William-street. There Embury first preached, and being a carpenter, made his own pulpit.

It is not more than fifty years ago since Corlaer's hook was in a state of woods. The first "Drover's Inn" kept so near the city was a little above St. Paul's church, by Adam Vanderbarrack.

Bayard Spring in the woods, a great resort in the afternoons; it was surrounded by a thick forest of hickory trees. The spring was on the south side of the present Spring-street, near Varick-street.

In the year 1787 Colonel Ramsay, then in congress, considered himself as living out in the country while residing at the White Conduit House, situated between Leonard and Franklin-streets.

The old Dutch records clearly show that all the rear of the city was laid out into farms, say six in number, called "Bowery," from whence we have "Bowery" now; Van Twiller himself (Gov. Van Twiller) had his mansion on No. 1., his tobacco field on No. 3. No. 1. is supposed to be from Wall-street to Hudson-street; No. 3. at Greenwich, then called Tapohanican; No. 4. was near the plain of Manhattan, including the Park and the Kolck or Collect.

A celebrated garden was formerly kept at the spot where now stands Peale's Museum; it was a place of great resort; was called Montagne's garden. It was here "the sons of liberty" convened.

Robert Murray's farm-house, in the neighbourhood of the city, should ever be venerable from its associations. There his patriotic lady entertained General Howe and his staff with refreshments after landing with the army at Kip's bay; and she contrived to detain the officers so long that General Putnam got time to lead off the American troops, then on full retreat from the city.

The hill at the head of Chatham-street, where it joins the Bowery, has been cut down twelve feet. From this point, following the line of Division street, and thence to the east river on the line of Catharine-street, was formerly Colonel Rutgers' farm; it was opened into city lots about thirty years ago by G. Taylor.

The houses thirteen and fifteen Elm-street, near the corner of Duane-street, are singular evidences of modern innovations. They were originally good two-story houses and are now filled up nearly to the roofs.

Mr. Jacob Tabele, now aged eighty-seven, states that in his early days almost every person you met in the streets spoke Dutch, and that there were no lamps in the streets when he was a boy.

In Nicholas Bayard's wood, now the vicinity of Centre-market, he often shot pigeons.

He remembered ship-yards between Beekman and Burling slips.

He had seen the river water flow the sewer up Maiden-lane as high as Mr. Alstein's blacksmith shop on the triangular square.

He remembered the "Ferry House," so called, high up in Broad-street as the sign of the boat with iron oars, (corner of Garden and Broad-streets;) a creek formerly ran 'up to this point; and he remembered when boats could freely pass along the space now occupied by large trees on the Battery.

The old city hall, "Stat Huis," was formerly at the head of Coenties' slip.

The meal market was once at the foot of Wall-street.

The Bowling-green was once an oblong square, and surrounded with large locust trees.

In the year 1773 Broadway extended only as high as the present hospital—where that now is, was then known as and called Rutgers' orchard. Watson

THE SPRING JOURNEY.

BY THE LATE BISHOP HENRY.

Oh! green was the corn as I rode on my way,
And bright were the dews on the blossoms of May,
And dark was the sycamore's shade to behold,
And the oak's tender leaf was of emerald and gold.

The thrush from his holly, the lark from his cloud,
Their chorus of rapture sung jovial and loud;
From the soft vernal sky to the soft grassy ground,
There was beauty above me, beneath, and around.

The mild southern breeze brought a shower from the hill,
And yet, though it left me all dripping and chill,
I felt a new pleasure as onward I sped,
To gaze where the rainbow gleam'd broad over head.

Oh, such be life's journey, and such be our skill,
To lose in its blessings the sense of its ill!
Through sunshine and shower may our progress be even,
And our tears add a charm to the prospect of heaven!

VARIETIES.

EXCERPTS.—If, instead of furnishing a room with separate portraits, a whole family were to be introduced into a single piece, and represented under some interesting historical subject, suitable to their rank and character, portraits which are now so deservedly despised, might become of real value to the public. By this means historical painting would be encouraged among us, and a ridiculous vanity made subservient to the improvement of one of the most pleasing of the imitative arts. Those who never contributed a single benefit to their own age, nor will ever be mentioned in any after one, might by this means employ their pride and their expense in a way which might render them entertaining and useful both to the present and future times.

We should feel sorrow, but not sink under its oppression; the heart of a wise man should resemble a mirror, which reflects every object without being sullied by any.

There are but three ways for a man to revenge himself of the censure of the world: to despise it—to return the like—or to endeavour to live so as to avoid it. The first of these is usually pretended; the last is almost impossible; the universal practice is the second.

Self-love and morosity, together with luxury and effeminacy, breed in us long and frequent fits of anger; which by little and little, are gathered together into our souls, like a swarm of bees and wasps.

A NOBLE PRIG.—The duke of Charolois, a prince of the blood, meeting the duke of Brisac at the house of a lady to whom they were both attached, and stung by jealousy, forgot himself so far as to say rudely, "Go out, Brisac." "Your ancestors, Monseigneur," replied the French chevalier, "would have said, come out." The same striking originality attended the minutiae of Brisac's private life. He never would permit his valet to shave him, and when he took the razor in his hand at the toilette, he was often heard to repeat the following soliloquy:—"Timoleon de Cossé, God has made thee a gentleman, and the king has made thee a duke. It is, nevertheless, right and fit that thou shouldst have something to do, therefore thou shalt shave thyself."

ENTIRE DRESS.—A tailor at Mayence has invented an entire dress in one piece, consisting of a cravat, waistcoat, coat, pantaloons, and gaiters, which may be all put on in a minute.

THE MAIN-TRUCK, OR A LEAP FOR LIFE.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

"Stand still! How fearful
And dizzy 'tis to cast one's eyes so low!"

"The murmuring surge,
That on th' unnumber'd idle pebbles chafes,
Cannot be heard so high:—I'll look no more;
Lost my brain turn, and the deficient sight
Topple down headlong."—Shakespeare.

AMONG the many agreeable associates whom my different cruises and wanderings have brought me acquainted with, I can scarcely call to mind a more pleasant and companionable one than Tom Scupper. Poor fellow! he is dead and gone now—a victim to that code of false honour which has robbed the navy of too many of its choicest officers. Tom and I were mess-mates during a short and delightful cruise, and, for a good part of the time, we belonged to the same watch. He was a great hand to spin yarns, which, to do him justice, he sometimes told tolerably well; and many a long mid-watch has his fund of anecdote and sea stories caused to slip pleasantly away. We were lying, in the little schooner to which we were attached, in the open roadstead of Laguyra, at single anchor, when Tom told me the story which I am about to relate, as nearly as I can remember, in his own words. A vessel from Baltimore had come into Laguyra that day, and by her I had received letters from home, in one of which there was a piece of intelligence that weighed very heavily on my spirits. For some minutes after our watch commenced, Tom and I walked the deck in silence, which was soon, however, interrupted by my talkative companion, who perceiving my depression, and wishing to divert my thoughts, began as follows:

The last cruise I made in the Mediterranean was in old Ironside, as we used to call our gallant frigate. We had been backing and filling for several months on the western coast of Africa, from the Canaries down to Messurado, in search of slave traders; and during that time we had had some pretty heavy weather. When we reached the Straits, there was a spanking wind blowing from about west-south-west; so we squared away, and, without coming to at the Rock, made a straight wake for old Mahon, the general rendezvous and place of refitting for our squadrons in the Mediterranean. Immediately on arriving there, we warped in alongside the Arsenal quay, where we stripped ship to a girtline, broke out the holds, tiers, and store-rooms, and gave her a regular-built overhauling from stem to stern. For a while, every body was busy, and all seemed bustle and confusion. Orders and replies, in loud and dissimilar voices, the shrill piping of the different boatswain's mates, each attending to separate duties, and the mingled clatter and noise of various kinds of work, all going on at the same time, gave something of the stir and animation of a dock-yard to the usually quiet arsenal of Mahon. The boatswain and his crew were engaged in fitting a new gang of rigging; the gunner in repairing his breechings and gun-tackles; the fo'castle-men in calking; the top-men in sending down the yards and upper spars; the holders and waiters in whitewashing and holy-stoning; and even the poor marines were kept busy, like beasts of burden, in carrying breakers of water on their backs. On the quay, near the ship, the smoke of the armourer's forge, which had been hoisted out and sent ashore, ascended in a thin black column through the clear blue sky; from one of the neighbouring white stone warehouses the sound of saw and hammer told that the carpenters were at work; near by, a livelier rattling drew attention to the cooper, who in the open air was tightening the water-casks; and not far removed, under a temporary shed, formed of spare studding-sails and tarpaulins, sat the sailmaker and his assistants, repairing the sails, which had been rent or injured by the many storms we had encountered.

Many hands, however, make light work, and in a very few days all was accomplished: the stays and shrouds were set up and new rattled down; the yards crossed, the running rigging rove, and sails bent; and the old craft, fresh painted and all a-taunt-o, looked as fine as a midshipman on liberty. In place of the storm-stumps, which had been stowed away among the booms and other spare spars, amidsthips, we had sent up cap 'o' gallant-masts and royal-poles, with a sheave for skysails, and hoist enough for sky-scrappers above them: so you may judge the old frigate looked pretty taunt. There was a Dutch line-ship in the harbour; but though we only carried forty-four to her eighty, her main-truck would hardly have reached to our royal-mast-head. The side-boys, whose duty it was to lay aloft and curl the skysails, looked no bigger on the yard than a good-sized duff for a midshipman's mess, and the main-truck seemed not half as large as the Turk's-head-knot on the man-ropes of the accommodation ladder.

When we had got every thing ship-shape and man-of-war fashion, we hauled out again, and took our berth about half way between the Arsenal and Hospital island; and a pleasant view it gave us of the town and harbour of old Mahon, one of the safest and most tranquil places of anchorage in the world. The water of this beautiful inlet—which though it makes about four miles into the land, is not much over a quarter of a mile in width—is scarcely ever ruffled by a storm; and on the delightful afternoon to which I now refer, it lay as still and motionless as a polished mirror, except when broken into momentary ripples by the paddles of some passing waterman. What little wind we had had in the fore part of the day, died away at noon, and, though the first dog-watch was almost out, and the sun was near the horizon, not a breath of air had risen to disturb the deep serenity of the scene. The Dutch liner, which lay not far from us, was so clearly reflected in the glassy surface of the water, that there was not a rope about her, from her main-stay to her signal halliards, which the eye could not distinctly trace in her shadow and inverted image. The buoy of our best bower floated abreast our larboard bow; and that, too, was so strongly imaged, that its entire bulk seemed to lie above the water, just resting on it, as if upborne on a sea of molten lead; except when now and then, the wringing of a swab, or the dashing of a bucket overboard from the head, broke up the shadow for a moment, and showed the substance but half its former apparent size. A small polacca craft had got underway from Mahon in the course of the forenoon, intending to stand over to Barcelona; but it fell dead calm just before she reached the chops of the harbour; and there she lay as motionless upon the blue surface, as if she were only part of a mimic scene, from the pencil of some accomplished painter. Her broad cotton lateen-sails, as they hung drooping from the slanting and taper yards, shone with a glistening whiteness that contrasted beautifully with the dark flood in which they were reflected; and the distant sound of the guitar, which one of the sailors was listlessly playing on her deck, came sweetly over the water, and harmonized well with the quiet appearance of every thing around. The white-washed walls of the lazaretto, on a verdant headland at the mouth of the bay, glittered like silver in the slant rays of the sun; and some of its windows were burnished so brightly by the level beams, that it seemed as if the whole interior of the edifice were in flames. On the opposite side, the romantic and picturesque ruins of fort St. Philip, faintly seen, acquired double beauty from being tipped with the declining light; and the clusters of ancient-looking windmills, which dot the green eminences along the bank, added, by the motionless state of their wings, to the effect of the unbroken tranquillity of the scene.

Even on board our vessel, a degree of stillness unusual for a man-of-war prevailed among the crew. It was the hour of their evening meal; and the low hum that came from the gun-deck had an indistinct and buzzing sound, which, like the tiny song of bees of a warm summer noon, rather heightened than diminished the charm of the surrounding quiet. The spar-deck was almost deserted. The quarter-master of the watch, with his spy-glass in his hand, and dressed in a frock and trowsers of snowy whiteness, stood aft upon the taffrel, erect and motionless as a statue, keeping the usual look-out. A group of some half a dozen sailors had gathered together on the fo'castle, where they were supinely lying under the shade of the bulwarks; and here and there, upon the gun-slides along the gangway, sat three or four others—one, with his clothes-bag beside him, overhauling his simple wardrobe; another working a set of clues for some favourite officer's hammock; and a third engaged, perhaps, in carving his name in rude letters upon the handle of a jack-knife, or in knotting a lanard with which to suspend it round his neck.

On the top of the boom cover, and in the full glare of the level sun, lay black Jake, the jig-maker of the ship, and a striking specimen of African peculiarities, in whose single person they were all strongly developed. His flat nose was dilated to unusual width, and his ebony cheeks fairly glistened with delight, as he looked up at the gambols of a large monkey, which, clinging to the main-stay, just above Jake's woolly head, was chattering and grinning back at the negro, as if there existed some means of mutual intelligence between them. It was my watch on deck, and I had been standing several minutes leaning on the main fife-rail, amusing myself by observing the antics of the black and his congenial playmate; but at length, tiring of the rude mirth, had turned towards the taffrel, to gaze on the more agreeable features of that scene which I have feebly attempted to describe. Just at that moment a shout and a merry laugh burst upon my ear, and looking quickly round, to ascertain the cause of the unusual sound on a frigate's deck, I saw little Bob Stay (as we called our commodore's son) standing half way up the main-batch ladder, clapping his hands, and looking aloft at some object that seemed to inspire him with a deal of glee. A single glance to the main-yard explained the occasion of his merriment. He had been coming up from the gun-deck, when Jacko, perceiving him on the ladder, dropped suddenly down from the main-stay, and running along the boom-cover, leaped upon Bob's shoulder, seized his cap from his head, and immediately darted up the main-topail-sheet, and thence to the bunt of the main-yard, where he now sat, picking threads from the tassel of his prize, and occasionally scratching his side, and chattering, as if with exultation for the success of his mischief. But Bob was a sprightly, active little fellow; and though he could not climb quite as nimbly as a monkey, yet he had no mind to lose his cap without an effort to regain it. Perhaps he was the more strongly incited to make chase after Jacko, from noticing me to smile at his plight, or by the loud laugh of Jake, who seemed inexpressibly delighted at the occurrence, and endeavoured to evince, by tumbling about the boom-cloth, shaking his huge misshapen head, and sundry other grotesque actions, the pleasure for which he had no words.

"Ha, you d—n rascal, Jacko, hab you no more respect for de young officer, den to steal his cab? We bring you to de gangway, you black nigger, and gib you a dozen on de bare back for a tief."

The monkey looked down from his perch as if he understood the threat of the negro, and chattered a sort of defiance in answer.

"Ha, ha! Massa Stay, he say you mus' ketch him 'fore you flog him; and it's no so easy for a midshipman in boots to ketch a monkey barefoot."

A red spot mounted to the cheek of little Bob, as he cast one glance of offended pride at Jake, and then sprang across the deck to the Jacob's ladder. In an instant he was half-way up the rigging, running over the ratlines as lightly as if they were an easy flight of stairs, whilst the shrouds scarcely quivered beneath his elastic motion. In a second more his hand was on the futtocks.

"Massa Stay!" cried Jake, who sometimes, from being a favourite, ventured to take liberties with the younger officers, "Massa Stay, you best crawl through de lubber's hole—i take a sailor to climb the futtock shroud."

But he had scarcely time to utter his pretended caution, before Bob was in the top. The monkey in the meanwhile had awaited his approach, until he had got nearly up the rigging, when it suddenly put the cap on its own head, and running along the yard to the opposite side of the top, sprang up a rope, and thence to the topmast backstay, up which it ran to the topmast cross-trees, where it again quietly seated itself, and resumed its work of picking the tassel to pieces. For several minutes I stood watching my little messmate follow Jacko from one piece of rigging to another, the monkey, all the while, seeming to exert only so much agility as was necessary to elude the pursuer, and pausing whenever the latter appeared to be growing weary of the chase. At last, by this kind of manœuvring, the mischievous animal succeeded in enticing Bob as high as the royal-mast-head, when springing suddenly on the royal-stay, it ran nimbly down to the fore-top-gallant-mast head, thence down the rigging to the fore-top, when leaping on the foreyard, it ran out to the yard-arm, and hung the cap on the end of the studding-sail boom, where, taking its seat, it raised a loud and exulting chattering. Bob by this time was completely tired out, and, perhaps, unwilling to return to the deck to be laughed at for his fruitless chase, he sat down in the royal cross-trees; while those who had been attracted by the sport, returned to their usual avocations or amusements. The monkey, no longer the object of pursuit or attention, remained but a little while on the yard-arm; but soon taking up the cap, returned in towards the slings, and dropped it down upon deck.

Some little piece of duty occurred at this moment to engage me, as soon as which was performed I walked aft, and leaning my elbow on the taffrel, was quickly lost in the recollection of scenes very different from the small pantomime I had just been witnessing. Soothed by the low hum of the crew, and by the quiet loveliness of every thing around, my thoughts had travelled far away from the realities of my situation, when I was suddenly startled by a cry from black Jake, which brought me on the instant back to consciousness.

"My God! Massa Scupper," cried he, "Massa Stay is on de main-truck!"

A cold shudder ran through my veins as the word reached my ear. I cast my eyes up—it was too true! The adventurous boy, after resting on the royal cross-trees, had been seized with a wish to go still higher, and impelled by one of those impulses by which men are sometimes instigated to place themselves in situations of imminent peril, without a possibility of good resulting from the exposure, he had climbed the skysail-pole, and, at the moment of my looking up, was actually standing on the main-truck! a small circular piece of wood on the very summit of the loftiest mast, and at a height so great from the deck that my brain turned dizzy as I looked up at him. The reverse of Virgil's line was true in this instance. It was comparatively easy to ascend—but to descend—my head swam round, and my stomach felt sick at thought of the perils comprised in that one word. There was nothing above him or around him but the empty air—and beneath him, nothing but a point, a mere point—a small, unstable wheel, that seemed no bigger from the deck than the button on the end of a foil, and the taper skysail-pole itself scarcely larger than the blade. Dreadful temerity! If he should attempt to stoop, what could he take hold of to steady his descent? His feet quite covered up the small and fearful platform that he stood upon, and beneath that, a long, smooth, naked spar, which seemed to bend with his weight, was all that upheld him from destruction. An attempt to get down from "that bad eminence," would be almost certain death; he would inevitably lose his equilibrium, and be precipitated to the deck a crushed and shapeless mass. Such was the nature of the thoughts that crowded through my mind as I first raised my eye, and saw the terrible truth of Jake's exclamation. What was to be done in the pressing and horrible exigency? To hail him, and inform him of his danger, would be but to ensure his ruin. Indeed, I fancied that the rash boy already perceived the imminence of his peril; and I half thought that I could see his limbs begin to quiver, and his cheek turn deadly pale. Every moment I expected to see the dreadful catastrophe. I could not bear to look at him, and yet could not withdraw my gaze. A film came over my eyes, and a faintness over my heart. The atmosphere seemed to grow thick, and to tremble and waver like the heated air around a furnace; the mast appeared to totter, and the ship to pass from under my feet. I myself had the sensations of one about to fall from a great height, and making a strong effort to recover myself, like that of a dreamer who fancies he is shoved from a precipice, I staggered up against the bulwarks.

When my eyes were once turned from the dreadful object to which they had been rivetted, my sense and consciousness came back. I looked around me—the deck was already crowded with people. The intelligence of poor Bob's temerity had spread through the ship like wild-fire—as such news always will—and the officers and crew were all crowding to the deck to behold the appalling—the heart-rending spectacle. Every one, as he looked up, turned pale, and his eye became fastened in silence on the truck—like that of a spectator of an execution on the gallows—with a steadfast, unblinking and intense, yet abhorrent gaze, as if momentarily expecting a fatal termination to the awful suspense. No one made a suggestion—no one spoke. Every feeling, every faculty seemed to be absorbed and swallowed up in one deep, intense emotion of agony. Once the first lieutenant seized the trumpet, as if to hail poor Bob, but he had scarce raised it to his lips, when his arm drooped again, and sunk listlessly down beside him, as if from a sad consciousness of the utter inutility of what he had been going to say. Every soul in the ship was now on the spar-deck, and every eye was turned to the main-truck.

At this moment there was a stir among the crew about the gangway, and directly after another face was added to those on the quarter-deck—it was that of the commodore, Bob's father. He had come alongside in a shore boat, without having been noticed by a single eye, so intense and universal was the interest that had fastened every gaze upon the spot where poor Bob stood trembling on the awful verge of fate. The commodore asked not a question, uttered not a syllable. He was a dark-faced, austere man, and it was thought by some of the midshipmen that he entertained but little affection for his son. However that might have been, it was certain that he treated him with precisely the same strict discipline that he did the other young officers, or if there was any difference at all, it was not in favour of Bob. Some, who pretended to have studied his character closely, affirmed that he loved his boy too well to spoil him, and that, intending him for the arduous profession in which he had himself risen to fame and eminence, he thought it would be of service to him to experience some of its privations and hardships at the outset.

The arrival of the commodore changed the direction of several eyes, which now turned on him to trace what emotions the danger of his son would occasion. But their scrutiny was foiled. By no outward sign did he show what was passing within. His eye still retained its severe expression, his brow the slight frown which it usually wore, and his lip its haughty curl. Immediately on reaching the deck, he had ordered a marine to hand him a musket, and with this stepping aft, and getting on the lookout-block, he raised it to his shoulder, and took a deliberate aim at his son, at the same time hailing him, without a trumpet, in his voice of thunder.

"Robert!" cried he, "jump! jump overboard! or I'll fire at you."

The boy seemed to hesitate, and it was plain that he was tottering, for his arms were thrown out like those of one scarcely able to retain his balance. The commodore raised his voice again, and in a quicker and more energetic tone, cried, "Jump! 'tis your only chance for life."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth, before the body was seen to leave the truck and spring out into the air. A sound, between a shriek and groan, burst from many lips. The father spoke not—sighed not—indeed he did not seem to breathe. For a moment of intense agony a pin might have been heard to drop on deck. With a rush like that of a cannon ball, the body descended to the water, and before the waves closed over it, twenty stout fellows, among them several officers, had dived from the bulwarks. Another short period of bitter suspense ensued. It rose—he was alive! his arms were seen to move!—he struck out towards the ship!—and despite the discipline of a man-of-war, three loud huzzas, an outburst of unfeigned and unrestrained joy from the hearts of our crew of five hundred men, pealed through the air, and made the welkin ring. Till this moment, the old commodore had stood unmoved. The eyes, that glistening with pleasure, now sought his face, saw that it was ashy pale. He attempted to descend the horse-block, but his knees bent under him; he seemed to gasp for breath, and put up his hand, as if to tear open his vest; but before he accomplished his object, he staggered forward, and would have fallen on the deck, had he not been caught by old Black Jake. He was borne into his cabin, where the surgeon attended him, whose utmost skill was required to restore his mind to its usual equanimity and self-command, in which he at last happily succeeded. As soon as he recovered from the dreadful shock, he sent for Bob, and had a long confidential conference with him; and it was noticed when the little fellow left the cabin that he was in tears. The next day we sent down our taunt and dashy poles, and replaced them with the stump-to-gallant-masts; and on the third, we weighed anchor, and made sail for Gibraltar.

COME, LET US TRIP IT LIGHTLY, LOVE.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

Come, let us trip it lightly, love,
Where Flora's sweets are blending;
The moon is beaming brightly, love,
With starry lamps attending.
The grove and hill, the mead and rill,
Have charms that must delight thee,
Then let us haste, their sweets to taste,
While zephyr's sighs invite thee;
An hour like this imparts a bliss
To souls of kindred feeling;
A pure delight, serenely bright,
Along the pulses stealing.

The evening star is peeping, love,
From yonder paler cluster,
The glassy lake is sleeping, love,
Enrich'd with borrowed lustre;
The babbling brook, with brighter look,
Meanders through the dingle;
And chirping notes, from insect throats,
In tuneless measures mingle.
An hour like this, which wakes to bliss
The hearts of meaner creatures,
Must surely light a smile as bright
On love's expressive features.

EARLY DISAPPOINTMENT.

BY MISS E. BOGART.

"In sight that tries the heart
How few can stand the proof!"

The first disappointment of the heart is the hardest to be borne. It is that which falls like a blight on the warmest and best affections of which human nature is susceptible; and though the young and elastic spirits may sometimes rise beneath the pressure, and perhaps recover their wonted tone, amidst the pleasures and gaieties of life, there is still a cold and barren place on the mind, where hope will not blossom, nor expectation put forth her powers, nor fancy spring again into beauty and fertility. Love is, doubtless, in youth, the strongest passion. It takes entire possession of the heart and thoughts. It is the root on which happiness is grafted, and on which memory is engraven with its most indelible print. The histories of its power are spread over the whole earth. They are taken from every station and condition of life, and painted in all the variety of form and colouring of which the invention of the mind is capable. We behold in fancy its Eden-like paradise of bliss, its wild tornados of destruction and violence, its morbid melancholy, its sullen pride, its shrinking timidity, its remorseless vengeance; all these have been portrayed to the imagination in vivid colours, and in thousands of instances, still there are other thousands yet unrelated; and shades of difference in each, which arise continually in changeable hues to the mind, like new lights cast on old and faded pictures. The first disappointment of love is the poisoned arrow of life. Its effects are visible, according to the character and disposition of its object. Many sink beneath its influence, and never recover from the shock. Others seem to rise above it in their boasted strength and pride; but while they laugh with the gay, and glide along apparently on the surface of the stream of pleasure, still

"The cold heart to ruin runs darkly the while."

The gloomy misanthropist, the reckless votary of dissipation, the miserable victim of the demon of intemperance have often been caused by some early disappointment of the heart; where, perhaps, "many a withering thought lies hid," of which the world knows not, thinks not, cares not. They were too dream-like in their existence, too unearthly in their nature, to be brought forth among those other thoughts,

"All outward bound,
Midst sands, and rocks, and storms, to cruise for pleasure."

These reflections were suggested to my mind by the circumstance of meeting lately with an old friend, whom I had not seen for several years—but I have written a long preface to a simple story.

Cecilia Moreland, as I first remember her, was one of the gayest and happiest of human beings. To me she was the animating spirit of all my juvenile pleasures and enjoyments. Our friendship commenced early, and was early brought to maturity; for it needs not years to awaken the feelings of affection in the heart; they spring up spontaneously wherever they find any thing around which to entwine themselves, and time has nothing to do with their growth or their decay. I have frequently wondered that we should have been so very intimate; and can only account for it on the principle that extremes sometimes harmonize. It is certain that we were totally unlike in character and disposition, yet I loved her as I have loved but few others. I know not how to describe her as she was at sixteen years of age, for there were never two days or hours in which she appeared the same. Lively, imaginative, unaffected, and affectionate, she was one of the most versatile and fascinating of nature's children. She was not very beautiful; but the glow of health and exercise imparted a brilliancy to her complexion, which charmed away the minor faults of form and feature. There was also an expression of gladness in her soul-beaming eye, and a clear wild ring of such heart-felt mirth in the sound of her gay laugh, that one might truly have imagined that happiness was the very essence of her existence. It was a source of deep regret to me that almost as soon as I was capable of appreciating her real worth, we were separated by the changing destinies of life. Still our attachment was faithfully nursed in a constant intercourse by letter, which was supported on both sides with undiminished ardour for the space of a whole year; but it at length shared the fate of all similar youthful correspondences. The dates of our epistles began to grow more "few and far between," till in each lengthened interval of silence there was something lost of former ease and familiarity. Our thoughts, and feelings, and pleasures, and pursuits, became strange to each other; and as the common topics of discussion between us were divested of their interest, the pen by degrees was entirely neglected.

Thus it was that for several years I knew nothing of Cecilia Moreland; nothing but that she was married—and according to the opinion of the world, married well. Her husband was said to be rich and handsome; and as beauty and wealth are the two things most sought after in the selection of a husband, who could presume to suppose that she had not been fortunate or happy in her choice? I believed from report that she was both happy and fortunate, and rejoiced at hearing it, as I would have done in former days. There are moments of delightful reminiscence, when the happy scenes of childhood and the power and witchery of early feeling come home to my heart. Indeed our first impressions of love, or friendship, or happiness, or misery, are perhaps never entirely erased from our minds; however they may be sometimes carried away, and apparently lost in the whirlpool of the world, there are still lucid intervals of calmness and reflection, when they are thrown back upon the memory, and resume their triumphant though transitory reign.

It is not many months since I met with the friend of whom I have been speaking. We were passing accidentally through the same place, and before I knew of her being there, I heard that she was coming to see me. In an instant the image of Cecilia Moreland arose in fancy,

"As bright to my heart as 'twas first to my eyes."

I saw her as she was when I last beheld her. I forgot that she was no longer Cecilia Moreland, and knew not that with a change of name there was scarcely a trace remaining of her former self. I waited her arrival with the utmost impatience. Every knock startled me—every sound of approaching footsteps fixed my eyes on the door. It was at length opened, and a lady entered, leading by the hand a little boy of three years of age. I sprang forward to meet her, while the exclamation involuntarily escaped my lips, "Oh, Cecilia, how you are altered!" She burst into tears. The answer was eloquent, and needed no explanation. We sat down, and spoke of the length of time which had intervened since our last meeting; of the changes which had taken place within that period, and the different destinies by which each had since been followed. I gazed on her face, and sighed as the picture of memory vanished. I wanted to ask her if she had been happy, but could not. I felt that it was a chord which would not bear vibration. The question was involved in too many delicate associations, which I knew could not be separated in her mind. It was evident that her once buoyant spirits had been crushed and broken, and her light heart divested of its gay and blissful feelings; and I was sure that there must have been some deep and undermining cause which had produced those effects; something too near home—which worked daily and hourly, and could not be cast off. Our brief intercourse was both pleasant and painful. We renewed our protestations of friendship with sincerity and interest, and once more parted to pursue our course in opposite directions. We were never to meet again. I spoke afterwards of our interview, and the impression it had left upon my mind, to one who had known Cecilia from childhood.

"Ah," replied she, "Cecilia has seen her best days. She has got a husband who will harass her to death, with his teasing and irritating temper. He possesses one of those fault-finding dispositions, which can never be suited with any thing; and his wife, with all her efforts, can seldom succeed in pleasing him. Her spirits have at length been worn out by 'a continual dropping,' and her health suffers in consequence. That is not the only cause either; but every body does not know what I know. Between ourselves, she never loved the man she married. Her heart was given to one whom her family thought no match for her, but they have reason now to repent their ambition. Of what use is wealth, if we must sacrifice peace to obtain it? The one who would have been her choice was every way calculated to make her happy, but her parents refused their consent to the union, and she gave him up. He has wandered away, nobody knows where, and she is fast descending to the grave."

Here the narrator ceased her history, and her closing prediction was but too soon verified. She is gone to her last rest. I read an account of her death in a newspaper but a few days ago. It was stated that she died of consumption, and the world will believe it was so. None, perhaps, will contradict it; though there may be a few who will know that it was early disappointment which preyed at first upon her spirits, and at length produced the hectic flush and wasting weakness, which eventually destroyed her.

There are two portraits drawn in lasting colours on my heart and memory: the portraits of the two Cecílias. The one representing its young original in all the brilliant hues of hope and happiness; the other, after some few years, reflecting in her countenance the shades of care and disappointment.

THE DOG DAYS.

We were the other day asked for the origin of this significant, though rather familiar and colloquial phrase, and found our researches in Johnson and Webster unsuccessful, although every one feels the thing. One should not, however, add an idea to the stock already in the possession of the readers of the Mirror, by telling them that the city is gone out of town; that fresh limes and lemons are everywhere sought; that the pump which gives out the coolest water has the greatest share of custom; that the demand for chocolate at the French coffee-houses is, in the mercantile phraseology, "on the decline;" that men who weigh upwards of two hundred pounds are likely to give employment to washer-women and getters-up of starched cravats; that the "wooden gardens," nightly illuminated and serenaded, are much frequented; that the accident list is weekly enlarged by ice-cream and cold-water cases; that there is much green water to be seen running through the streets of New-York as well as the Atlantic ocean; that the proprietors of baths divide a handsome percentage; that a shampooing establishment is contemplated, and that the last arrival from Leghorn, via Trieste, brought out a great many gentlemen à la mode—and all this notwithstanding the thermometer is a shade lower than "as per our last advices." But our principal object is to point out the astonishing effects these canine days produce upon particular temperaments or particular orders of men.

We observe by the papers lately received from the South, that editorial courtesy is gradually retreating from the winter standard, and approaching the meridian of Sirius. Even the third person is not inviolably observed, and the naked pronoun he is superabundant through (in one instance) a whole column of atrabilious epithets and jaundiced accusations. The individuals thus involved in "disputation perilous," no doubt consider their opponents as wilfully hostile and ill intentioned; but we look at the matter in a very different light, and regard the terms scoundrel, blackguard, fool, &c. &c. after the fourth of July as meaning nothing more than "warm," "hot," "very hot;" and we think that a homometer would, if such an instrument were properly constructed, yield this result.

From a course of observation of many years standing we have noted that almost all the duels and fatal renccontres have occurred at the South somewhere within the summer solstice; and if we mistake not, the celebrated M'Duffie and Cummings' fight took place in the autumnal months. Whether it is that heat, by a peculiar process, causes the organ of self-esteem to enlarge during the sultry season, and brings about pari passu, a diminution of that of bonhomie, or a love of the species, perhaps it would be hazardous positively to determine. Or a question may arise, whether the gall vessels infuse into the circulating mass then a sly and acrid quality; but this inquiry, properly belonging to physiological science, we hand it over to medical men; our object is to state facts, and although we eschew as much as any, anything approaching to prosing, and especially would we shun it at this season, yet to what we have already said we think we might venture to express our wish that the relations between editors were more frequently put upon a courteous and gentlemanly footing. There are some who are, very properly, even fastidious in this respect, giving Cæsar not only his due, but throwing something by way of propitiation into the scale. Indeed it would seem that self-respect and a desire to receive civil treatment would induce every editor to adopt himself a like course; but it must be acknowledged that circumstance has so much to do with men's actions, that even here if his customers are uncouth and uncivilized, the probability is that they might by a twelvemonth's residence amongst them, spoil a very gentlemanly candidate for the honours of the editorial chair. But surely these gentlemen should reflect that more distant persons are not compelled to put up quietly with their barbarous slang; and they should or might receive a very excellent lesson from the canine tribe, who are always conscious of their forlorn and unprotected situation when they get away from home; and an illustration may be taken from a more wild and less domestic animal, for nothing is more common than the phrase, like "a cat in a strange garret," to signify any person away from his tribe, and conscious of a destitution of this invigorating countenance. We have for ourselves formerly adopted towards such persons a non-intercourse attitude, and treated them as infected vessels and persons are by the health code. But sorry are we to record that even this has not been successful, for in the act of retreating they have thrown out such a fusillade of abuse, that we felt ourselves covered like a person in the pillory, from head to foot, with all the horrible substances, odours, and slang that the language contained, and this because we wished to have nothing further to do with such personages. We may, perhaps, properly conclude this article by begging permission to offer an expurgatory regulation to the fraternity, by which offenders may be marked, and being known, may be sent to Coventry for the first class of offences, and if needs be, some stronger measure may be hereafter adopted.

Let a list be printed of the different editors, to be placed in the office of each. Let the relative social characteristic of each be placed in the remark column, and the terms civil or uncivil, filching or fair, &c. be affixed opposite, and the list to be corrected the first Monday in each month by committee. This list, if we mistake not, would effect the desired reformation of manners, and thus would society be ameliorated in its very core, for what is the core of society if editors be not? T.

A CHAPTER ON SLEEP.

"Blessed," says Sancho Panza, "be the man who first invented this same sleep!—it covers one all over like a cloak." This quaint illustration of Sancho's is the best eulogy on "tired nature's sweet restorer" ever written. This is the very reason why we love sleep—that it "covers us all over like a cloak"—that it descends upon us like the ebony pall of night upon the earth, and shrouds us as completely and impenetrably. As night comes on, the eyes grow heavy, the head nods, the weary limbs relax, instinct sends us to our pillow for relief, and by some curious movement the machinery of both mind and body stops short, and we pass, we know not where or how, into we know not what. Some people may think it the easiest thing in the world to go to sleep, but the theory is by no means so simple as the practice. By merely closing the eyes to shut up all the avenues from the soul to external things, and build up a barrier between ourselves and the world, we cannot pass, however much we would—to chain down the restless mind to share the apathy of the torpid body, and to deprive ourselves by means of our own volition of that very volition, and yet know when we lay it aside that in a few hours we shall take it up again, perfect as ever—there is something "beyond the reaches of our souls" in this. In some of the thrilling stories told by men who have fallen in a trance and been put in the coffin for dead, the sufferers assert that they were fully sensible of all that passed—that they heard the sobbing of their friends, yet could not whisper one word to change their sorrow into joy—that the turning of every screw in the coffin-lid grated on their ears like the knell of their doom, and that the consciousness and the love of life was strong within, though the power to show it was denied them. This sounds strangely horrible and unnatural, yet it is not so very unlike the state of the faculties in ordinary sleep. Like the man in a trance, the sleeper is still sensible to external influence. A hearty supper oppresses, and opium stupifies him—a touch, a word shouted in his ear, a glare of light, breaks the chain in which mind and body are bound up together; he still can feel, but is the slave instead of the master of his feelings.

The above, and a thousand such rambling thoughts floated through my mind at a season of all others the most likely to suggest them. We never learn the value of any of the familiar, every-day blessings of our lives till we are deprived of them. So, at least, I found it the other night, when the close, oppressive, steaming heat, the ill-humoured mosquitoes it produces in all nervous people, and the warlike music of an army of mosquitoes, trumpeting incessantly in my ear, combined to "murder sleep." It was no use to try to deceive myself into forgetfulness of these miseries and fall asleep in an unguarded moment, as it were; so I flung out of bed in despair. I seated myself at the chamber-window to see if I could not entice some stray zephyr to visit my feverish cheek. It was one of those nights, so common at this season, when the moon seems to have to force her way through the darkness, and her light is subdued and broken by the masses of clouds through which she is slowly struggling—far more picturesque and poetical in my eyes, at least, than when she pours forth an universal flood of radiance that leaves no shadow to soften it. Not a breath of air was stirring. The river was beneath me, unruffled as a mirror—the vessels lay lazy and motionless on its waveless surface, and the idle sail drooped heavily against the mast. The warm exhalations from the heated earth threw a veil of mist over the distant hills, whose eternal summits were lost and confounded in the heavy overhanging clouds. There was not a sound, not a motion to break the universal repose of nature; no song of bird, no hum of insect, no bending of a leaf, no passing of a breeze—all was a languid, death-like stillness. I fancied myself in the drowsy world of sleep which poets have dreamed

—where careless Quiet lies
Wrapt in eternal silence.

I was the only waking being in a hushed and motionless universe. Sleep had fled from my own eyes for that night, but never did I feel her power and visible presence so deeply.

So naturally is the idea of sleep connected with that of death, that I will venture to say no person has ever looked long on one without turning in thought to the other. I love to do so—and in such fancies I feel no gloomy misanthropy, I find no cause for desponding sorrow. I love to look on "the enemy of all living" as akin to the gentle power which visits us in mercy every night, bringing rest to the weary, and respite to the afflicted. Sleep is the sister of death, yet the nurse of life and mother of refreshment; so too the destroyer of mankind is the giver of rest and the guide to immortality. As I have stood, ere now, by the side of some cherub early translated to heaven, the thought has flitted across my mind—"And what though this is death instead of sleep, and this little flower, instead of closing as it was wont, to unfold again with the morning sun, has shut its bud and drooped its tender head for ever? It is not therefore the less lovely, nor the less to be loved. It is calm and smiling as though its eyes were to open again to-morrow and laugh to meet its mother's welcoming kiss. Here is nothing terrible, nothing revolting,

"Beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in its lips and in its cheeks,
And death's pale flag is not advanced there."

And can we not trace the likeness still farther? Why always dwell on the dark rather than the bright side of the picture—on the present night rather than the coming day—on the painful lying down rather than the glorious awakening? When shall we feel the full force of the touching language of scripture, and, strong in faith and triumphant in hope, learn to think of the dead as of "those that are fallen asleep?" For myself, fanciful, extravagant as I may be called, I firmly believe that for this, among other wise and gracious purposes, was sleep given unto man: that he might see in its placid beauty a softened copy of the strong torpor of dissolution; that in the grim face of the destroyer he might trace the welcome features of an early friend, and that the weak, wavering, trembling mortal might, when summoned hence, instead of shuddering at the untried world before him, close his eyes for the last time as quietly as when on his familiar pillow he "laid down to pleasant dreams."

PARVULUS.

ABSENTEEISM.

Among the number of most moving articles that have been annually perpetrated in commemoration of the discomforts of hot weather, none has yet been written upon that one, which, of all others, is to me the most afflicting—I mean the general absence of friends, which, with many minor evils, summer after summer inflicts upon us youth whom slenderly provided wallets (purses are unknown in these degenerate days of bank-notes and shin-paper) or the tyranny and selfishness of senior partners condemn to all the horrors of stay-at-home-iveness during the forbidden months—horrors rendered doubly horrible by the fact that the very business, to attend to which we are forced to stay behind, when every creature we can care for is off to the Springs, or the Mountain, or some cool watering place, is itself not less susceptible to the dire effects of heat and an attenuated population, than our own unfortunate flesh and blood, and rapidly dwindles away, until at the end of the first week of our involuntary solitude we have not even the poor consolation of having staid to any possible purpose, to console us in our loneliness, or occupy the tedious hours that hang so heavily upon our sun-burned and mosquito-bitten haunts.

My own unfortunate destiny has made me the young partner of an old and money-making lawyer, who thinks of nothing, cares for nothing but business and the emoluments thereof during eleven months of the year, and on the first day of the twelfth, which for my sins is this unlucky moon of August, he invariably absconds with his whole household, bag and baggage, scrip and scrippage, and leaves me to the solitary concoction of narrs, pleas, and demurrers, and to do the honours of the office to our clients in his absence. For a day or two all goes on as comfortably as man could desire. The usual number of visitors does not sensibly diminish, and my time is pleasantly enough employed in thinking over and arranging the various matters to be attended to before the return of the principal. By the end of the first week, however, a serious change comes "o'er the spirit of my dream;" morning calls grow brief "and far between;" my little arrangements are completed for the transaction of such business as was in progress before the advent of the idle season, and experience has long since taught me not to expect any of more recent origin.

In the meantime the heat comes on, and friends go off with frightful rapidity; cold comfort is a great desideratum; the office assumes the character of an oven, and men and women become involuntary rivals of Monsieur Chaubert in the art of enduring enormously elevated temperatures. Evening is sighed for by thousands of unhappy beings, who look forward to it as their only refuge from utter annihilation; and the belief in the oriental definition of happiness, to wit, shade and tranquillity, finds many supporters. An end is put to every ordinary pursuit of enjoyment; theatres are closed, or ought to be, for within their walls martyrdom is of easy attainment. Study is out of the question—the exhausted mind retains scarcely sufficient energy to be conscious of its own existence and identity, and the sight of a book, unless it be an essay upon ice, is not to be tolerated. Now are our hearts literally warmed towards our friends, and our bosoms glow with unwonted fires; yet a cool reception from any body would be most welcome; and comfort (alas, how evanescent!) is to be found only in ice-creams and soda-water.

For myself, I am a man of large acquaintance, but my friends are few. I know at least two thirds of the people that I meet in the course of my journeys about town, so far as to be under the necessity of manipulating my beaver, when I encounter them, and of giving utterance to the expression of a civil and exceedingly sincere anxiety touching their own healths and those of their wives, children, and connexions to the forty-seventh generation; but the circle of my visiting intimacy is peculiarly limited; to atone for this, however, the few with whom I do consort in my pleasant hours of freedom from legal bustle and anxiety, are dear to me in exact proportion to the smallness of their number, and as a necessary consequence, an evening is seldom allowed by me to pass away uncheered by the society of those precious few upon whom I have bestowed all the affection that I have to give. With one family in particular I have been for more years than it is necessary to mention, upon terms of the most intimate, unceremonious, and delightful intercourse, and for every member of that cherished household I feel the deepest and most pure attachment. I have learned to seek and to expect no pleasure that is not shared with them; and indeed so long have I been accustomed to their participation in my enjoyments, that unless they are present the very sources of enjoyment seem dried up; the fountain will not flow except at their bidding. Whatever may be the fatigue, or vexation, or anxiety that I am compelled to undergo throughout the day, in the pursuit of my heartless, passionless, soul-consuming profession, when evening comes it is all forgotten, and I listen to their music, partake of their amusements, or join their converse, with a heart as light and spirits as free from care as though the returning sun were not to shine upon the repetition of those same fatigues and vexations and anxieties; such is the course of my life until this fatal month of August comes to mar my joys; for with July they too depart—and their hospitable mansion, the scene of all my pleasures, is deserted till September.

From the moment of their evasion I fall an unresisting prey to the direst of fiends that exists in these unimaginative days, ennui, whose character and attributes, though not his name, are decidedly English; my evenings become something worse than mere voids, for imagination is busy in conjuring up possible pleasures, which yet are, alas! not practicable. When the burden and heat of the day are past, I ensconce myself sadly in my silent and solitary domicile, the habitual dullness of which the pleasant voice of friendship never comes to disturb and to enliven; upon my entrance I hastily throw off every disposable garment; boots are kicked in one direction, coat and waistcoat flung pettishly in another, and with a profound sigh of mingled regret and satisfaction I resign my body to my reading chair, and myself to my destiny. Sometimes, with a desperate effort of courage, I take down a book from the shelves of my well filled library, but blood heat is unfriendly to the acquisition of knowledge; anon, I open my piano, and elicit from it only the fact that exercise and the keys are unpleasantly warm; or turn over a portfolio of prints, but my languid faculties are proof against their impressions. Then fancy, whose activity even the ardours of the dog-days are unable to subdue, betakes herself to her habitual vagaries, and conjures up before me various lovely scenes of unattainable pleasure, which, with their tormenting contrast to the actual state of things, but serve to plunge me still deeper in the bluest of miseries. My reveries run only upon cool breezes and flowing streams, and the shade of mighty trees, and the ripple of vast waters. I am rambling with my regretted friends through narrow and devious lanes, such as are only to be found "remote from cities," carpeted with verdure, and overshadowed by forest giants, between whose thick foliage no dreaded sunbeam can force its burning way. Fresh blackberries, whose jetty lustre has a most inviting air of frigidity, and gives promise of grateful moisture to the parched palate, gem the hedges upon either side of us, provoking frequent pauses in our aimless course; the balmy airs of heaven sweep gently over our glowing but happy faces, bearing health and enjoyment on their wings; at times we rest upon some rustic bridge, to watch the pellucid waters as they glide beneath, and envy the white-headed, sunburned, country urchins, whose feet, innocent as yet of Wellingtons and prunella, are cooling in the glassy stream.

In some shady orchard there is no doubt a swing, to which, when evening hovers near, we all resort, and loud and hearty laughter tells the amusement it affords us; in the country it is not too hot to laugh. The spacious barn floor, neatly swept, supplies us with a rustic ball-room, and the buoyancy of our spirits easily provides a substitute for the violins and clarionets of Benoit and his band;—in the country it is not too hot even to dance; and there, every thing ministers to mirth and good humour. Wagons and horses, and pleasant places wherein to ride, are not wanting; nor yet boats and fishing implements for those who, in the words of honest Isaac, "will walk uprightly, and fear God, and be quiet, and go an angling." Imagination pictures to me a majestic hill, yet easy of ascent, from whose top the pleased eye commands an extensive prospect, embracing sea and shore; the distant landscape spotted with comfortable looking farm-houses, and here and there a mill, or modest spire of some quiet country church; turn in this direction, and watch the white sails of those lazy barks that seem like citizens just escaped from the hot streets and scorching pavements of the town, so slow and languid is their motion—and look! here comes, but yet afar off, a loaded steamer, ploughing the still waters, and heaving her huge bulk along as though inaction were a torment—and when darkness spreads her mantle over the earth, what joy it is to stroll along with those we love, and gaze upon the bright and happy stars as they come twinkling forth from their biding places, where throughout the day they have sought shelter from the glare of the fierce sun. See there! a flood of soft and silvery radiance just rising from beyond the ocean's dark horizon, ushers on the queen of night, the cold but lovely moon, who comes to cheer the hearts of bashful lovers, and to set poet's brains a maddening, and light us reasonable people on our way home to supper; for here it is not too hot to eat. And when the cheerful meal is ended, there is music to beguile the time; guitars and flutes and sweet voices, happily are portable—or, if inclination prompt, a ramble on the beach in the light of the now high-careering moon is pleasant, and still more pleasant the low silvery tones of her whose lovely arm is resting within mine, and whose words are so full of kindness and confidence and happiness. Our talk is of by-gone years—of childhood's sinless pleasures, and remembrances of friends who once shared those pleasures with us, and whose hearts are now cold in death—but they are not forgotten; and we feel that such discourse is indeed "pleasant but mournful to the soul." Our moonlight walk is prolonged deep into the night, and when at length the wearied frame, and the heart and head exhausted even by much enjoyment, demand repose, hands are affectionately clasped, and gentle voices breathe the kindly "good night, good night," in tones that tell how pure that enjoyment has been found, and promise its renewal on the morrow—and I awake from my reverie to find myself alone—the hapless occupant of a dreary solitude, from which there is no escape; ah me! how desolate it is—I grow weary of the world and of myself—and I could moralize upon the vanity of earthly pleasures, but it is far too warm for wisdom, or for sleep. Health of the city.—The bills of mortality, which a few weeks since were swelled out to a fearful amount, have resumed their wonted limits, and the public fears for the ill consequences of excessive heat have already begun to subside. The city has never enjoyed a greater share of general health than during the present summer. Particular families have, indeed, suffered from the visitation of diseases incident to the season, but the cases have all been of a purely sporadic character. This fortunate exemption, while it is a source of sincere congratulation, should not lull us into a fatal security, or induce careless habits. The fall is rapidly approaching, when the great heat of noon-day is succeeded by the damp chill of evening, and the body, predisposed by the previous relaxation of the summer months, is peculiarly liable to be excited into diseased action. Peculiar attention to clothing and diet is now imperiously required. Green fruits—the foolish representations of some newspaper scribblers to the contrary notwithstanding—should be religiously forbidden to all classes, more especially to children; in short, moderation in every enjoyment should be observed by those who wish to ward off the attacks of sickness and the visits of physicians.

Colonel Marinus Willet.—This veteran officer of the revolution died on Sunday, the twenty-third instant, in the ninety-first year of his age. On Tuesday his remains were deposited in their final resting-place, with civil and military honours, attended by a vast concourse of citizens, with numerous friends and relatives, who better knew the worth, and of course more deeply felt the deprivation which all lamented. The character of the deceased needs not the feeble eulogy of our pen. His biography is inseparably interwoven with the history of our country's glory.

RULER OF THIS AWFUL HOUR!

Miscellany.

SENSIBILITY OF GENIUS.—There are several instances on record—says the Onondaga Register—where unmerited and unjust criticism—an insensibility to the first efforts of genius, or a total disregard and wanton contempt of some of the holiest feelings of our natures, have caused the premature death of the individuals attacked. Not to mention Lycambes, the Greek, who died in consequence of the torrent of sarcasm poured upon him from the pen of the satirist, Archilocus, we have two instances in our own times, of a similar result. A few years since, Mr. John Edwin, the comedian, while performing at Dublin, was attacked with the greatest causticity by an anonymous writer. The effect on the player was fatal—he never recovered from the shock his spirits had received—he continued to droop like a wounded man, until he sunk to his grave. The cause of his death is mentioned on the marble that covers his remains. The celebrated poet, Keates, the author of Endymion, and some of the sweetest poetry in the English language, furnishes another example. When "Endymion" was published, it was reviewed in the London Quarterly with much the same feeling of malignant rejoicing which actuates the savage when enjoying the torment of the victim at the stake. The article was most vindictive, and poor Keates was, as every one knows who has read that work, tomahawked and scalped. The poet's sensitive feelings could not surmount the ungenerous assault; his health failed him, he went to Italy; and when at Rome, on his death-bed, his friend desired to know what inscription should be placed on his tomb, he replied—"None but this: Here lies one whose name was writ in water." Had not the indomitable pride of Byron come to his aid, the attack of the Edinburgh Review on his first effort would have extinguished him forever. Fortunately his obstinacy was equal to their audacity, and his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" turned the tables at once in his favour.

A STATESMAN'S DUTY.—The first duty of a statesman is to build up the moral energy of the people. This is his first interest; and he who weakens it inflicts an injury which no talent can repair; nor should any splendour of services, or any momentary success, avert from him the infamy which he has earned. Let public men learn to think more reverently of their function. Let them feel that they are touching more vital interests than property. Let them fear nothing so much as to sap the moral convictions of a people, by unrighteous legislation or a selfish policy. Let them cultivate in themselves the spirit of religion and virtue, as the first requisite to public station. Let no apparent advantage to the community, any more than to themselves, seduce them to the infraction of any moral law. Let them put faith in virtue as the strength of nations. Let them not be disheartened by temporary ill success in upright exertion. Let them remember that while they and their contemporaries live but for a day, the state is to live for ages, and that time, the unerring arbiter, will vindicate the wisdom, as well as the magnanimity of the public man, who, confiding in the power of truth, justice, and philanthropy, asserts their claims and reverently follows their monitions, amidst general disloyalty and corruption.

EGYPTIAN WOMEN.—The groups of women going to fetch water, form a striking feature in the scenery of the Nile. Thirty or forty of them are frequently seen walking in single file, and at regular distances, to and from the river, each with a jar on her head, and another on the palm of her hand. From the necessity of preserving their balance in this mode of carrying burdens, to which they are from their childhood habituated, those Egyptian peasants acquire a firmness and grace of step which we scarcely see excelled in the saloons of polished cities. Their erect attitude, simple drapery, and slim figures, increased in apparent height by the pitchers on their heads give them, at a distance, a very classical appearance; but if you approach the Naiads, you find them pale, dingy, and emaciated. This opportunity, however, very seldom occurs; for whenever a turn in the river, or any accidental circumstance, brings you suddenly upon them, they muffle up their faces in their dress, and retreat as hastily as possible.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1880.

NUMBER 9.

View of a section of Ann and Nassau streets—taken from the south corner.

Drawn by Davis and engraved by Anderson, expressly for this work.

THE above view represents, in a bold and accurate sketch, a portion of this city, which, though one of the most ancient, will scarcely be recognised by those who have not visited it for even a few months past. A nest of rookeries which were very offensive to the eye, have given place to several lofty and commodious edifices, occupying a site which, comparatively neglected before, has now become the resort of busy throngs, and hourly presents an animated and lively scene. To the left of the picture on Ann-street are seen the Franklin buildings, recently erected by Messrs. James Conner and Charles Starr, and occupied as offices, stores, &c. On the corner of this range is the office of the "New-York Mirror," a circumstance which, while it has not influenced us in our selection of a subject for the present engraving, will, we hope, not fail to be useful in designating our location to our distant friends. To the right is Nassau-street. Next to the Franklin buildings are three dwelling-houses of ordinary size, finely relieved by the spacious building of the "American Bible Society." To this succeeds a vacant lot, soon to be improved; next follows the magnificent structure, just finished, and intended to be appropriated to the use of scientific, literary, and commercial institutions, called "Clinton Hall." Beyond this are seen a part of the church-yard and prayer-room of the Brick Meeting, the spire of which rises aloft above the hall last named. The back ground is occupied by a distant view of the Public School-house in Chatham-street, a small section of the Park, and that darling of the corporation—the City Hall. The execution of the whole design reflects the highest credit on the artists, whom we are happy to acknowledge as natives and fellow-citizens.

POPULAR VILLAGE TALES.

THE TWO SISTERS.

BY MISS MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

THE pretty square farm-house, standing at the corner where Kibes-lane crosses the brook, or the brook crosses Kibes-lane, (for the first phrase, although giving by far the closest picture of the place, does, it must be confessed, look rather Irish, and where the aforesaid brook winds away by the side of another lane, until it spreads into a river-like dignity, as it meanders through the sunny plain of Hartley common, and finally disappears amidst the green recesses of "Inge Wood"—that pretty square farm-house, half hidden by the tall elms in the flower court before it, which, with the spacious garden and orchard behind, and the extensive barn-yards and out-buildings, so completely occupies one of the angles formed by the crossing of the lane and the stream—that pretty farm-house contains one of the happiest and most prosperous families in Aberleigh, the large and thriving family of farmer Evans.

Whether from skill or good fortune, or as is most probable, from a lucky mixture of both, every thing goes right in his great farm. His crops are the best in the parish; his hay is never spoiled; his cattle never die; his servants never thieve; his children are never ill. He buys cheap, and sells dear; money gathers about him like a snow-ball; and yet, in spite of all this provoking and intolerable prosperity, every body loves farmer Evans. He is so hospitable, so good natured, so generous—so homely! There, after all, lies the charm. Riches have not only not spoiled the man, but they have not altered him. He is just the same in look, and word, and way, that he was thirty years ago, when he and his wife, with two sorry horses, one cow, and three pigs, began the world at Dean-gate, a little bargain of twenty acres, two miles off; ay, and his wife is the same woman! the same frugal, tidy, industrious, good-natured Mrs. Evans, so noted for her activity of tongue and limb, her good looks, and her plain dressing; as frugal, as good-natured, as active, and as plain dressing a Mrs. Evans at forty-five as she was at nineteen, and, in a different way, almost as good looking.

Their children—six "boys," as farmer Evans promiscuously calls them, whose ages vary from eight to eight and twenty—and three girls, two grown up, and one not yet seven, the youngest of the family, are just what might be expected from parents so simple and so good. The young men, intelligent and well conducted; the boys, docile and promising; and the little girl as pretty a curly-headed, rosy-cheeked poppet as ever was the pet and plaything of a large family. It is, however, with the eldest daughters that we have to do.

Jane and Fanny Evans were as much alike as hath often befallen any two sisters not born at one time—for in the matter of twin children there has been a series of puzzles ever since the days of the Dromios. Nearly of an age, (I believe that at this moment both are turned of nineteen, and neither have reached twenty) exactly of a stature, (so high that Frederick would have coveted them for wives for his tall regiment)—with hazel eyes, large mouths, full lips, white teeth, brown hair, clear healthy complexions, and that sort of nose which is neither Grecian nor Roman, nor aquiline, nor le petit nez retroussé that some persons prefer to them all; but a nose which, moderately prominent, and sufficiently well shaped, is yet, as far as I know, anonymous, although it be perhaps as common and as well looking a feature as is to be seen on an English face.

Altogether, they were a pair of tall and comely maidens, and being constantly attired in garments of the same colour and fashion, looked at all times so much alike, that no stranger ever dreamed of knowing them apart; and even their acquaintances were rather accustomed to think and speak of them generally as "the Evans's" than as the separate individuals, Jane and Fanny. Even those who did pretend to distinguish the one from the other, were not exempt from mistakes, which the sisters, Fanny especially, who delighted in the fun so often produced by the unusual resemblance, were apt to favour by changing places in a walk, or, slipping from one side to the other at a country tea-party, or playing a hundred innocent tricks to occasion at once a grave blunder, and a merry laugh.

Old Tabitha Goodwin for instance, who being rather purblind, was jealous of being suspected of seeing less clearly than her neighbours, and had defied even the Evans's to puzzle her discernment—seeking in vain on Fanny's hand the cut finger which she had dressed on Jane's, ascribed the incredible cure to the merits of her own incomparable salve, and could hardly be undeceived, even by the pulling off of Jane's glove, and the exhibition of the lacerated digital sewed round by her own bandage.

Young George Bailey too, the greatest beau in the parish, having betted at a Christmas party that he would dance with every pretty girl in the room, lost his wager (which Fanny had overheard) by that saucy dame's slipping into her sister's place, and persuading her to join her own unconscious partner; so that George danced twice with Fanny and not at all with Jane. A flattering piece of malice, which proved, as the young gentleman (a rustic exquisite of the first water) was pleased to assert, that Miss Fanny was not displeased with her partner. How little does a vain man know of womankind! If she had liked him, she would not have played the trick for the mines of Golconda.

In short, from their school days, when Jane was chidden for Fanny's bad work, and Fanny slapped for Jane's bad spelling, down to this their prime of womanhood, there had been no end to the confusion produced by this remarkable instance of family likeness.

And yet nature, who sets some mark of individuality upon even her meanest productions, making some unnoted difference between the lambs from one ewe, the robins bred in one nest, the flowers growing on one stalk; and the leaves hanging from one tree, had not left these young maidens without one great and permanent distinction—a natural and striking dissimilarity of temper. Equally industrious, affectionate, happy, and kind; each was kind, happy, affectionate, and industrious in a different way. Jane was grave; Fanny was gay. If you heard a laugh or song, be sure it was Fanny; she who smiled, for certain was Fanny; she who jumped the stile, when her sister opened the gate, was Fanny; she who chased the pigs from the garden as merrily as if she were running a race, so that the very pigs did not mind her, was Fanny.

On the other hand, she that so carefully was making, with its own ravelled threads, an invisible darn in her mother's handkerchief, and hearing her little sister read the while; she that so patiently was feeding, one by one, two broods of young turkeys; she that so pensively was watering her own bed of delicate and somewhat rare plants; the pale stars of the Alpine pink, or the alabaster blossoms of the white evening primrose, whose modest flowers, dying off into a blush, resembled her own character, was Jane.

Some of the gossips of Aberleigh used to assert, that Jane's sighing over the flowers, as well as the early steadiness of her character, arose from an engagement to my lord's head gardener, an intelligent, sedate, and sober young Scotchman. Of this I know nothing. Certain it is, that the prettiest and newest plants were always to be found in Jane's little flower border; and if Mr. Archibald Maclane did sometimes come to look after them, I do not see that it was any business of anybody's.

In the meantime, a visitor of a different description arrived at the farm. A cousin of Mrs. Evans's had been as successful in trade as her husband had been in agriculture, and he had now sent his only son to become acquainted with his relations, and to spend some weeks in their family.

Charles Foster was a fine young man, whose father was neither more nor less than a rich linen-draper in a great town; but whose manners, education, mind, and character, might have done honour to a far higher station. He was, in a word, one of nature's gentlemen; and in nothing did he more thoroughly show his own taste and good breeding, than by entering entirely into the homely ways and old-fashioned habits of his country cousins. He was delighted with the simplicity, frugality, and industry, which blended well with the sterling goodness and genuine abundance of the great English farmhouse. The young women especially pleased him much. They formed a strong contrast with any thing that he had met with before. No finery! no coquetry! no French! no piano! It is impossible to describe the sensation of relief and comfort with which Charles Foster, sick of musical misses, ascertained that the whole dwelling did not contain a single instrument, except the bassoon, on which George Evans was wont, every Sunday at church, to excruciate the ears of the whole congregation. He liked both sisters. Jane's softness and considerateness engaged his full esteem; but Fanny's innocent playfulness suited best with his own high spirits and animated conversation. He had known them apart from the first; and indeed he denied that the likeness was at all puzzling, or more than is usual between sisters, and secretly thought Fanny as much prettier than her sister as she was avowedly merrier. In doors and out, he was constantly at her side; and before he had been a month in the house, all its inmates had given Charles Foster, as a lover, to his young cousin; and she, when rallied on the subject cried fie! and pshaw! and wondered how people could talk such nonsense, and liked to have such nonsense talked to her better than any thing in the world.

Affairs were in this state, when one night Jane appeared even graver and more thoughtful than usual, and far, far, sadder. She sighed deeply; and Fanny, for the two sisters shared the same little room, inquired tenderly, "What ailed her?" The inquiry seemed to make Jane worse. She burst into tears, whilst Fanny hung over her, and soothed her. At length she roused herself by a strong effort; and turning away from her affectionate comforter, said in a low tone: "I have had a great vexation to-night, Fanny; Charles Foster has asked me to marry him."

"Charles Foster! Did you say Charles Foster?" asked poor Fanny, trembling, unwilling even to trust her own senses against the evidence of her heart; "Charles Foster?"

"Yes, our cousin, Charles Foster."

"And you have accepted him?" inquired Fanny in a hoarse voice.

"Oh no! no! Do you think I have forgotten poor Archibald? Besides I am not the person whom he ought to have asked to marry him; false and heartless as he is. I would not be his wife; cruel, unfeeling, unmanly as his conduct has been! No! not if he could make me queen of England!"

"You refused him then?"

"No, my father met us suddenly, just as I was recovering from the surprise and indignation that at first struck me dumb. But I shall refuse him most certainly—the false, deceitful, ungrateful, villain!"

"My dear father! He will be disappointed. So will my mother."

"They will both be disappointed, and both angry—but not at my refusal. Oh, how they will despise him!" added Jane; and poor Fanny, melted by her sister's sympathy, and touched by an indignation most unusual in that mild and gentle girl, could no longer command her feelings, but flung herself on the bed in that agony of passion and grief, which the first great sorrow seldom fails to excite in a young heart.

After a while she resumed the conversation. "We must not blame him too severely Jane. Perhaps my vanity made me think his attentions meant more than they really did, and you had all taken up the notion. But you must not speak of him so unkindly. He has done nothing but what is natural. You are so much wiser, and better than I am, my own dear Jane! He laughed and talked with me; but he felt your goodness—and he was right. I was never worthy of him, and you are; and if it were not for Archibald, I should rejoice from the bottom of my heart," continued Fanny, sobbing, "if you would accept!"—but unable to finish her generous wish, she burst into a fresh flow of tears; and the sisters, mutually and strongly affected, wept in each other's arms, and were comforted.

That night Fanny cried herself to sleep; but such sleep is of short duration. Before dawn she was up, and pacing, with restless irritability, the dewy grass-walks of the garden and orchard. In less than half an hour, a light elastic step (she knew the sound well!) came rapidly behind her; a hand, (oh, how often had she thrilled at the touch of that hand!) tried to draw hers under his own; whilst a well-known voice addressed her in the softest and tenderest accents: "Fanny, my own sweet Fanny! have you thought of what I said to you last night?"

"To me?" replied Fanny with bitterness.

"Ay, to be sure, to your own dear self! Do you not remember the question I asked you, when your good father, for the first time unwelcome, joined us so suddenly that you had no time to say, yes? And will you not say yes now?"

"Mr. Foster!" replied Fanny, with some spirit, "you are under a mistake here. It was to Jane that you made a proposal yesterday evening; and you are taking me for her at this moment."

"Mistake you for your sister! Propose to Jane! Incredible! Impossible! You are jesting."

"Then he mistook Jane for me, last night; and he is no deceiver!" thought Fanny to herself, as with smiles beaming brightly through her tears, she turned round at his reiterated prayers, and yielded the hand he sought to his pressure. "He mistook her for me! He, that defied us to perplex him!"

And so it was: an unconscious and unobserved change of place, as either sister resumed her station beside little Betsy, who had scampered away after a glow worm, added to the deepening twilight, and the lovers' natural embarrassment, had produced the confusion which gave poor Fanny a night's misery, to be compensated by a lifetime of happiness. Jane was almost as glad to lose a lover as her sister was to regain one; Charles is gone home to his father's to make preparations for his bride; Archibald has taken a great nursery garden, and there is some talk in Aberleigh that the two sisters will be married on the same day.

MY CHILDHOOD'S HOME.

BY MRS. NORTON.

I have tasted each varied pleasure,
And drunk of the cup of delight;
I have danced to the gayest measure
In the halls of dazzling light;
I have dwelt in a blaze of splendour,
And stood in the courts of kings;
I have snatched at each toy that could render
More rapid the flight of time's wings.
But vainly I've sought for joy or peace,
In that life of light and shade;
And I turn with a sigh to my own dear home—
The home where my childhood played.

When jewels are sparkling round me,
And dazzling with their rays,
I weep for the ties that bound me
In life's first early days.
I sigh for one of the sunny hours,
Ere day was turned to night;
For one of my nosegays of fresh wild flowers,
Instead of my jewels bright.
I weep when I gaze on the scentless buds
Which never can bloom or fade;
And I turn with a sigh to those gay green fields—
The home where my childhood played.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

ROBIN DES BOIS.

WEBER's opera of Der Freischütz being announced in the affiche of the French company for Friday the twenty-seventh instant, we found ourselves present.

The inhabitants of La terre de la beauté et de la gloire, as Frenchmen term their native land, (and far be it from us to question the justice of their title), have an original and highly amusing way of thinking on most subjects. No undertaking which arises in other countries, however grand the conception and happy the execution of it may be, is thought by a true bred son of Gallia to be perfect, until it has been revised and altered by a native Parisian, and received the stamp of public approbation in the metropolis of France. The drama is a striking proof of the justice of our observation. Shakespeare, when represented to a French audience in their own tongue, not only has his blank verse turned into rhyme, but suffers mutilation to a vast extent, before he can please "la grande nation;" nay, so fond are they in Paris of their own particular arrangements, that no drama receives more applause than the one which presents to them Henry the fifth of England and the Lord Rochester as boon companions! It is considered a matter of no importance, that one lived some centuries before the other; they are both agreeable personages, and a fig for dates. The opera called Robin des Bois is another instance of extraordinary caprice.

At the time Der Freischütz appeared in England with great éclat, (for its previous existence in Germany was unnoticed by all but Germans,) Sir Walter Scott's novels happened to be the rage in Paris. Plaid dresses were the only dresses of the ladies, and every thing must be Scotch to meet with approbation. Der Freischütz, with its train of foresters and horrors, was very vulgarly German; and Monsieur Rosbif had adhered vulgarly but strictly to the text, in bringing out the opera in London.* Under these circumstances what could be done?

The idea of introducing a German fiend into good society at the time when Scotch bogies were all the go, was scouted as preposterous; accordingly they dragged Zamiel "far from his native fields," the Hartz mountains or the Black forest, the only spots in Europe congenial to such a gentleman-like German devil, and stripping off his fiery mantle and red countenances, they forced him to figure in a kilt with no continuations, to his utter dismay and consternation, and in opposition to all sense of decency. There wanted but one addition to this. Zamiel's appearance should have been marked by the bagpipe instead of the trombone, and then the arrangement would have been beyond all criticism.

The following are the dramatic persons of Robin des Bois: Robin des Bois le Chasseur noir, alias Zamiel; Tony garde Chasse, alias Adolph; Richard garde Chasse, alias Caspar; Reynold Forrester de Lord Wentworth, alias Bernard, head ranger; Dick Payson, alias Kilian; Anna Fille de Reynold, alias Linda; Nancy, cousine d'Anna, alias Rose.

From the above it will be perceived that the foresters of the original piece under the head ranger, are converted in this opera into under game-keepers, of whom the chief is head keeper in the employ of a Lord Wentworth. Now Scotland certainly has given birth to as many pleasing monsters as the fancy of both English and Scotch bards unitedly have been able to invent; but beginning with Shakespeare, and his broom-mounted hags, and ending with Sir Walter Scott, these unearthly persons have consisted merely of warlocks, bogies, brownies, kelpies, and "the good people," totally dissimilar in nature to the dreadful Zamiel, the powerful Faustus, and those creations which are solely German; in short, the very air of Scotland is by association hostile to such demons; and the music of Scotland, and Scotch habits are not favourable to their migrating from Germany to the land of cakes. In this instance the mania for making every thing Scotch has contributed to ruin Weber's opera. One of the most marked features in the piece is the union of the music with the plot. The scene is laid in Germany, and the music is strictly national, even to their waltz. How ridiculous, then, must it appear to give that dance as the national dance of Scotland—and yet so it is given; in short, the bad taste of the affair is perceptible, and we shall add no more to prove it, but proceed to the music. The overture was well played: an addition was made to the orchestra of two horns and a clarinet, the latter to supply the place of

* When Weber was engaged in England to compose the opera of Oberon, he witnessed the performance of Der Freischütz at Drury-lane theatre, and expressed himself highly delighted at the manner in which it was got up, and refused to alter it in any one particular. It is needless to add, that it differs in every respect from the French an instrument but little known in America, yet essential to the compositions of Weber and Rosini; we allude to the hautboy. As regards the various morceaux which follow, we are compelled in truth to state, that from beginning to end the sentiment of the author was mistaken both by band and vocalists, the time being always immoderately fast; in the great tenor song this was peculiarly perceptible, but still it is but justice to add, that in Paris the same fault exists.

In the performance of this song in Germany and England, Zamiel is introduced, prowling round Adolph, and disappears on the latter's appeal to heaven. Weber has written the music expressly with that view, and he superintended minutely, and fixed the places where the demon should make his entrée and crit. The French abolish this appearance of Zamiel, and consequently ruin the effect of the song. In Hamlet they will not permit the ghost to appear; but if this be susceptible of argument as regards Shakespeare, the precedent has no force in the case of Der Freischütz. Of the incantation scene also we bitterly complain. The music written by Weber to certain business on the stage, must be lost if that business be removed; but this is done remorselessly; they cast no bullets, they chant no incantation, but hurry through the scene with a chorus of devils, by which means the music is converted into an unmeaning jargon of sounds. Be it known to the very few who are ignorant of the fact, that every word and action in that scene, whether the fixing of the skulls, the incantation chant, the melting of the lead, or the appearance of Zamiel, is progressively marked by music, which can never be equalled, as applied to the subject—but removed from that subject, is absolute chaos. This violation of the author is kept up to the end of the opera. The beautiful chorus in conclusion is omitted; likewise they omit the unrivalled quintette, in five sharps; and the hunter's chorus is introduced a second time as a finale.

For the neat execution of French opera, by the combined talents of the troupe and the excellence of their band, we have the highest respect. Where the sentiments or the characters are strictly French, as in Le Maçon and La Fiancée, by Auber, their exertions call for, and have our warmest admiration. We even go further, La Gazza ladra of Rossini was executed with fidelity to the text, if not brilliancy; and the overture better than we ever heard it in America. In conclusion, should they even destroy by carelessness or want of talent those pieces which we have praised, we could only return a verdict off-fide de se; but when we witness Weber prostrate, shorn of his strength, like Samson, and mutilated by more than Philistine cruelty, we charge them with murder under trust, and hold it to be our duty to lift up our voices and protest against the same.

IL FANATICO AND CO.

THE FINE ARTS.

THOUGH THE NIGHT STAR BE HIGH.

The melody, given on the last page, is sure to please every class of readers. From want of room we have been obliged to omit the andante movement to which these words belong:

Oh Araby! dear Araby!
My own, my native land!
Methought I cross'd the dark blue sea,
And trod again thy strand.
And there I saw my father's tent
Beneath the tall date-trees,
And the sound of lute and merriment
Came sweetly on the breeze.
And thus to the lightly touch'd guitar
I heard a maiden tell
Of one who died from a proud Serdar,
With the youth she loved so well:
Al, al, al, al, al, &c.

Fatima, the confidential slave of Reiza, a lively soubrette, of course following the example of her mistress, falls in love with Sherasmin, the faithful squire of Sir Huon of Bourdeaux, and she accompanies her mistress in her elopement from the court with that knight. This beautiful song is addressed by Fatima to Sherasmin: it is full of fire, and, as originally sung in London by Madame Vestris, elicited the greatest applause, and a nightly encore. Mrs. Sharpe acted Fatima at the Park theatre, and executed the music with that good intonation and propriety which marks her as a most useful personage in opera, and this song lies well within the compass of her voice. On this composition Mr. Alexander Lee, with other industrious musical insects of the present day, has founded a species of ballad which generally pleases the multitude. The song, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," and a score of others, may be traced to this source; not that they are actual plagiarisms, but originality of idea is not among their attributes. We have now nearly redeemed our pledge to the worthy editor of the Mirror, having arrived at the last but one of our selections from Oberon, and we are almost tempted to hope that the specimens of the great composer we have furnished are such as may incline our readers to become more familiar with his works.

THE PAINTINGS AT THE ARCADE BATHS.

It is always difficult to give a correct opinion of paintings brought out to this country for sale, claiming to be the best productions of the old masters. It is a fact well understood that these are held in Europe at such prices as could never be obtained on this side the water, or justify running the risk of the market; and every great picture of this kind is registered, and well known. Such a thing as a Raphael or Corregio could scarcely by any possibility find its way hither, except ordered; yet it is but fair to say, on the other hand, that several of the old masters were very prolific, many of them very unequal; and there is a probability that some of them may have painted twice on one subject. All this gives a chance to the collector for occasionally procuring a fine picture. There is a Guido or two, set at a high valuation, and a Rubens claimed for this collection; and references in support of this truth are made to undoubted judges of pictures. That there are several choice articles in the catalogue we have had sufficient evidence from personal inspection, and we would have every one of the dilettanti visit the room, and judge for himself. They could not better dispose of a leisure hour.

PORTRAIT OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH.

Mr. L. D. Chapin, Broadway, has published a lithographic half length likeness of his present Britannic majesty, William the fourth. It is a spirited engraving, and the style of the drawing is highly creditable to the talents of Mr. S. H. Gimber, the designer.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

Sometimes from her eyes I did receive fair speechless messages.—Shaks.

There is a feeling of the heart,
A thought within the bosom's swell,
Which woman's eyes alone impart—
Which woman's blush alone can tell!
Man may be cold in love's disguise,
And feel not half the flame he speaks;
But woman's love is in her eyes,
It glows upon her burning cheeks!

DEATH OF THE CELEBRATED HERBAUT, OF PARIS.—The table talk of the Faubourg St. Germain is at present divided between the bombardment of Algiers and the death of Herbaut. This mighty autocrat of the empire of the milliners is no more! His establishment in Paris is said to have been already purchased by an English company; but the inspiration of Herbaut's genius will be wanting to maintain and extend its triumph in the female world of fashion. From Paris to Persia every prevailing mode during the last ten years has been derived from his invention; the sanctuary of Mahmoud's harem sought its costumes from his temple of the graces; and it is well known that all the leading milliners of London have long entertained a course of telegraphic despatch with this mighty magician—the Sir Walter Scott of the world of satin and tiffany.

Herbaut was originally a hair-dresser to the empress Josephine. On the second marriage of the emperor, he resigned his post at court to the celebrated Plaisir, and opened a splendid Magazine de Modes. Among the domestic arrangements of the mansion was a chamber distinguished as Herbaut's study, and fitted up with pieces of silk, gauze, and ribbon, with flowers and feathers, and every variety of trumpery destined to female adornment. The imaginative artist, who slept in an adjoining room, always kept a lamp burning, that when his dreams were visited with happy inventions and graceful ideas, he might rush into his boudoir and give to these

"Airy nothings,
A silken habitation and a name!"

Nothing would induce the despot of shreds and patches to admit of any interruption to his studies; no exceptions were made in favour of rank; and whenever Madame la Marechale, or Madame la Duchesse presumed to solicit the honour of an audience at an undue hour, the negatives were very positive. "You cannot be admitted. Monsieur Herbaut is at his studies."

LOVE.—Every poet that ever had an existence has written of it—every minstrel has sung of it—and every maid has dreamed of it; but we much doubt (we must own, however, that our own actual knowledge on this point is very superficial) whether all that has been written, sung, and dreamed, comprises more than is compressed into the following stanzas:

"O, love! love! love!
Love's like a dizziness;
It wunna let a pair bodie
Gang about his business."

A BRIEF, BUT COMPREHENSIVE PRAYER.—There is a remarkable couplet amongst the Greek fragments found in Plato, but which seems almost christian in its turn of thought. That thought was never expressed with more brevity or energy than thus:

"Ask'd and unask'd, thy blessings give, O Lord!
The evil that we pray for from us ward!"

ANECDOTE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.—During one of the college vacations he and his brother returned to their father's, in Salisbury. Thinking he had a right to some return for the money he had expended on their education, the father put scythes into their hands and ordered them to mow. Daniel made a few sweeps and then resting his scythe, wiped the sweat from his brow. His father said, "What's the matter, Dan?" "My scythe don't hang right, sir," he answered. His father fixed it and Dan went to work again, but with no better success. Something was the matter with his scythe—and then it was again tinkered—but it was not long before it wanted fixing again, and the father said in a pet, "Well, hang it to suit yourself." Daniel, with great composure, hung it on the next tree; and putting on a grave countenance, said "It hangs very well now; I am perfectly satisfied."

STEAM POWER.—The almost incredible fact is stated that the increase of productive power through the aid of steam and improved mechanism, with other scientific appliances, during the last forty years, is equal to the additional supply of labour of six hundred millions of men!

WEALTH OF THE MERCHANTS OF ANTWERP IN FORMER TIMES.—The city of Antwerp is nearly a semicircle, of about seven miles round. It was defended by the citadel, built by the duke of Alva, to overawe the inhabitants. The whole appearance of its public buildings, streets, and houses, affords the most incontestable evidence of its former splendour. Many instances of the immense wealth of its merchants are recorded: among others, it is said that when Charles V. once dined with one of the chief magistrates, his host, immediately after dinner, threw into the fire a bond for two millions of ducats, which he had received as security for a loan to that monarch, saying, that he was more than repaid by the honour of being permitted to entertain his sovereign.

TEA PARTY.—At a tea party, where some Cantabs happened to be present, after the dish had been handed round, the lady who presided over the tea equipage "hoped the tea was good." "Very good, indeed, madam," was the general reply, till it came to the turn of one of the Cantabs to speak, who, between truth and politeness, shrewdly observed—"That the tea was excellent, but the water was smoky."

SIR WALTER SCOTT.—It is stated that Sir Walter Scott will realize by one moiety of the Waverley novels upwards of sixty-six thousand pounds, and Heath, the engraver, more than twenty thousand pounds by his illustrations of those novels.

KNOWLEDGE THE SOURCE OF ELOQUENCE.—What we know thoroughly we usually express clearly, since ideas will supply words, but words will not always supply ideas. We have heard a common blacksmith eloquent when welding of iron has been the theme.

WOMAN.—How continually, in retirement and in the world, is the lesson of submission forced upon woman. To suffer, and be silent under suffering, seems the great command she has to obey; while man is allowed to wrestle with calamity, and to conquer or die in the struggle.

AFFECTION.—"I speak as I feel," said Paul Clifford; "were the woman I loved suffering through poverty, I would beg with her if I could not relieve her; through injustice, I would defend her; from unkindness, I would protect her; and, if the world forsook her, I would be to her the world."

EXTRACTS FROM MADDEN'S TRAVELS.—Most travellers have remarked, in eastern countries, the natural eloquence of the uncivilized inhabitants; but in no nation is the love of eloquence carried so far as in Egypt and Arabia. I have listened with delight to the declamation of their sheiks, when the people assembled around them in the evening to hear the politics of the village, or the eternal stories of "el fela Wahab," the thousand and one nights of Arabian entertainment. Their common language is half prose, half poetry; Phillips might attend their soirées to call fresh flowers of oratory, and Moore take a corner of their mat to collect new images of poetry.

The Libyan mountain, on the north-west side of Thebes, contains the tombs; they perforate the mountain from top to bottom; the lowest are the most highly finished; these are inhabited by the Arabs, about three hundred of whom miserably exist in these sepulchres of pride. The staple commodity of Gournah consists in mummies; the Arabs find it easier to live by selling dead men, than by the toil of husbandry. In the sale of mummies I discovered such frauds that I have no hesitation in saying that in all the cabinets of Europe there are not probably twenty mummies in the same coffins in which they were originally deposited.

We arrived at Philæ, after a fatiguing walk, in the heat of noon-day. The beauty of the scenery around this enchanting tale compensated us for all our toil from Alexandria to the cataract; it was, indeed, the only spot in all our travels whose scenery deserved to be called sublime. The granite rocks, in a thousand majestic forms, rise from the Nile at its western extremity, and are beautifully contrasted with the picturesque effects of the stately palm trees and magnificent structures of Philæ; indeed, the whole island seems to be a delightful garden, studded with obelisks and temples.

There are four recollections of a traveller which might tempt him to wish to live for ever: the sea view of Constantinople, the sight of the coliseum by moonlight, the prospect from the summit of Vesuvius at the dawn, and the first glimpse of Philæ at sunset.

Generally speaking, the Arabs are the kindest hearted people in the world; no people are more sensible of good treatment, more susceptible of improvement, and, unfortunately, no people on earth are more infamously ruled.

Signor Surur, the consul, is the private friend and counsellor of the governor, who is married to a niece of the pacha. With this great Turk I am in the habit of dining almost daily, either at his house or at Surur's. At the latter, a party of seventy Turks sat down to the most magnificent banquet I ever witnessed in the east. One hundred and thirty dishes of various sorts, fish, flesh, soups, sweets, fruits, &c. were set down and removed in succession. The head of the religion and several priests were present, which Surur considered as no small honour to a christian.

The celebrated German physician, Hufeland, in one of his latest publications, says, "of the diseases which are not generally considered mortal, I am now fully convinced, after thirty years' practice, that of all the patients whom I treated, two-thirds would have recovered without my assistance or that of medicine, and even under the most opposite modes of treatment."

THICKNESS OF A SOAP BUBBLE.—Newton succeeded in determining the thickness of very thin laminae of transparent substances, by observing the colour which they reflect. A soap bubble is a thin shell of water, and is observed to reflect different colours from different parts of its surface. Immediately before the bubble bursts, the black spot may be observed near the top. At this part the thickness has been proved not to exceed the two millions five hundred thousandth part of an inch.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE ENGLISH AT HOME.

Even a "noviciate" reader ordinarily understands what is meant by the term graphic delineation. Most persons, gifted with a "healthy organic mental power," and having made ordinary proficiency in the chirographical art, can put into words what they have seen passing before them, or describe even occult qualities; but there shall be such an immense difference in the degree of this power, or in the modus, as that, in different writers, it shall appear a different faculty. For instance—one shall say that "a man fell from a fearful height, and that it was an awful sight;" another shall place before your eyes the anxiety and horror which were depicted in the projecting and blood-stained eye-balls of the wretch, when he found himself suddenly threatened with being dashed to pieces. You will be forced mentally to see his agonized body coiling itself up in its passage downwards, describing, by a horrible effort of the muscles, a kind of zigzag line in the air. All the thoughts of home, and friends, and even the nausea of the stomach of the sufferer, the very convulsions of his lungs in passing through such a column of atmosphere, will pass before you in review, until you almost imagine yourself, like Sancho Panza, falling from Sirius, although, like him, you may be seated on a bench of wood all the while. The power of a novel writer, most will suppose, would be pretty fairly tested by the first formal and love-making interview which passes between the hero and the heroine; and especially if the author have the temerity to put this into the shape of a dialogue of much length, for such a trial is to a writer what a young man's fourth of July oration and dinner to his friends, if he be a politician, are to the estimation of his character, talents, and to the making or marring of his future fortune. Thus then stands this column in the "English at Home." The hero, Mr. Willoughby, the reader may perhaps as well be told, is the élite and natural son of Lord Ratoath, (in the name of euphony what an appellation!) who is deeply smitten with Miss Cresswell, ward or niece of the earl of Atherton, and who had been entrusted with her interests and education.

THE DECLARATION.

Willoughby.—"I boast not mustachios enough for either; besides, I abhor heroes, whether of prose or verse."

"Are you so very anti-romantic?" asked Miss Cresswell.

"Mystery is my aversion."

"Yet I have known it to envelope much interest," said Lady Jane, (one of the family of Lord Atherton.)

"I dearly love a mysterious personage," said her sister.

"Like whom?"

"Like what we read of, to be sure, but never see."

"Dear me! the world is full of mystery and mysterious personages."

"There is Mr. Willoughby's friend, Mr. Fitz-Erne."

"He appears to be the most frank, open fellow alive," said Willoughby.

"I own he puzzles me," quoth Lechy.

"Nor can I make him out," said Lady Jane Atherton.

"For my part," observed Miss Cresswell, "I never take pains to discover what seeks concealment." There was pique in the tone.

"And you are right," said Willoughby, "it is not for one so fair to study the hieroglyphics of others' conduct; for he, the beat of whose heart pulse is not manifest to you, must be a dull passionless fellow indeed."

"I perceive," said Louisa, "if Mr. Fitz-Erne deals in mystery, you deal in mystification; shall I call Mr. Lechy to interpret your compliment?"

"Nay, none but your fair self can appreciate my homage."

"Cannot all the world equally with me? for surely your homage is addressed to all."

"What! the homage which one pays to folly, that of apathy and affectation?"

"How different from the true! which, durst I, should be here poured forth."

"For heaven's sake, Mr. Willoughby, do not be so rude and so unlike yourself as to grow serious."

"I throw my heart at your feet, lady."

"Then put it up again, gentle air; for truly I should not know what to do with such an acquisition."

"You scorn my proffer?"

"Nay, I am infinitely obliged by it."

"But you would mock, and keep me in suspense?"

"Most certainly."

"And whistle me down the wind at first to rail at fortune?"

"Most probably."

"By this light, lady, I thank thy frankness and adore it." Now whether it is that, as Addison has affirmed, all love conversations sound dreadfully flat in the ears of an unconcerned party, or the cause exists in a most admirable dulness on the part of the writer, we would not pronounce decidedly; but reason and justice oblige us to refrain from any hasty and severe censure, for it seems to happen with the author, as with many a man in common life, when he covets most to shine, his failure appears to be proportionately conspicuous. His attempts at conversational brilliancy are like those of our friend Cooper, "a dead stall;" when he tries to make his dramatic personae talk sense, then he succeeds: but when he has any ad libitum, and the conversation is to be a witty one, then it is a failure. A philological remark, en passant: Is the following passage English? "However two such admirations were compatible." We would also, while critically employed, object to coining—disagreeability, &c. &c. The sentences at the beginning of the work especially are inharmonious, clumsy, and perplexed, but by no means verbose; nay, the very opposite of this. There is rather an excess of meaning, about the disposal of which, in verbal expression, the author seems to be rather careless than careful—but if the readers of novels will take our word for it, he is not a mere man of sentences; not to be utterly despised even at this novel-writing hour. However loose and rugged may be the outline, and hackneyed some of the characters, others of them are comparatively fresh, and the tact in antithetical exaggeration and working up is considerable. As being in the tribe of novels an individual of a totally opposite character and different variety from Paul Clifford, "English at Home" might be taken up by the most fastidious novel reader, for the purpose of relief; and though not so splendid and picture-making, it affords rather more solid information than that fashionable volume, which causes nearly as much newspaper discussion as the manufacturing system, or any other popular political question. Nay more: one of the unerring signs of a writer of power cannot be denied to the author of the "English at Home,"—whatever misnomer the title of the book be—and it is a quality which, constituted as novel ingredients and materials generally are, cannot be treated with indifference—he has felt, and eloquently describes like such a man, the mastery of the passion of love. The story of the Parvenu peers like the effulgence of the sun over the less radiant constellation; if he have never felt this passion, the divinity of inspiration at least sits upon his lips. His sentences become more concentrated, his metaphors flow out with the wildness of the wilderness water-course. All the gradations, windings, involutions, and sudden transmutations of that all-pervading feeling, are given with the pathos of a principal actor in the scene, not with the mere accuracy of a by-stander; and the sub-heroine, Theresa Veraigne, becomes at once the tutelary of his worship, and the secret of his strength. The forte of the writer is not in narrative, still, the reader may fairly judge of his calibre in this department by the following:

THE DUEL.

"When the signal was given, Fitz-Erne drew trigger, but his weapon did not go off; it burnt priming; and at the same time Willoughby fired his in the air.

"The young fool!" exclaimed the black-stocked, military looking, early risen, whose irritation rose to an ungovernable height.

"The seconds met, interchanged words; and, as it appeared that Fitz-Erne's attempt to fire counted for nothing, he was about to repeat it—and here the tall gentleman could no longer contain himself, but burst forth.

"He bade Willoughby go to school for a chicken; and then turning his compliments towards Fitz-Erne, he apostrophized him as a bully, who had come there to sacrifice a boy to his sanguinary love of renown.

"Had you permitted me time, sir," replied Fitz-Erne, 'I should have fired this pistol in the air as I do now, which would have placed me on an equality with my antagonist, who, for all his lack of beard, is, I assure you, not much younger than myself, and certes all as keen—but perhaps you are right. Willoughby,' continued he, advancing, 'let us go no further with this, unless you would mend your aim once more and level; for since you came here star-shooting I must not commit murder.'

"As you will, Fitz-Erne; I came at your bidding, and will go at it," replied the peaceable Willoughby.

"All this was horror to the veteran who stood by; the principals speaking for themselves was an utter breach of duelling etiquette. Fitz-Erne's apparent, and Willoughby's real, though unassuming magnanimity; his purple cheek was bursting forth, with some dire apostrophe to Fitz-Erne; he was inflamed with passion and generous resentment. All he wanted was words and ideas for speech. As Willoughby retired, however, Fitz-Erne relieved the angry personage by accosting him:

"You have obliged me, unknown sir, by half a score of insults, quite uncalled for. I take it for granted you are a gentleman; and I do not mean to flatter when I say your appearance speaks it. I do not ask even your name."

"Sir, it is ———," and some unpleasant thought checked and stopped his utterance.

"It matters not. You young gentleman has grievously injured me; I could not forgive it, though I own it pained me to call him hither. You sir, however, seemed anxious to take his place, and you are entitled to it on your own account, having honoured me with the name of bully. I have indulged you; the place is vacant; and as I now defy you, expressing my indignation at your interference and impertinent speeches, you will take it when it may be most convenient to you."

But having thus far whetted the curiosity of the reader by showing him something of the house, by describing the size of the bricks of which it is built, (this figure, borrowed from Johnson, not being by any means designed for the backs of the writers of those wholesale and gross condemnings, or condemnings by the gross, which so frequently appear in print) we conceive ourselves bound in honour, to give, at least, a chapter of contents—adding, as our spiritual instructors say, a few words by way of improvement. The two volumes, then, most gentle reader, now passing current in all the stores of the trade and in the circulating libraries, by the title of the "English at Home," consist of one entire story of the Willoughby or Ratoath family, which terminates in the seventy-third page of the second volume. This story, however, includes another, called the Parvenu, and is the best written in the book. The tale of the Brocks, a miscellany called the Monte B. Papers, and the tale of Earsham, conclude. If morality be the desideratum in novel reading, here is an armful of it; though we apprehend this outcry is but the result of a sort of habit of complaining and finding fault, which, after all, must be done: for if the secrets of the critical avocation must be drawn from "their dread abode," the craft would utterly starve upon indiscriminate praise. Faults whet the ingenuity, tax the industry, and gratify the vanity of the finder. The eye that discerns a fault first, sparkles for the rest of the day; and the figure of the man amplifies upon the vision like that of a soap-bubble emanating from a pipe-bowl. Besides, only calculate the miserable consequences of this producing tribe (meaning authors) having their own way; they would be like a mob without a constable to keep it in order; like schoolboys without a cane or birch in sight; or like a number of the followers of the Duke of Argyll without a scratching-post. But after this doubling, let us try to get back into the path. The book appears to be written, particularly the Willoughby tale, for a three-fold purpose: First, to explode and render infamous and reprobate the doctrines and maxims of that profound code of ethics found in the famous letters of Lord Chesterfield to his son; and especially, those of them relative to the devotedness of young aspirants to married women, thus systematizing and founding a school for the perpetrating of immorality, i. e. sophistry aside, and the design translated into plain English.—Secondly, there is a most inflexible cat-o-nine-tails thrown across the backs of those persons who are continually calumniating all women who appear upon the stage, indiscriminately. See Theresa in the Parvenu. Thirdly, there is a very decided political cast which the book has; and this, probably, was one of its principal objects; adapted wholly, however, or principally, to the English meridian. It is inclining to anti-Canning in its bias; and the writer contrives in the tale of the Willoughby family, to interweave the history of the causes which led to, the personages who figure in, and the details of the downfall of that administration by the premature death of its chief. Abating the absolute fact of partizanship, the facts are given in as independent and candid a manner as could have been expected. The portraits of the different personages are by no means slovenly drawn, although perhaps a little caricatured. Take the following:

"Verening, (Canning) however, at this moment was no longer the same. He saw his young friend and follower enter, (Willoughby) but there was no welcome, no rallying; he made an effort at the former, but it ended in a mere motion of the hand pointing forth a seat. The countenance was corrugated, to use an expression of Vathek; the roundness of its traits had sharpened into the angular; they seemed in the same disorder as his thoughts. A bright gleam, not of hope, but of revenge, elevated one eyebrow and one side of the lip; but the oppressive lever of ingratitude, of abandonment and despair, dragged down the other brow and the other lip. He quivered with very nervousness. The sense of wrong and injury gave him life, and bound his heart together: that alone kept it from breaking. Alas! it did break when the former contracting feeling had ceased.

"You have heard my determination, Willoughby," said Verening, leaning his head still upon his hand, and forbidding himself all motion for fear of his temper and feelings getting the better of him. "H— must lead the lower house, and I must thrust myself among their lordships."

"Bitter was the tone of the last word: Willoughby said nothing," &c.

Mr. Brougham, Mr. Tierney, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and other prominent men of the party, figure under the fictitious names of Rancilffe, Cholera, Calton, &c.; and there is a very pretty little bit of court life, page 177, which would repay any reader the trouble of scanning. Of the three female portraits introduced into the Willoughby story, viz. Miss Cresswell, Theresa Vernaige, and Mary Gray, there is much to praise. Taste, knowledge of human nature, and a versatile pencil, are all discoverable in the design and execution. Lord Ratoath, without either much breadth or depth, is a very faithful drawing of the old-school nobility. On Willoughby the author has lavished much care, and apparently to as little purpose as the author of Waverley did for the hero of the novel by that name. The fault of both is, that they do nothing worthy of themselves. Fitz-Enne is au contraire racy and vigorous; and the touch of misanthropy with which his character is dashed, "recommends it to the sense." His sullen pride serves but to increase a kind of admiration, which cannot be withheld from him even on the verge of committing suicide. Mrs. Osbaldistone's virtue gives the last stroke to the discomfiture of the Chesterfieldian policy. It is impossible to lavish much attention upon the minor figures of the dramatis personæ without adding to the length of an article already too far extended. If the test of the ability of an author be found in the increasing interest of the reader as he advances, and finally entire absorption, until a reluctance is felt to lay down the volume before the story is finished, then is the "English at Home," by the testimony of one who can write under his evidence, probatum est, at least worth reading.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

GOING TO THE COUNTRY TO RECRUIT.

DEAR SIR—It is late at night. The steps of the passengers no longer sound under my window. A watchman has just struck the resounding pavement to give all house-breakers and so forth a fair chance of escape. The old church in the neighbourhood is proclaiming with solemn and long vibrating peals the very witching time, and the same stars we have gazed at together, are now twinkling as brilliantly as ever in the azure depths of heaven. They say such hours awaken thoughts of the absent; so, not to wrong the proverb, I sit down to address a few lines to you. You ask me how I endure the city at this season of general festivity? Perhaps were I left solely to the influence of my own wishes, I should not be here. But you know how little our cheerfulness depends upon the mere circumstance of time and place. How readily we undertake labour to accomplish a design, and how even the toils and privations of life may become habited with a sweetness when they bring one nearer to his purpose. Suppose there was some pleasant and favourite spot which attracted your visits, and the road to it should lie along a rough and dangerous ascent, with what an elastic step you would mount the hill—with what a reckless daring you would tread the brink of the precipice, bouyed up and drawn onward by the mere power of fancy! And, on the contrary, what cold shadows a sad thought, or a gloomy anticipation may fling across the feelings even when wandering among the loveliest scenes. Yet I have not been so ascetic as you imagine. I have sometimes cut the gordian knots of business, and gone off like an imprisoned bird escaped from his cage. Permit me to say, however, that this same "going into the country" "to recruit," discovers a very ordinary species of wisdom. I am one who rashly credited the virtues of these rural excursions, and now find myself in the predicament of an unfortunate valetudinarian, after having swallowed the nostrum of an empiric which affords a temporary relief, only to leave the patient subsequently in more complete distress. I write this, therefore, as a caution to unwary young men likely to be tempted into a similar snare. At first it was certainly very specious—every thing in the face of nature looked fair and beautiful. The air was scented and exhilarating, and I gave myself up to emotions of pleasure. We found numerous means of "fleeing away the time as they did in the golden age"—we reclined beneath the shade—we wandered along the beach—mounted the hill, and roamed through the woods.

This is not the land for startling adventures or rich associations. We were not assailed by banditti nor devoured by wild beasts; and the ruins—majestic, vast, lonely, dark—which stir wild and high imaginations in the traveller of foreign countries, are wanting here. Yet the trifling incidents peculiar to the scene and season were not without their interest. Sometimes the golden bee, heavily laden with honey, came murmuring along, putting our party to rout without any particular distinction as to ladies and gentlemen. Then, as we passed the broad shaded pond, embosomed among the hills, we noticed the tortoises comfortably enjoying themselves upon the little rocks which were scattered about the stream, basking in the light of the blessed sun, and stretching their long necks from out their mailed backs, with about as many sage reflections upon matters and things as fill the pericranium of nine-tenths of the many men and women whose eyes, but not their souls, look on nature. From these views, however, our attention was withdrawn by a loud scream from one of the ladies, announcing some awful crisis in the day's adventure. A general concentration of faces took place around the object which created the alarm, although as soon as the truth became known to the majority, the distance between it and the different individuals of our party grew more and more respectable; in justice to the gentlemen, however, I cannot deny that in order to afford their fair companions an uninterrupted view, they stationed themselves in the rear-ground, so as not to monopolize the advantage of a close examination. The cause of this happy display of character proved to be a poor little harmless garter snake, which, half frightened out of its wits, had encircled itself around the stem of a low bush—afraid to go or to stay, particularly as the most courageous among the males had armed himself with an enormous bludgeon heavy enough to fell an ox, and with divers valiant flourishes and preliminary attempts, appeared proceeding to crush him into atoms, an inconvenient alternative to which the creature seemed unwilling to submit. Just as the assailant had lifted his club, whose descending force might have astounded even the renowned sea-serpent himself, the destined victim, with the cunning for which history gives his kind so much credit, quietly unfolded his spotted coils and withdrew from the scene of action, upon which the victor, with an air of triumph, spent his strength upon the unfeeling bushes, and exchanged with us congratulations for our fortunate escape.

By and by came on the evening with its balmy breeze. The slight summer-shower was over, and the clouds broke apart in painted masses; behind their burnished fragments the crimson sky appeared, glowing with a fine and lingering radiance, which faded like the twilight reveries of the dreamers beneath. These are not hours to waste within a room—they found us pacing and re-pacing the sandy beach—breathing in the odours that floated from the woods and fields. Then as the evening shadows thickened, and the blended and deepened colours of the west had passed like the last splendours of some gaudy and magnificent procession, a light star appeared alone in the overhanging vault, as if it were even now first treated. The broad water seemed in sleep, but that as it lapped softly with its silver waves upon the shore, its ripples turned to fire, and then the everlasting stars came forth one after another from the depths of the blue distance, lighting our lingering steps with the beams of clustering worlds. Do you know, dear M., that even in the deep tranquil happiness of such a moment there will steal over the spirit a melancholy presentiment—a vague hateful consciousness of danger and disappointment—a knowledge that the glorious stars which crowd the azure fields of heaven are not more thickly strewn than cares and distress along the ways of life? Even if our future courses lie through prosperous regions, still age must come on, and the fresh and beautiful feelings of youth and hope must be dead in our withered bosoms—and—but these are idle and fruitless reveries, and must be shaken off. To me they are momentary; for if I must think of other than the present, let me embrace the richer and happier dreams of fancy which are scarcely less dear because they are impossible. Well! whether we are happy or miserable, time goes on—and as the star-lighted vault turned its twinkling fires towards the west, we found ourselves in the night about bringing my brief excursion to an end with those two troublesome, awkward, unwelcome words "good-by."

Now all this is very well, but the evil consequences must not be concealed. Before I was betrayed by a designing friend into the power of certain people inhabiting the regions about

New-York, I was an industrious and contented young man. I was rapidly establishing a reputation for punctuality in business, for my faculties were properly balanced for my daily task. Habit had drilled me into a kind of mechanical routine, and I operated upon the special pleas and bills in chancery, with the uninterrupted uniformity of a steam-engine, freed from the winds and tides of wandering wishes and dreamy recollections. My attention was not diverted from the duties before me by intruding pictures of green woods, old bridges, grassy hills, and murmuring waters; and no pleasant voices haunted my ears but such as I could hear by walking around the corner. But now I have relapsed into many idle and troublesome propensities. While my body is in the office where I transact the little business which destiny has committed to my discretion, my soul is off upon some ramble over the hills, or engaged in other occupations which have no more to do with my "orders to show cause," and my "notices of bail," than these interesting manuscripts with the gentle lights of heaven. It is also my misfortune to listen, with such thoughts as I need not enumerate, to all kinds of good music, particularly of the human voice; and this weakness sometimes assumes a very inconvenient, although ludicrous character. When I have heard a song which touches my fancy, my mind involuntarily falls into the measure, and long after the real music has died away, the ghost of the tune attends upon my imagination, conjuring up apparitions of all the then accompanying persons and scenes. Sometimes it takes such improper familiarities with my dignity and common sense, that, no matter where I happen to be, it leaps from my heart to my lips, so that I often astonish sober and unsinging people with gratuitous exhibitions of my musical abilities before I can rein in and get the harmonious fiend under any restraint. Thus, the other day, when one of my clients, a huge and uncouth worker in iron, as rough and hard as a mass of his own raw material, whiskers monstrous, and fist like a sledge-hammer, asked me what would be the expense of obtaining a discharge on the application of himself and two-thirds of his creditors under the revised statutes, I being in excellent voice, astonished the worthy petitioner by exclaiming in such melody as was at the moment floating in my mind, "Come, away then, away then, my merry Swiss girl, to the fields bright with dew lightly stray." On another occasion a very interesting young lady, with a spruce little gentleman, who was soon to call her by the tenderness of names, waited upon me till I should finish a paper which she was to sign. I had no sooner, with an air of internal satisfaction, (for I was, in imagination, at that very moment picking wild flowers at the foot of a hill) put the concluding flourish upon the parchment, than, instead of desiring her, as in duty bound, to "have the kindness to attach her signature," I handed her the deed and pen, and requested her in a fine falsetto to "Meet me by moonlight alone," to the amazement of my fair client, and the extreme horror of the enamoured person in new broadcloth clothes by her side, who continued to regard me at a distance during the whole affair with looks of unequivocal distrust. And this is what people call "recruiting." I am not acquainted with the views of medical men upon the subject, but my own opinion is, that a few such recruiting excursions would cause very destructive work among my pleas and declarations. I fear the gods might make me poetical, for the other day I filed a stanza in the clerk's office instead of a præcipe for a capias, and never discovered my error till I took from my pocket what I imagined the lines alluded to, and instead of the lofty language of the bard, I read at first with perplexity, and as the truth flashed upon me, with horror, Peter Thompson versus Charles Jones. Trespass. Damages, five hundred dollars. Capias issued, &c.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

RESTAURATEURS.

"Ce n'est rien que complaisance."

I MUST confess that, in my sojourning in this great republic, I have not lost the smack of those fine dishes, entrenched behind all their gastronomical honours, which, on the continent, all the higher grades of restaurateurs furnish—nor the black and almost aromatically bitter strong cup of coffee that waits upon the dinner; and I am inclined to record it as a sober fact, "without comment," that emigration is gastronomically deteriorating. Whenever I am at a loss, either before a very late dinner, or find myself "upon the town" for the same, the reminiscences of former pleasurable deglutitional operations induce me to pay particular attention to the word restaurateur; but it seems hitherto, like Macbeth's vision, to merit the appellation "moral mockery." Entered in one of those parti-tioned domicils, in vain you ask for French soup—a basin of thin water-gruelly kind of admixture is served up, with scarcely any flavour of meat, with a quantum sufficit indeed of bread, and the ghosts of carrot slicings, with rice nearly raw, instead of the fine agglutinating stick-to-the-ribs gelatinous commodity which you get in France or French coffee-houses in London. Will any body be kind enough to point out a veritable French coffee-house or restaurateur in New-York, where “haricot mutton,” “coutelettes à la Maintenon,” and sundry other dishes may be procured, “too tedious to enumerate?” If you remonstrate with these naturalized French citizens, they look the matter and you full in the face by assuring you that it is the best soup and the best dish in the world—“Mais si Monsieur veut attendre pour demain,” &c. I placed myself down, not long since, in one of these “refectories,” and paid some attention to what was around me before I uttered a word. Every thing appeared to wear the appearance of order and cleanliness, and the manners of the people were civil, without the alloy of adulation. As usual, I commenced my demands with a request for soup, which I found cursed with the same defect which Falstaff found in his sack. But one of the attendants was a veritable Française, petite in person, a very full dark eye, and the nose aquiline, with much vivacity in her manners. There are few women who, if you appear to regard them attentively, will not evince by some movement that they are conscious of it. Her husband appeared to be, at the same time, very sensible of her value, and was as little disposed to share it with another; this, or any thing like jealousy being a remarkable trait in a Frenchman, I spiced my compliments a little higher than at first intended—this I penitently acknowledge was very mischievous to say the least. The claret, I discovered, was very good, and here it behoves me, although I have lodged a complaint respecting the edibles and the soup, which latter is perhaps of the epicene gender, it behoves me to make the amende honorable by saying, one always finds good claret if one meet not with generous beau-ne or fernese in a French “refectory,” even though it be naturalized. But to continue. The good host of the refectory appeared to be very much inclined to be angry; but feeling this very impolite, broke out aside into a chanson à la chasse, for a Frenchman is never guilty of ill-manners. Madame was nearly as complaisant as the “marchande des gants” but the impatience of Monsieur was at length too powerful for suppression, and he reminded her of duties that awaited her. Her ready reply was, without appearing to misunderstand his meaning, “Ce n'est rien que la complaisance.” I could not help contrasting our manners with those of the Citoyenne Aubergeuse I had left. There is a direct admission in them that there is a general debt of civility due, which I believe is not in all cases recollected by us with all our professions. Complaisance is, it must be confessed, not the predominant virtue either of the Englishman, the Scotchman, or the American—(this indiscriminate grouping may not please every one)—a sense of the minor virtues (petites morales) does not always accompany the more solid traits of character, but they come oftener into play, and are infinitely more pleasing. While writing, I am informed there is a house where, if appearances may be judged of, the veritable French dishes may be found, but which I have not yet explored. If I find on reconnoitering that every thing is right, I shall not fail to inform you; and while you are from time to time inserting accounts from Saratoga, and places “beyond seas,” I may occasionally remind you that the streets of your own city are not, even in these “piping hot” days, exhausted of novelty, and that the home trade may be as well worth attention as the foreign. Indeed, how can it possibly happen by “any manner of means” that at the precise spot where the confluent streams of the outpourings of so many European countries meet, some curious scenes should not turn up which would compensate a man for the trouble of scratching down? But adieu. S.

BOARDING-HOUSES AND HOTELS.

Few persons there are who, after a long day's peregrination, and especially if the weather has been tempestuous or cold, have seasonably found a comfortable room, good fire, a pair of wax candles, (tallow ditto at present not the thing,) and a very well furnished larder to back all other pretensions, but have felt a sort of pleasant sensation, which is not unaptly expressed by the old household word comfort. On the other hand, if a man perchance has been shaking and knocking at a door alternately for some couple of hours, in the winter solstice, and about the time of midnight, feeding his imagination with the speedy enjoyment of all the good things which that aforesaid door, together with four walls (of brick or wood, as the case may be) enclose, and should, instead of hearing the words, “open sesame,” see presented to his astonished vision, and towards his person, a long shining barrel, the very mouth of which seems ready to vomit forth incessantly the dire contents of a well-charged gun, such a person must, we think, understand the meaning of the phrase comfortable quarters. There are very few travellers, (and in such comprehensive terms may be included most males from the age of fourteen and upwards,) but must have noted an immense difference between the appearances of things during the first week's occupancy of a new domicile, and the same set of objects after a longer period has transpired, and especially if you are what is called an easy man, that is, can put up with almost any kind of treatment without complaining. At the first your basin and tumbler in the sleeping-room are regularly filled every day, and a clean towel placed; and you are assigned, if it is winter, a place near the fire in the sitting-room. If you should happen to possess a decent person, are between twenty and thirty, and there should be unmarried and marriageable females in the family, you are the lion of the week; but make the most of your time, for your days are numbered. During that time all the albums in the house will be open to you, and what you write in them will be lauded, whether you can only tag two rhymes, only abstract verses from some obsolete book, and palm them for your own, or write like Mrs. Hemans, and like what Mrs. Norton is said to do. On the eighth day the handkerchief passes, and you may inscribe Hic transit, etc. Generally speaking, the inns, hotels, boarding-houses, and places of public entertainment characterize the manners of a people. In England there are scarcely such things to be found in the fashionable world as tables d'hôte, or the boarding-house sitting-room of the United States. In the coffee-rooms and saloons of first-rate and fashionable hotels in England, you may mingle with respectable male society. To female circles there requires par usage a more particular introduction. In the United States the inmate of the house has the entrée, and he is entitled to mingle with the society which appears at the table, be it what it may. Each custom has its advantages and disadvantages relatively. The principle acted upon in the United States would appear to be, that every man found in decent society of a better grade, is presumed to be a gentleman until he is found otherwise. The rule which shapes the usage which prevails in England would seem to be, that it is equitable for every gentleman to furnish evidence of his pretensions before admittance. The latter is safest; the former the most liberal and pleasant—circumstances, doubtless, regulate the practice of each. That too much reserve and retirement is unfavourable to popularity the French monarchs were fully sensible of, who, at least during the old regime, dined in public. The kindlier and better feelings are called forth by the public display of pleasing manners on the part of the class who possess emphatically the respect of mankind. On the other hand, the circumstance of general privacy lies perhaps at the very foundation of that respect. In England it may with some truth be stated, that the nobility serve not only as a political but a moral check to the haughty pretensions of the uneducated, and unamiable wealthy; and the middling and lower classes of society contemplate the fact with great satisfaction, that those who more immediately cause their greatest mortifications are not at the top. But we are like a ship at sea lying to—we begin to drift a little. The candidate for a good dinner, and well dressed, for the chance of hearing some good things occasionally, and who does not make selectness an indispensable quality in his society, may do remarkably well at the best ordinaries in London, and in the coffee and travellers' rooms in the country. The gentlemen of the whip sometimes crack a pleasant joke; most of them are adepts at small talk, and no people in the country are better judges of bees' wings and the age of sherry. It was at one of these houses we heard the following little tale related:—A second mate of an English merchant vessel had in the latitude of the West Indies, succeeded in inducing the captain of the vessel, and that with the greatest difficulty, to fight a French privateer, which the result showed carried a larger force than it would have been prudent to have withstood; but the brave fellow acted like a second Nelson. He was at the helm, at the bows, loading the guns in the immediate part of the deck called the slaughter-house, manning the stern-chasers, and all nearly in as many minutes. The privateer depended on boarding, and the two vessels were at one time locked; but Kingsley, (for that was his name,) took the helm at the important moment, and eased off the Demerara from the privateer; two-thirds of the crew of the Demerara fell in the action, and towards the latter part of the fight Kingsley had both his legs carried away by a cannon shot. The privateer after this would have captured the brig, but for the circumstance of a very brisk gale coming on, and the fore-topmast of the former being wounded. Kingsley's sufferings, having no regular surgeon on board on the vessel's passage home to London, cannot be described. When arrived there the surgeons pronounced that his active life was closed, as the power of locomotion could not with all the aid of art be restored. The owners of the vessel were applied to for a pension for poor Kingsley, in consideration of his good conduct; but it came out, in the course of this application, that it would have been for the interest of the firm had the vessel been captured, and being private property, nothing further was to be done. Kingsley's father and mother resided in a cottage in Kent, which the humble couple, by constant labour, although advanced in life, contrived to keep over their heads. They had heard, as the action was related at full length in all the newspapers, of the bravery of their son, and welcomed him home to share their last morsel. To return to his birth place and become a burden to his aged parents was not the only difficulty which Kingsley had to solve in his resolute mind: there was one within the limits of that parish who had figured to her eager imagination the return of her Kingsley, as the harbinger of joy, and as the first act in a long drama of happiness. She flew to her brave sailor's parents, hung upon their necks, and demanded him in any state; showed her rosy arms, and protested that she could labour for both. In the meanwhile the refusal of the pittance on the part of the owners of the Demerara had sunk deep into the manly spirit of Kingsley, who could not endure the thought that his dependence for life should rest upon the labour of his wife, or in default of that, upon his parents. Day after day he refused his food; his pistols, faithful in the fight, had been kept every night under his pillow. One morning he was found stretched on the bed lifeless, with a shot through his heart. The poor lost Mary may be now seen every day, with tresses floating in the wind, and arms extended, demanding him of the coaches which pass through the village. The passengers are differently affected—some, on hearing the melancholy fate, which is hourly related, excrete the avarice which could cause such heart-rending woes; some give money for her support; and a few, besides the donation, drop a silent tear.

A SKETCH.

BY WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

“He drank again,
And from a purer fount on holler ground,
And deem'd its spring perpetual—but in vain.

In early life, when o'er his way
Hope pour'd the sunshine of her smile,
A glorious and unclouded ray,
The soaring spirit to beguile;
He drank from her enchanted cup
The sweet libation of the soul,
Till life and sense were swallowed up,
Within her pure and free control!

Then breathing rapture in his lay,
He touch'd his rich and trembling lyre,
As matin-birds in music stray,
Painted on orient skies of fire;
And dreams, all coloured from his joy,
Came forth, a fresh and holy throng,
To bless the aspiring minstrel-boy,
And deck the numbers of his song.

How soon the mantling clouds became Disrobed of roses they had worn,
When on their wings of crimson flame
They brought the glorious hours of morn!
They melted in the noon-tide ray,
They lessened in its fervid beam,
When youth had cast its pearls away,
And manhood clasp'd a broken dream!

How many hearts that sprung of old
To bless the changes of his lot,
Are mouldering, passionless and cold,
By all, save him, unknown—forgot!
Thus every chalice proffered him
Of love or peace is broken—dull;
Save one—a goblet dark and dim—
Pale sorrow's cup—and that is full.

TO KATHARINE,

WITH THE FLOWER LOVE-IN-A-MIST.

BY C. C. VANARSDALE.

Dear girl, I could not live with you,
But ah, 'twere death to part.
Although thy faults I hate to view,
Thy virtues charm my heart.
Thou art so frank—so modest—vain—
So true—false—flirting—fair,
That though thy presence gives me pain,
Thy absence is—despair.

Of all the ets I love brunettes,
And therefore you adore;
But of all ets I hate coquettes,
And therefore you ahor:
A maid that smiles on every beau,
As you do—I detest;
And yet without that smile's soft glow,
My heart can find no rest.

I love a pouting, ruddy lip,
And yours you know is such;
But sweets that every mouth may sip,
Mine shall not, cannot touch;
And pretty hands I love not less,
Just such, dear Kate, as thine;
But if they grant another's press,
They'll ne'er be press'd by mine.

I love a tongue whose very words
Like drops of honey fall;
But yet I hate those human birds
That sing so sweet for all;
And more than these, that too is thine,
I love an ardent heart—
But if that heart is not all mine,
I will not have a part.

Now prithee, changeling, change thy ways,
Thy words—mind—manner—will;
Be thou deserving of all praise,
Or let all praise be still;
In short, let all thy goodness die,
And be a thing to hate,
Or let thy faults and foibles fly,
And then be mine, dear Kate.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

To correspondents.—We must decline a compliance with the wishes of "Eugenio." It has long been our established rule to pass over rejected communications in respectful silence. Such a course is surely the least likely to give pain to unsuccessful authors, and therefore every way preferable to the too common practice in which some editors indulge at the expense of those who favour them with their contributions. However deficient a writer may be in qualifications entitling his productions to admission into the columns of a public journal, his selection of any one of them ought not to be treated with acrimonious severity, biting sarcasm, or unsparing virulence. Such conduct is ill calculated to reprove misjudged pretensions, or correct the hasty errors or unavoidable deficiencies of unfledged genius. It may gratify the malicious gnawings of a vicious spirit, but does not accomplish the object of healthful and generous criticism, which seeks to educe, not repress talent, to encourage inspiration, foster industry, and impart confidence to the promptings of a laudable though imprudent ambition. Besides these general reasons for our accustomed practice, there is still another of powerful import, which cannot be overlooked. Were a detailed account to be rendered of every communication sent to us, of which necessity compels the exclusion, the readers of the Mirror would have little other matter with which to entertain them than discussions of the orthographical, etymological, syntactical, and prosodial merits of writers, abounding like locusts in the land of Egypt.

Amusements.—Nothing is more common than complaints of the dulness of the country. There are no amusements there, say the young ladies and gentlemen who return at twelve or one o'clock at night from the heated ball-room, and sink to their feverish and unhealthy slumbers. It is true the amusements one meets with in a rural excursion are very different from those of a city; but they must be devoid of taste, and the common feelings of nature, who can find nothing which they will delight to remember among the woods and on the stream. Imagine a fine afternoon in the latter part of August, when the air is fresh and cool at sunset, without even the stirring of a breeze, unless some gentle zephyr blows softly upon your face, enriched with the scents which at evening rises every where around, yet scarcely breaking the glassiness of the water. Suppose four or five have strolled down to the pebbly beach after tea. The multifarious noises which greet them from the heated pavements have never awakened the echoes of this quiet spot; but in their stead come the bark of the distant dog, the rustle of the upper branches of the forests, the carol of some lingering bird, the neighing of the steed, or the lowing of the cattle which the free-hearted and happy farmer boy is following to their fold. A little painted boat is resting upon the bosom of the transparent stream, its image reflected beneath. See yonder light-hearted girl has leaped into the yielding bark, and in a few moments the whole party, with jests and laughter are safely seated; and now they push off, leaving behind them a broad wake in the disturbed waters, and sending long ripples on either side, which stretch away off beyond the reach of sight. And now from the vessel a deep rich voice is heard, and you may distinguish the silvery tones of several female voices, floating in softened music to the shore. We had intended to expatiate at greater length upon the pleasures of "the mirth-freighted skiff," for well we remember many a delightful frolic upon the bay, "with the bright stars above, and the bright eyes below," but the following very beautiful lines from the New-York American are so apropos, that we present them to our readers, in preference to any thing of our own:

THE WATER PARTY AND BOAT SONG.

'Tis one of those calm and beautiful nights
That come when a day of storm is over,
When the scent steals out from the flowers about,
To the wooing winds that round them hover.

The sloop on the glassy river is still
As a child on its mother's bosom sleeping;
And there comes a sound from the woods around
Of the fays, their moonlight revels keeping.

And the whippoorwill's wailing note is heard
From the brake, where her lonely nest is hid;
While from rock and hill she is answered shrill
By the peevish plaint of the katydid.

The moon-touched top of the tulip-tree gleams,
As the dew on its foliage shivers;
And the fire-flies spark through the clusters dark
Of the sumach and sassafras quivers.

We shoot from the shore like a swan on her way,
When she glides to her nest o'er the willow,
And our mirth-irreighted skiff, as she cleaves by the cliff,
Is brushed by the hemlock and willow.

There are bright stars above, there are bright eyes below,
And the moon sheds her silver light o'er us;
Our spirits are gay as the glittering spray
That dashes in ripples before us.

Now, on the blue water we merrily dance—
Our bark like an antelope bounding—
Our voices keep time to the oars' even chime,
And our songs in the night air are sounding.

"My bark is my coursor, so gallant and brave;
"Like a steed of the desert she bounds o'er the wave;
"And the breast of the billow, as onward we roam,
"Swelling proudly to meet her, is flecked by her foam;

"Like the winds which her canvass exultingly fill
"With no track to confine us, no bourne but our will,
"Where its sallies may lead us, at random we steer,
"And its fantasies only can check our career.

"O'er the pages of story the student may pore—
"The trumpet the soldier may charm to the war;
"In the prairie the hunter his heaven may see,
"But the bonny blue water and shallop for me.

"With no harbour before me, behind me no home,
"All heaven around me* wherever I roam,
"I ask but to cheer me as onward I go,
"Those bright stars above me, these bright eyes below."

Politeness and refinement.—A pretty fair estimate of the advancement made by a community in politeness and refinement, may be formed by an attentive observation of the behaviour of audiences promiscuously assembled at public places of amusement. The solemnity of a church, with the sacred associations called up by the object for which they are gathered together, is a sufficient security for the decorous deportment of a congregation; but at the theatre or concert-room, where all restraint is thrown off, and a loose given to enjoyment, the natural dispositions or acquired manners of a people become distinctly perceptible, and are a fair subject for the contemplation of the moralist or the curious spectator. Palpable differences strike the observer in different parts of the world, and are generally to be identified with the more or less improved condition of their society. In some places there will be a marked disregard for the civilities of life, not only between those of the same, but also those of opposite sexes. Boisterous clamour, rude and careless conversation, neglect of apparel, inattention to the comfort and conveniences of others, and, above all, want of courtesy to females, may be contrasted with the more favourable evidences of cultivated manners, appropriate dress, unexceptionable language, and the most polite submission to those rules of chivalrous deference to woman which should characterize the intercourse of the sexes both out and in the drawing-room. Such conduct gives an appearance of brilliancy and finish to the interior of a crowded house which no external splendour can reach. These considerations have been forced upon us by the gratification which we have received, at the representation of the French operas, from the truly genteel appearance presented both in the boxes and pit. The utter absence of all vulgarity—the neat and appropriate costume of the ladies, unincumbered with huge steeple bonnets—the respectful deportment of the men, with heads uncovered, and ever giving place to their fair companions—the silent attention to the business of the stage—all marked a degree of propriety and graceful behaviour which we cannot but wish to see imitated by our American audiences. In intelligence and general information, in all the qualities which can render life useful and moral, we are, as a people, inferior to no other on the face of the globe. Why are we then so often indifferent to the cultivation of those arts which embellish it—which render social intercourse a source of refined gratification as well as a mere interchange of common-place opinions and frigid civilities? We have, it is to be feared, imitated our English brethren too much in this respect, indebted as we are to them for some of the most valuable intellectual, civil, and political blessings which we possess. Let us cast our eyes towards fair and polished France; and while we religiously avoid her imperfections and frivolities, borrow a share of that spirit of gallantry and politeness which has ever rendered her the mould of fashion to the whole civilized world.

Our Village.—Mr. Bliss has re-published the fourth series of "Our Village, or Sketches of Rural Character and Scenery; by Miss Mary Russell Mitford." This work has all the author's well-known characteristics—pleasantness without insipidity, gaiety without silliness, and description without tedious minuteness. Her portraits are pictures, and the figures almost move and speak from the canvass. No living writer is more successful than Miss Mitford in the brightness of her delineations. It is the forte and delight of some authors to draw scenes of villany and horror, and a murder seems to be almost an indispensable requisite to keep up the habitual excitement of their readers; but Miss Mitford basks in the sunshine of human nature: scenes which bespeak the pure and undefiled taste, the simple and uncorrupted manners, the blameless and quiet life, have peculiar charms for her pencil, and are sketched in bold and beautiful outlines by her glowing and benevolent fancy. We have placed on another page the story entitled "The Two Sisters," which we think one of the best things in the volume before us.

The Oracle.—A new satirical and miscellaneous journal will be issued under the above title on the eighth instant. If conducted with decorum and talent, and if its shafts be directed at general follies, not personal foibles, unmixed with the poison of malice, it will no doubt meet with a favourable reception.

Algiers.—The capture of this ancient strong-hold of barbaric piracy by the French army, is pregnant with the most important consequences to the mercantile prosperity of Europe, and the future civilization and political redemption of benighted Africa. The commerce of the Mediterranean is destined to be no more impeded on its way, the mariner no longer to shudder with dread at the rencontre of a reckless rover, or be subjected to the imposition of a galling chain, or incarceration in a gloomy dungeon. No more contributions will be required at the hands of powerless but civilized states for precarious indulgence from the will of a petty but savage tyrant; and Africa, so long the home of ignorance and barbarism, may now receive the light of knowledge. Civilized man will be allowed to penetrate her interior and hitherto impassable barriers, and the sons of Cain may yet, in the mercy of a wise dispensation, have imparted to them the blessings of civilization and of freedom.

Mrs. Jordan.—A memoir of this distinguished female is in the London press. It will embrace her public and private history, from her first appearance on the Irish stage till her death at St. Cloud.

Old rope-walk in Broadway.—We give place to the following, from the pen of an aged and respectable resident of this city, because the subject is interesting. In one thing, however, he is mistaken; for the rope-walk to which we alluded was located precisely as there stated, as may be seen by reference to Lynar's map of New-York, published just one hundred years ago, and since accurately copied on the left hand corner of Longworth's map. "An old Resident," however, is entitled to our thanks.

Mr. Editor.—In the interesting account, illustrative of the picture of the Park and its purlieus, published in your paper some weeks ago, which is in general correct, there is much matter which awakens the reminiscences of old citizens, who saw the grounds where the city-hall now is, sixty years ago. The writer was present when the theatre in Beekman-street was pulled down by a mob, at the time of the commotion about the stamp act in seventeen hundred and sixty-five. He was in the house when the mob began the assault with stones, &c. The audience escaped as fast as they could, and he got out with much difficulty through the side of the building, which was a small wooden one, belonging to William Beekman. The head of the rope-walk, spoken of in your Mirror, fronted on Beekman-street, where the Clinton-hall is now erected. The walk ran westerly, on what was then called the vineyard, to the next street or near to it. It was owned by a Mr. Shaw.

THE LAST VIOLET.

BY IANTHE.

The following lines were occasioned by receiving from a very dear friend, on Christmas-day, a violet which had been found growing in the open air.

I'm weary of hiding the pitiless blast,
I'm weary of lingering the lonely—the last;
Too long I have pined for the soft summer shower,
And the sunbeam to waken each slumbering flower;
Too long I have drooped o'er the leaf-covered bed,
Where my kindred so early lay withered and dead.
In vain my rich treasures of fragrance I fling,
They mingle not now with the breezes of spring;
Too rude are the rough blasts of winter to bear
Such perfume as gladdens the mild summer air;
And the violet, the pride of the spring, droops and dies,
Unknown and unwept, 'neath December's dark skies.
Oh! better, far better, 'twould be could I fade
Mid the clustering locks of some pitying maid;
But I listen in vain for the echoing tread
Of the young and the gay round my verdureless bed,
And too long I have waited the hand that might save
My tempest-bowed form from a snow-hidden grave.
Thou art come—thou art come—aye, I know thee now,
By the echoless step and the thoughtful brow,
By the calm sweet smile on the lip which tells
Of a soul that in peace and in purity dwells:
By the tenderness glased in the depths of thine eye,
I know thou wilt not pass the last violet by.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE PILLAR OF THE EARTH.

A TALE OF THE EAST.

THIS is the august title of Nieponogoro, the present prince of the island of Java; a man who is distinguished for his spirited bravery, and enthusiastic attachment to his people and country. In conformity with the ancient eastern custom, the name which characterizes this individual indicates its meaning, and shows the importance of the person.

The practice of giving such names is found among all people in their primitive state; and the genealogical lists of the Bible, when explained, are said to furnish a complete history of themselves.

Few people are less known than the Javanese and Malays, but few are more interesting. They have customs and manners entirely peculiar to themselves; and their language, from its softness, richness, and beauty, rivalling and excelling the Spanish and Italian, is fit to embellish the literature of a more refined and polished people. Nothing is more striking than the difference which exists between northern and southern climes, in regard to their language. The hardihood and austerity of the north require harshness and vigour, whilst the mildness and softness of southern regions introduce ease, pliancy, and grace. In Europe the strength of the northern nations has long had a tendency to overpower the effeminacy of the south; and the force of their language, like that of their arms, seems to achieve victories of its own by its influence upon the manners of those whose liberties are destroyed.

In an island, however, like that of Java, free from incurable hordes, the habits and customs of the people are left uncorrupted. The enterprise of modern commerce, and the cupidity of European nations, have indeed sought and found them in their peaceful retirement; but the coarseness and severity of the Dutch, their oppressors, are as odious and repulsive as the unjust authority they presume to exercise.

With this specimen of another and civilized hemisphere, it is not surprising that the Javanese should exult in their superiority, and that their prince should attach such importance to himself, as to assume the imposing title of the "Pillar of the Earth."

The particulars which we are going to relate in regard to Nieponogoro, being founded in fact, should obtain an interest proportionate to their truth.

The Dutch have never been able entirely to subjugate the Javanese. While they have long held quiet possession of Batavia, Bantam, Samarang, and other maritime cities, their tenure upon landed estates in the interior has always been precarious, and held in constant dread of the hostile incursions of the natives. The war which rages there is, and has been for some time, confined to the eastern section of the island; and the Dutch, at great expense, have been making renewed but unavailing efforts to complete a tyranny, which, if once established, the climate alone would speedily overthrow.

To preserve the natives in a defenceless state, vessels of war are kept cruising around the island to prevent the landing and sale of fire-arms and ammunition. A brigantine, however, had eluded the vigilance of the blockade, and succeeded in affording to the helpless warriors a small but good supply of the necessary means of resistance.

Shortly after this fortunate occurrence the troops were called to the field, and by the assistance of the unexpected relief, they supposed, notwithstanding the scanty provision of their arms, that they would present an invincible front to the enemy.

To inspire confidence in the expedition, and to insure its success, the old king himself, the father of Nieponogoro, determined to conduct the army in person. After suitable preparations, they accordingly set out, taking their route in the direction of Samarang. The charge of the government was left in the meantime in the hands of Nieponogoro. This prince was then in his fortieth year, and time had only completed the dignity without destroying any of the manly grace and beauty of his person. His stature was superior to that of the most of his people, and the noble symmetry of his figure and countenance was an improved model of that perfection of the human form which all strangers observe and admire in the Javanese.

The bravery and intrepidity of character which distinguished the prince, made him a more suitable person to conduct the army than his father, whose vigour was somewhat enfeebled by age. The qualities, however, which he possessed, rendered him equally serviceable at home in administering the affairs of the government, and diffusing energy among the people. This might be easily accomplished, on account of the attachment universally entertained for him, and the ready submission yielded to his advice and authority. If Nieponogoro was happy in possessing the affections of the people, he was no less fortunate in the relations of his own family. He had been married many years, and among other children was one, who was the favourite of his father and the nation, whose name was Cahoola, and who was sometimes called "The Face of the Sun."

The army had been absent for weeks, and very little intelligence was as yet received with regard to its movements. A courier, however, at length arrived from the king, to inform Nieponogoro, that he had been successful in a skirmish with a small detachment of the enemy. This information diffused joy and animation over the countenances of all, and was regarded as a presage of the successful issue of the campaign. Festivity and rejoicing were seen every where, and the court determined to celebrate the occasion by an "assemblée au dance." The national dance of the Javanese may not possess the graceful evolutions of the Mazurka, but to a stranger it is as interesting as that noted amusement of the Poles. In a climate like that of Java, exposed to the rays of an equatorial sun, nature seems to have done every thing for the wants of the natives. They have trees which produce bread, and others which yield water, (l'arbre de voyageur), and hundreds which afford the most wholesome and nutritious fruits.

With the balsa-wood, which is of a size suitable for timber, and of a texture more soft and spongy than the cork, and easily penetrated by the bamboo, they can in a short time construct habitations, which, though light and fragile, are well adapted to the country.

The ban-yan tree, however, which grows luxuriantly in Java, can easily be made to afford habitations of itself. No tree is more remarkable than this. In the east it is an object of adoration, and is called the tree of life; its size is often immense; and from its broad horizontal branches propagines descend to the ground, and taking root, become in time joint supporters with the parent body, and are planted firmly by its side. Milton has described this handsomely when he speaks of those stately columns forming

"A pillar'd shade,
High over-arch'd with echoing walls between."

With the assistance of matting, the ingenuity of the inhabitants can construct spacious and convenient apartments out of this tree, and surround them by corridors and verandahs.

Preparations like these had been made to entertain the party of the prince, and the illumination of the lamps which lighted the principal room, amidst a profusion of evergreens, presented a spectacle highly novel and interesting.

The dress of the natives consisting of merely a surong and kabiah, with a sash around the waist, is cool and pleasant; and the neatness with which they adjust their kerchiefs on their heads, interposing here and there flowers of various kinds, while portions of their long black hair are left to play about their naked bosoms, give the girls especially a fascinating appearance.

In an anti-room adjoining the saloon the musicians were assembled. Some had pipes, of a rude structure and workmanship, of which Tubal-Cain might have been the inventor; others were seated by huge gongs and gongalongs,* and two or three small boys held a species of sistrum in their hands, and accorded with the rest of the band.

The music struck up and the dance commenced. The parties were arranged opposite to one another, and at first their crossing, wheeling, and rapid evolutions appeared irregular and confused, and were attended with animated singing on both sides. They had proceeded thus for about ten minutes, when the dance presented greater regularity and order; assuming then their original positions; the girls joined hand in hand, danced to their partners, who stood still, singing all together the following song:

CHORUS OF GIRLS.

Like the wind from the mountain, which ruffles the rill,
So swift be the steps of the faithful cachill;
When he comes by the blaze of the oba at night,
To woo the coy maid of his bosom's delight.
Let him watch if the oba, more brilliant on high,
Shall illumine the earth as it brightens the sky;
Then glad be his looks, when the light of the moon
Shall lead him the way to his dear paramour.

The young men then in turn rejoined with the following antiphon:

CHORUS OF YOUNG MEN.

By the light of the oba or beams of the moon,
When he seeks the fair face of his dear paramour;
As the wind from the mountain sweeps over the rill,
More fleet be the steps of the sprightly cachill.
The keekian that leaps o'er the hills of his wood,
Ne'er clears the thick brake with a speed half as good;
Lacase—lacase, is the thought of his mind,
When he flies to his love like the breath of the wind.

When the singing ceased the band struck up another tune, to correspond with the change in the dance. Commencing at the lower end of the set, each couple wheeled off in turn, and the gentleman was seen holding up one or more fingers of each, and sometimes all, of both hands, signifying thereby how many pieces of coin he would give for the mistress of his heart. As the maiden nodded assent, her partner saluted her with a kiss, and they withdrew to mingle with the rest of the company. This ceremony had been performed until there was but one pair remaining, who by their graceful movements and the superior richness of their dress claimed particular notice; and it was with a general expression of applause and joy, that Cahoola led to his seat the beautiful Ardesah, to whom he was betrothed.

Several days had elapsed after this celebration, when on one of those fresh and delightful mornings peculiar to the climate of Java, where nature presents the brightest aspect of life and luxuriance, Ardesah was sitting alone near her mother, with dejection visible in her looks.

"Why is thy face sad, my child, like one of the children of sorrow?" said the fond parent as she looked upon her daughter.

"I could not but be sad, mother, when I thought that there was no safety on earth, and no bright happiness in heaven."

"How, Ardesah?"

"As I slept last night," replied the damsel, "I dreamed that I was on a weary journey. The path I travelled was ornamented with flowers, and every thing was pleasant to behold; but I looked at the sky, and the light of the sun became suddenly as thick darkness, and filled me with terror. As I proceeded, all was gloom around me; the solid ground shook, and gave way, and I sank into an abyss, and methought I was lost to you for ever!"

"Child," said the mother, "will you be troubled with a vision? Is not the sun bright and the earth beautiful, and thou art distressed?"

* The Tung-lah of the Chinese. † Boy, youth. ‡ Torch, the natives carry in dark nights. § Young lady. ‖ Haste, speed.

Such were the words of consolation offered, but the maiden could not easily be soothed, as she felt more than she was willing to avow.

"Can it be," she softly breathed to herself, "Nieponogoro—Caboola?" and she burst into tears.

During this scene of imaginary distress and maternal solicitude, a more obvious and reasonable cause of anxiety appeared in the agitation which was visible around the palace and in the city. News was received from the army, and all were concerned to know the result, and to hear tidings of the king. When the waiting multitude understood that the troops were defeated, and that the monarch was a captive, the cries of regret and despair were raised by the disappointed and dejected people. Confirmatory accounts of the disastrous intelligence were shortly obtained, by a deputation which was sent by the king himself. He informed Nieponogoro of the particulars of the battle, alleged the defectiveness of the arms and ammunition he had had, and the inexperience of his men, in contending against the well appointed and regularly disciplined forces of the Dutch. He extolled the bravery of his soldiers, and lamented the unfortunate defeat; and alluding to the state of the nation and the hopelessness of their cause, he urged upon him, as a condition of his release from captivity, an entire submission to the enemy, with whom they were unable to contend.

These humiliating proposals had a greater effect upon the feelings of the indignant prince, than the destruction of the army. He became desperate with rage, and breathed nothing but vengeance; and the first step he took was to order the deputies to be put to death. He then convoked an assembly of the people, and appeared before them, accompanied with his body guard, and attended in person only by Caboola. He addressed the audience upon the unfortunate and unexpected change in the affairs of the state. He related the object of the embassy which had lately been received, and reprobated the cowardice and defection of his father, whom he denounced as a traitor.

"Shall we," said he, "ever yield to our oppressors, who have no right to rule over us? Have we been defeated? We are not vanquished. Is our cause weak? Brave men will make it strong. The blood of my heart shall be shed in your defence, and my family shall be offered up and slain, but we will never submit."

As he uttered this he seized his son, who was standing by his side, and drawing forth his gollock,* said to the affrighted youth, "You must die, Caboola, to appease the offended gods of heaven." With this hasty notice, at a single blow the head was severed from the body by the father himself, who, as he held it up, yet gushing with the living blood, he called upon a part of his guard, and said, "Take this to the dastard king, and say to him, 'Judge if he who spares not his own son is afraid to hazard his life, or will ever yield to the enemies of his country!'"

The shouts of the savage assembly applauded this brutal act of heroism and zeal, and the company dispersed with acclamations for vengeance and victory. The approbation which was at this moment bestowed upon this act of cruelty and murder by the hand of a parent, was speedily revoked, in the re-action which took place in the public mind. The people mourned for the premature and unworthy destiny which bereft them of a beloved object; and the sternness and ferocity of Nieponogoro himself gave way to feelings of compunctious remorse and regret, as he wept for the loss of a son whom he had sacrificed on account of a father he really loved and an enemy he heartily contemned.

The account of Caboola's death could not long be concealed from Ardesah, whose mother dreaded the effect it might have upon her. She received the intelligence with surprise and dismay, and her cries became frantic in her importunity, at least to see and embrace the headless body of her lover. As these paroxysms subsided, she felt the less impassioned but keener bitterness of grief, when she remembered the premonition of the tragical event she had had in her dream, when it appeared to her that the pillar of the earth was shaken, and the light of the sun was extinct.

The caresses and assiduity of her friends were constant in soothing her distress, and the unhappy maiden, after a short time, wore the appearance of silent resignation and content in her countenance. Her composure, however, was that which proceeded rather from some settled purpose of mind than from reconciled feeling.

As Ardesah was sitting alone in her apartment a forced smile was visible in her looks, as her servant in haste and secrecy handed her a small case, made of bamboo, and immediately retreated. She took it, and as she viewed it said, "This is my consolation and the end of my unhappiness."

Her hair was thrown loosely back, but her dress was arranged with unusual neatness. For a moment her bosom heaved with agitation, and she seemed absorbed in almost breathless supplication to the deities she had been accustomed to worship from infancy. This act of piety being over, the case was applied to her mouth, and having swallowed its contents, she hastily ran to her mother, and throwing herself at her feet said,

"I go to seek him."

"Ardesah!—oh! my child," exclaimed the parent, as she held her close in her arms, "there is death in thy looks."

"Cassa cire," (give me water,) feebly uttered the expiring girl, as she rolled back her eyes, which with their last light seemed to look in upon the darkness and desolation of her bosom.

Her trembling lips were scarcely bathed in the cooling fluid when she faintly observed, "Suda—bagoose," (it is enough—good,) and she became united to her betrothed lover in the wedlock of death.

It afterwards was known that the fatal potion she used was obtained from the bohun-upas, concerning which many fabulous accounts are related, such as its casting for miles around a deadly atmosphere, &c. But it is certain that the expressed juice alone of that tree is poisonous.

When these tragedies had occurred, Nieponogoro was apprehensive that the public feeling would be turned against him. But the atrocities which proceeded from his own violence he dexterously managed to charge to the account of the enemy, and to urge them upon the people as additional motives for hostility and revenge.

The war is still going on with spirit, and the old king, having no one to intercede for him, continues a dejected captive in the hands of the Dutch.

THE FINE ARTS.

SWIFT AS THE LIGHTNING'S GLANCE.

THE FAIRY KING'S SONG.

THE song inserted to-day is a beautiful melody given by Weber to the king of the fairies, Oberon. He conveys Sir Huon of Bourdeaux and his bride, by dint of magic, from Tunis to France, in less time than we can write the same; previous to which he returns thanks for all kindness in this musical adieu. The obligation which the "grateful fairy" considers himself under to Sir Huon is the reconciliation which that knight accomplishes between Oberon and his queen Titania. It seems they had a violent dispute and a separation, caused by a difference of opinion touching the constancy and strength of affection of the sexes. Oberon stoutly maintaining that the lords of creation were superior, and Titania obstinately denying the fact. In the heat and excitation of argument, they made a mutual vow, that until either of them could find a perfect sample of their sex, they would live estranged from each other. Sir Huon of Bourdeaux is the male picture of excellence, and Reiza his bride the female specimen, and to prove their merits, Oberon raises all kinds of impediments and difficulties, which however their firmness and constancy enable them to surmount; consequently the unfortunate vow is annulled, and the two fairies are again made happy.

In taking leave of this great author, and the charming melodies which we have presented to the public through the vehicle of the Mirror, and which to most of its readers were hitherto unknown, we may be forgiven for adding a parting word. In a community which gives such promise of musical attainment, and where the adoption of musical study has so immediately attended the introduction of the art, it is highly interesting to one enamoured of that art, to mark its progress; and doubly interesting to such an individual to lend his aid zealously, but probably feebly, towards the direction of a taste which is still in its infancy. That the five given compositions are of the highest grade, and that the melodies are beautiful, and the sentiment of the poetry finely illustrated by them, we think cannot admit of dispute. We have been taught to believe and feel that poetry and music ought to be combined, to form a pleasing composition. The Italians, Germans, and French, prefer opera in their own languages. Then why should not we do the same in ours? The affection so prevalent among certain persons, of admiration for Italian music, is for the most part pseudo-sentimental; we do not disguise that the Italian school boasts of a far greater number of fine masters than any other school existing; but to feel their compositions, requires either a knowledge of the science or of the language, without which the general hearer can derive no real satisfaction, and an affectation of the same is merely a silly attempt to ape the taste of some person who is really qualified in these particulars. On the contrary, any individual gifted with a tolerable ear, can appreciate sweet sounds which expressively convey some peculiar sentiment in a language with which he is familiar; and surely common sense points out that the true road to good and sound musical taste, is that which is founded on a knowledge of the best authors who have written in our own tongue. When these are known, far be it from us to abridge the student of a desire to become acquainted with the harmony and melody of foreigners; on the contrary, for a finished musician, it is highly laudable; but all affectation of discarding the compositions of great masters of our own school, in order to, parrot-like, learn the words and apply them ignorantly to the notes of Italian musicians, is a vicious and diseased state of taste, against which it is our duty to protest. MR. CHARLES KEAN.

WE agree generally with the following remarks of our correspondent, and if we offer any of our own, we do so because we are not willing to leave entirely to another the agreeable office of greeting this young candidate for public favour, with assurances of a brilliant career. He is yet under twenty years, but has evidently studied deeply, and has already acquired power which, perhaps, no other individual of his age ever possessed. His readings are not only uniformly correct, they are impressive and beautiful. His singular resemblance to his father is not imitation, but is a mere natural similarity, which flashes upon the audience occasionally through his own original style; and instead of being an obstacle to his future fame, should be only considered as the perpetuated spark of that fire which in the other is so nearly extinguished. There is no doubt but that he will soon become an universal favourite with the public; and if the reiterated peals of applause with which his finely executed conceptions were received form any criterion, his progress to the most distinguished rank in his profession will be both sure and speedy.—Ed.

RICHARD III.—MR. C. KEAN'S FIRST APPEARANCE.

On the second instant the Park theatre opened for the season with Richard III. The great attraction of the evening was the début in America of Charles Kean, the son of the celebrated tragedian. The occasion brought together an overflowing audience, who manifested an intense anxiety to witness his performance. He was received with the most animated and repeated acclamations, which in a few moments died away into deep silence. It was an interesting crisis to all, and must have been powerfully so to the stranger, who had recently sought our shores, and now exposed himself to a comparison with one of the most extraordinary and distinguished actors that ever wielded the passions and feelings of thousands at his pleasure. It is but reasonable to suppose, that he must have laboured under an embarrassment sufficiently benumbing to paralyze for the instant all his energies; and we confess, as he proceeded in the opening soliloquy, we were crossed with a conviction, that the endeavour of the youth before us to measure himself with the wonderful genius of the father, must prove altogether feeble and hopeless. As he proceeded, however, he appeared to gain new powers, and gradually to become warmed with his part. His diffidence vanished before the bursts of approbation with which the lofty dame continually resounded; and when the curtain fell, we were fully of the opinion that he possessed a talent to command success. It cannot be expected that we should at so early a period enter into any analysis of his style. It is certain, however, that it is the result of much study, reflection, and observation; that he has been in an excellent school, where the redundancies and errors which generally accompany genius, have been carefully restrained and corrected. His attitudes and gestures are appropriate and beautiful; his voice is not loud, but pleasing and well managed; and we were astonished that one so young should be able to delineate so forcibly the most stirring and convulsive passions. There were times when he gained a powerful hold upon the attention of his hearers, particularly in those passages where the feelings can no longer find vent by the ordinary ways of physical exertion; but where the long pause, the deep under-tone, and the fine play of the speaking countenance, betray the workings of the soul within.

We cannot accuse him of any servile imitation of his father, but the strange and striking resemblance between them was very perceptible, and, to the warm admirers of the absent veteran, sometimes assumed the appearance of magic. It does not consist in any peculiar manner of reading, or method of rendering any disputed point, but it is in the roll of the eye, the sneer of the lip, and the whole contour of the face and form. Mr. C. Kean has fewer faults than his father, and such as he does possess, will doubtless rapidly disappear before moderate and judicious criticism. He has a habit of lifting his eyes rather frequently to the audience, which, of course, he should entirely forget; but this, in so young an aspirant, and under circumstances of such peculiar interest, we are not disposed to wonder at, but rather to hope, that, in the numerous strange physiognomies which there meet his gaze, he read nothing more alarming than a wish to afford him an impartial trial. He has, however, passed the ordeal, and his acting will, doubtless, profit by the confidence which must have resulted from his first efforts before the American public.

NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.—C. KEAN'S SECOND NIGHT.

Although there be in the leading part, as well as in the whole of this play, wonderful dramatic effectiveness, yet the author has placed the actor in the peculiar situation of personating what never can by any possibility be called a natural character; and hence, in some scenes particularly, he has to bear up against a feeling on the part of an enlightened audience, something approaching to indifference or contempt for an endeavour to impose upon their credulity. It is very true that an auditor does not enter the walls of a theatre with a disposition to weigh probabilities or improbabilities very nicely; but the understanding, it must not be forgotten, is the only key to the heart. Sir Giles Overreach in few words, and some of those his own, for the sake of giving to his daughter the title of right honourable, and consequently enabling his progeny to vie with, nay, to triumph over, some of the genuine old stock nobility, (mortifications from whom he had often suffered,) jeers at the orphan's tears, laughs at the widow's curse, and risks his reputation here and his hopes of an hereafter. Avarice, revenge, envy, and scorn, have all in turn become foundations for a dramatic superstructure; and ambition is a prolific theatrical theme; but so rank and hot a lust for a mere name is "not and unnatural." But to business.—As it regards Mr. C. Kean, the fiery ordeal is passed—it is now no longer a question whether he shall be placed in the first class of actors, even resting his reputation upon the two parts already personated. The bold points of this terrific play were developed by our new acquaintance with skill and power, and we were highly gratified in witnessing the confirmation of his success on Wednesday night by a new audience. Mr. C. Kean may be now considered safe so far, and it only remains to determine the precise degree of his excellence. We see no veto which can be pushed in his face, to forbid him from modelling himself upon his father's bust. Vandervelde the younger is not charged with plagiarism from Vandervelde the elder, although his early lessons in marine views were received from his father; and considering that Mr. C. Kean is not yet of age, his judgment, the quality to be least looked for in a very young man, is very wonderful. Indeed we almost regret that before "the gristle of youth is quite hardened into the bone of manhood," he should be able to draw upon his physical resources for such tremendous bursts of passion as they can hardly yet furnish; and we attribute his evident fatigue in the last act to that cause. In confirmation of the opinion given above, we adduce the relenting of paternal affection which occasionally softened the delivery of his harsh and brutal instructions to his daughter; and we noticed the tones of the voice to shape themselves to this with great flexibility. When the crisis in the third act, so trying to the powers of an actor personating Sir Giles, arrived, no fault could be found either with conception or execution; the first shock over of the blank deed, the faculties gradually rally themselves to look for the cause; the suspicions hastily thrown upon Wellborn, the fierce and commanding, and subsequently imploring and abject manner towards Marall, the ultimate fits of ungovernable passion, the final paroxysm, the hysteric laugh, the groan, and syncope—all these were unexceptionable in point of judgment, although the degree of positive power in comparison with his father may be disputed. It remains only to say, that the most efficient assistance was given by the corps generally in all the under parts; a strong conviction of which we do not the less entertain because we do not particularize names.

MISS CLARA FISHER'S FIRST APPEARANCE THIS SEASON.

A large and fashionable audience assembled on Monday evening to witness the first performance this season of "everybody's favourite," Miss Clara Fisher. She appeared in the character of Beatrice in Shakespeare's comedy of "Much ado about nothing." The part of Benedict was sustained by Mr. Caldwell, of the New-Orleans theatre. The amusing after-piece of the "Invincibles" was also produced, for the purpose of introducing Miss Fisher as Victoire, one of those playful and happy exhibitions of beautiful and graceful acting, for which this young girl has become so deservedly celebrated. We do not deem Beatrice a part calculated to display her powers to the greatest advantage, although it may be observed of her, that even when the decree of the manager takes her from the range of the drama for which nature and study have fitted her, she is still correct, interesting, and delightful; never losing sight of the good sense which may be found tempering her most unaccustomed as well as her most familiar and successful efforts. The scene where she beseeches Benedict to kill Claudio is precisely of a kind most opposite to her powers. Neither nature nor education has fashioned the charming and youthful creature before us to portray the blood-thirstiness of that amiable lady. Yet even here, although of all the circumstances in which fancy could picture her, that of "eating a man's heart in the market place," would be the last, she was admirable, particularly towards the close of the scene; and, altogether contrary to our expectations, just what she should have been.

In Victoire she was, as usual, full of grace and spirit. We should like to see her perform with young Kean. Such an arrangement could not fail to afford universal satisfaction. The most beautiful characteristic of the style of her acting is the play of her features, the continued and continually changing expressions which follow each other over her face, with all the different shades of feeling and passion, of surprise, fear, hope, archness, and anger, which it is her wish to represent. Her countenance seems as admirably created for the display of all the varying operations of the soul, as a stream in summer, to reflect the images of the scenery above and around it. For example, watch her looks when she snatches the stanzas from Benedict, the joy and triumph beaming in her eyes, and the light of successful vanity and love gleaming altogether from her radiant face; then, when her own verses are produced, and seized by Benedict, mark the change—rapid and complete as the workings of thought—and then the gradual yielding, as the archness and merriment break forth again, and she accepts him—"out of pity, for they told me you were in a consumption!" Again, in the little corporal, when she comes forward disappointed, angry, and perplexed, and suddenly thinks of the general's letter, which that incautious old gentleman had committed to her care. How palpably you may read her thoughts, as she turns it over and over again—starts, listens, and exclaims, "Oh! it is open!" These sweet touches of nature are scattered all over her representations, as thick as wild flowers in a summer meadow. We have never seen them equalled; and however there may be parts too cumbersome for her management, which require stronger physical construction, and a loftier style of imagination, the drama abounds with characters of the most agreeable description, which may be appropriated exclusively to her. She is the cherished favourite of the public, and holds a place in their esteem, which it will take any other many a long year to reach.

OTHELLO.—C. KEAN'S THIRD NIGHT.

Of all the characters of the drama no one is more difficult to portray than that of the Moor of Venice; accordingly we prepared ourselves to witness a performance on the part of Mr. C. Kean, which would either confirm or weaken our opinion of his talents. It behoves us, in strict justice, to add, that his delineation of the sea of passions, on which the unhappy chieftain is lost, was, generally speaking, highly to his credit. Were we to give the meed of unqualified praise to this gentleman, we should fall into the error too common to writers in this country, who magnify their respective favourites into that perfection which lasts until it comes into collision with talent that has stood the ordeal; and then, being weighed in the balance against metal with which it ought never to have competed, is found wanting; and its total desertion afterwards is perhaps as unmerited as its sudden and portentous rise. To avoid this in the case of Mr. C. Kean, shall be our endeavour. In our enthusiasm at witnessing this young man treading in the footsteps of his father, perfected in his studies beyond any person who has numbered the same years, and speaking our language with correctness and beauty, let us nevertheless frankly confess, that if we scan his Othello with an impartial eye, we must pronounce it an unequal performance. The farewell, although correctly read, did not give us that idea of heart-broken despair, which the elder Kean used to impart to it with irresistible power; and we complain of a good deal of monotony in his delivery of the dialogue in the bed-chamber scene, both previous to and after the murder; it seems to us that a too precise and lengthened delivery in a scene where so many conflicting passions are struggling for mastery, is calculated to injure the effect. On the other hand, his acting in the scenes with Iago, and the gradual awakening of his suspicions, the almost insanity which bursts forth when they become gradually matured, were given with the fidelity and force of a veteran actor. In short, we hail Mr. C. Kean as a son worthy of the first actor of the age, who bids fair to arrive at the summit of his profession. Q.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

OPERATION FOR BLINDNESS FROM SIGHT.—Dr. Maunoir, of Geneva, has lately performed this operation on a boy eight years of age, who had from his birth been affected with cataract in both eyes. The pupils, which were very sensible to light, had been dilated by extract of belladonna. Both eyes were operated upon on the same day, and by the same method, viz. keratodialis. No unfavourable symptoms followed the operation, and after a short time, the fragments of the lenses having been completely absorbed, the patient had the full use of his eyes. The results of the experiments made upon him soon after the acquirement of his new sense, for the most part coincide with those obtained by Cheselden and Wardrop. The eyes required to be exercised for a considerable time before the individual could judge correctly of distance and form, and the difference of colours. He learnt, however, to form a correct estimation of the latter much quicker than of the former, and very soon fell into mistakes, by drawing his inferences from colour extensively; thus he took a piece of blue paper for a steel knife, &c.

PARIS ACADEMY OF SCIENCE.—At the last sitting of this society, a child was introduced who had lost, by gangrenous inflammation, the right cheek, the lower lip, and a part of the chin. In this horrible state, M. Dupuytren took the child in hand, and by means of a portion of flesh and skin taken from the neck, and placed over the denuded parts, succeeded in obtaining an union and restoring them, so that when the child was presented to the academy, although disfigured, there was nothing repulsive in his appearance.—At the last sitting a long discussion ensued on the discovery of some bones of the extinct bird, which was known in the Isle of France, up to the year 1630, under the name of dromite and dodart. M. Cuvier took this opportunity of stating, that among the animals now extinct, we may place two species of crocodiles, of which several embalmed specimens have been found in Egypt.

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.—Mr. Lichental, a piano-forte maker, of Ghent, has invented a new instrument, called piano-viole, in which, with all the execution of the piano-forte, the sounds of the violoncello may be obtained with the same degree of continuity. The chords are played upon with a bow moved by the keys.

STEAM CARRIAGES.—A steam carriage has been built at Leipsic, which is to run between that place and Dresden. It was to commence running on the first of July. The saving in time is expected to be about one half. The Dresden letter from which we take this information says, that this carriage is provided with an apparatus for discharging the smoke imperceptibly, so as to prevent alarm to horses on the road.

DOMESTIC ANIMALS.—M. Dureau Delamalle recently read to the French Academy a memoir, the object of which was to show that domestic animals are capable of more extensive development of the intellectual faculties than is commonly supposed; that they have, although within limits not yet ascertained, instinctive qualities, powers of imitation, memory, will, deliberation and judgment; that the individual, and even the race are improvable by the state of knowledge of the persons with whom they live, by education, by their wants, by their dangers, and, in order to generalize the proposition, by the circumstances in which they are placed; and that many of the qualities which are considered instinctive, are, in fact, qualities acquired by their powers of imitation, and that certain acts attributed to instinct, are acts of choice, resulting from intelligence, memory, and judgment. M. Delamalle sustains these various propositions by a number of very curious facts.

POTATOES.—A fact has recently been promulgated in France, with respect to the growth of that useful root, the potato. By nipping off the flowers after they are fully blown, an increase of fully one-third may, it is said, be anticipated in the crop.

For the Mirror.

THINK NOT, THOUGH FATE HAS SEVERED US.

"Oh no, we never mention her."

THINK not, though fate has severed us,
That I can e'er forget:
There's not a smile, there's not a word
But memory treasures yet.
In vain may science spread her page,
Her charms are lost to me;
In festive halls, or silent shades,
Thought flies alone to thee.

Oh give me not the blooming wreath,
To twine around my hair;
It would but mock my dreary heart
To see its lustre there:
Nor ask me why no longer beams
My eye as once it shone,
I would not have a ray left there
When every joy has flown.

Oh ask me not the song to give,
Which once I held so dear;
No, not a note my lip shall breathe,
But those he loved to hear.
Can music with its magic warm
The heart by sorrow chilled?
Or gems restore the smiling peace
That once my bosom filled?

My mind may sink, my cheek may fade,
"As flowers beneath the blast,"
But love like mine time cannot change
Whilst life and reason last.
When thought restores the parting hour,
When last thy look I met,
'Tis seen through tears that hallowed it,
And how can I forget?

THE RAMBLER.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE,

ADDRESSED TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Voyage.

"Them as goes to sea for pleasure, will go to — for pastime."—Sailor's Proverb.

WASHINGTON IRVING crossed the Atlantic, and wrote a beautiful little piece thereupon, entitled "The Voyage," which delighted every one. The natural consequences ensued. All the gentlemen who crossed the Atlantic afterwards, concluded to do as Washington Irving had done, and delight every one likewise, so that in the course of a short time there was no scarcity of marine narratives; and the dwellers in great cities, on both sides, had very particular information afforded them of the perils of such as "went down to the sea in ships" during the summer months. These adventurous men and predestined authors kept a regular diary of the days on which they ate lamb, and the days on which they ate chicken, and the days on which the pecuniary concerns of the captain were benefited by the disorganized state of their internals, and they subsisted on rice-water and hope: they severally furnished a description of the ocean in a calm and a description of the ocean in a storm, for which latter purpose the ocean was afflicted with more storms from May to September than sailors ever heard tell of. They stated, for the first time, that the sea was the "symbol of immensity"—that the water was green on soundings, and "cerulean blue" off; and added their testimony, founded upon actual observation, to the mass of evidence already before the world, that it contained many whales, sharks, porpoises, and other fishes, to which were appended brief touches of natural history as they went along, and invariably a piece of fine writing concerning "sunset on the ocean," giving an account how that every-day luminary "goes down behind the wilderness of waters." They, moreover, let the reader have a minute insight into the state of their feelings, the workings of their bosoms, &c. as they leaned over the ship's side, gazed upon the vasty deep, and thought of the friends and home they had left behind them; and also their vague and very extraordinary speculations concerning the land that lay before them—all which, is it not to be found expanded over an infinite number of pages in the infinite number of "Letters from Europe," which quietly repose on the back shelves of the establishments of Messrs. Bliss and Carvill, Broadway, and other incautious booksellers?

Such being the state of things, it would ill become an humble individual to affect singularity by breaking through an established rule; and the subscriber therefore, under the impression that it is a debt due to decorum and mankind, proceeds to inform the human race of what he saw and suffered. If I am not as interestingly minute as some of my predecessors, it must be attributed to the unfortunate fact of having lost a valuable "daily journal" overboard, in which the most trivial circumstances were carefully noted down, with appropriate moral reflections attached to each, and the following are therefore merely general recollections thrown together without order or discrimination.

In the first place, I hate the sea as much as the father of lies is said, in catholic countries, to hate holy water; and, notwithstanding all the fine poetry that has been written about it, think it, in every respect, the greatest bore in creation. To me, to be

"Once more upon the waters, yet once more,"

brings a miserable feeling of lassitude and confinement, rather than of freedom and exultation. It is the most dreary, weary, dull, monotonous, unsocial place upon which human beings, with any kindly warmth in their hearts or blood, can sojourn. There is not any thing with which the imprisoned spirit can sympathize. On land, though that land be as sterile and barren as the banks of the river Jordan, or the most unfertile parts about Cape Cod, there is still some inanimate object or other to which the heart can attach itself—a rock, a tree, a bubbling spring, which, after familiarity hath made it pleasant to the eye, we are loth to leave behind and glad to see again. Sterne hath beautifully, and no less beautifully than truly said, that man must love one thing or another, and that for his own part, were he in a desert he would love some cypress; but his affections would be sadly puzzled on what to affix themselves in the watery deserts which separate country from country. The dark waves keep tumbling over and over each other, for ever changing yet still the same, till the fatigued eye turns sickeningly away from this very blue prospect. You even feel sorry for the sullen, noiseless birds that keep eternally wheeling and floating above the curling billows, and regret the doom allotted them to figuratively seek "their bread upon the waters," or, what is pretty much the same thing to them—their fish. With all their exemption from the murderous sports of man, how unenviable seems their fate, compared with that of the land birds. They have no constant mate expecting them at evening time—no home—no warm nest into which they may creep and fold their weary wings and be at rest; but when the close of day puts an end to their piscatory pursuits, they squat themselves down upon the cheerless waters with but small assurance of being a live bird in the morning, should some shark or other fowl-loving fish pass that way before they are awake and on the wing. Well; there is retribution in the deed—why should not the destroyer be destroyed? they have preyed upon fish, why not fish prey upon them?

To all who rave and make poetry about the beauty and delights of a summer sea, I especially recommend the middle of the Atlantic during what is appropriately enough termed "a dead calm"—the ship rolling lazily and heavily from side to side, the sails flapping drowsily against the masts, and a burning, blistering sun sucking the melted pitch and rosin out of the seams of the deck. Of all the suicidal situations in which man can be placed, I think this decidedly the most tempting; and believe, if life could be ended by a wish, few of the unhappy passengers would see the shore again; but fortunately it requires some little energy—some slight exertion to drown yourself, and really you are so very listless—so completely unstrung, that a man cannot be at the trouble of tumbling himself overboard. But then, cries the landsman, what a delightful resource must books be in such a situation. Alas! alas! your mind is as debilitated as your body, and just as incapable of bending its faculties to a salutary purpose. Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, or any thing nervous or exciting, is not to be borne; and about the strongest mental food that the mind can digest in this predicament is a diluted love-story in an "Annual." I, for one, am very fond of reading, but I could not do it here: I laid myself down on the deck, ate almonds and raisins, and thought of Job.

Some people prefer a storm to a calm; but their demerits are so equally balanced, that, like the Frenchman who had to choose between hanging and drowning, I cannot make up my mind to give the preference to either. True, the roaring of the wind, the tearing and splitting of the sails, the violent evolutions of the vessel, and the unique blasphemies which strike the ear from various quarters, with the probability of speedily being among the fishes, tend to arouse the spirit, and stir up, as counsellor Philips might say, "the green and stagnant waters of the soul;" while the yesty ocean, ever and anon dashing over the ship and wetting you to the skin, is unquestionably sublime; but some how or other I never could relish the sublime much when it interfered materially with my personal comforts, and am unromantic enough to own that I would rather be seated snugly in a decent inn at the foot of a Swiss mountain than identifying myself with the icicles at the top of it; so, in a storm, I hold it to be a better thing to go below, doff your drenched garments, fix your berth so that you cannot roll an inch either one way or the other, and quietly betake yourself to the arms of Morpheus, rather than stand gazing at the unceremonious ocean, who repays your sincere admiration in a very unhandsome manner by throwing cold water in your face.

No—the sea, whether in storm or calm, or enveloped in fog, or in its most favourable state curled with a fresh fair breeze, has mighty few attractions to those who spend more than six hours upon it at a time. Our captain, an old sailor, declared that every day he passed there he considered as a blank in his existence, and the proverb quoted at the beginning speaks volumes. What is there in this be-praised element to give pleasure? In crossing the Atlantic all your amusements are not such as are connected with the sea, but such as serve to draw your attention from it. Chess or draughts, backgammon or cards, are the resources called in to while away the tedious hours; for after you have seen one of mother Cary's chickens, a shoal of porpoises, a shark, and a whale, you have seen about all that is to be seen. At first, like other landmen, I was very desirous to "see a whale;" but I soon found that, according to the laws of optics, a porpoise alongside of the ship was just as large and as good a sight as a whale half a mile off, which is about as near as they generally venture; while all you mostly see of the rascally sharks is a fin, or the ridge of a brown back peeping above the water. The eye tires of even the finest prospect; but here you are compelled to gaze day after day on water and sky, and all that can be said of the former is, that it is very blue and that there is a great quantity of it.

It may be thought from this that I am no friend or admirer of the sea; but few like it more than I do on the land, the only place, I believe, where people really fall in love with it. Nothing can be finer than to live in a highly cultivated tract of country merely separated from the sea-coast by a high range of sand-hills. The change in the scenery is so instantaneous, and so complete—so very different, yet both so surpassingly beautiful, for few things can excel, in picturesque effect, a bold and animated line of coast. How freshening it is in the summer time, after roaming through orchards, meadows, and cornfields, to cross the barren sand-hills and find yourself on the lone sea-beach, with no human being within sight or hearing. How pleasant to roam along to some favourite spot and there lie and watch the clear sparkling tide come rolling in over the smooth sand, forcing its way swiftly up a hundred tiny channels—to dream over again all the wild legends of the mighty element before you—the storm the battle and the wreck, and the hair-breadth escapes of those who have been cast away upon it—to be lulled to slumber by the murmur of the slight waves breaking upon the shore, and making most sweet yet drowsy music in your ear—this is delightful; and I have even enough of the hardihood of boyhood to love it in its rougher moods—on a raw and gusty November day, when the sea-gull comes screaming to the cliffs for shelter, when the wave bursts in thunder at your feet, and the thick fog is whirled from the water like smoke by the tempest—on such a day there is something far from unpleasant in standing on terra firma and watching its manœuvres. Besides, it is such a glorious preparative for a warm, comfortable fire-side and a hearty supper—but from passing any length of time on it in ships, or other smaller vessels called, for unknown reasons, pleasure-boats, heaven preserve me and my posterity, (should I have any.)

I have by no means drawn a jaundiced picture, discoloured through the agency of disturbed bile, for though occasionally visited by that most horrible of afflictions, sea-sickness, I am better off in that respect than nineteen out of twenty. What must be the state of those wretched individuals who add enduring sickness or continual qualms to their other stock of sea comforts, I cannot even venture to conjecture. Shakespeare says,

*"There is a soul of goodness in things evil
Would men observingly distill it out;"*

and certainly nothing is so admirably calculated to strip death of all its terrors, and make men meet it with perfect indifference, yea, satisfaction, as a substantial fit of sea-sickness. Persons thoroughly in this state will receive any intimation of the probability of the ship's going down with perfect unconcern—they do not set their life at a "pin's fee." Some Athenian said, when he found the comfortless way in which the Spartans lived, that he no longer wondered at their fearing death so little; and it is only on this principle that I can account for the unnatural tranquillity with which men hear of the chance of running foul of an iceberg, or any other agreeable casualty; while half the peril when on land quietly enjoying the good things of the world, would perturb their spirits considerably, and cause many retrospective glances towards their past state of existence, and great dubiousity touching their future prospects.

Land ho! we have just come in sight of the southern point of Ireland—a few more hours will bring us into the English channel, and the unbounded joy of all on board is the best commentary on the pleasures of the sea. Ah! land, land! we all gaze upon the country of turf and potatoes as wistfully as if it were one of the "islands of the blest;" and the snuffing of the cow in the long boat, as she scents the green herbage afar off, approximates towards the borders of the pathetic. I am circumspect in the choice of my company, and it is consequently seldom that I have any thing to say to the "heavenly nine" or they to me; but on the present occasion I felt something unusual the matter with my brain, and as soon as the evening shades fell, and I could see land no longer, it relieved itself by the following effervescence.

LINES ON COMING IN SIGHT OF LAND.

"Land, land ahead!" the seaman cries,
"Land, land!" re-echoes round:
And happy smiles and glistening eyes
Repay that joyful sound.
The dull and cheerless sea is past—
The warm earth meets our view at last,
With summer's glories crown'd.
Now ill beshrew the twilight gray,
That shrouds it from my sight away!
Well, let it fade, as fades the light
Along the sullen sea;
Yet through the watches of the night
My thoughts will turn to thee.
The fresh green fields—the swelling hills—
The music of the gushing rills—
The humming of the bee:
And scenes and sounds to memory dear,
Are in mine eye and in mine ear.
The carol of the merry lark
Rings through the morning air;
The honest sheep-dog's wary bark
Guarding with watchful care
His flocks upon the green hill's side:
The milkmaid too, with modest pride
And pretty anklet bare,
Tripping along the dewy green,
Is no unpleasant sight, I ween.
These, and ten thousand scenes like these,
Are passing o'er thy breast.
Oh for the wave of thy green trees
To shade my noontide rest!
The pleasant rustling of the leaves,
The warbling of the bird, that weaves
Above me its trim nest—
While cooling breezes float along
Laden with fragrance and with song.
And glorious autumn's golden fruits,
And summer's lingering flowers,
And the sweet woodbine's fragrant odour,
Twining round rustic bowers;
And friends long loved through absent years—
And kind eyes sparkling mid their tears,
Like April's sun and showers—
Await me here. Come, heart, to swell!
Thou salt and bitter sea, farewell!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

AGES OF EUROPEAN KINGS.

The oldest sovereign is Charles X. late king of France, who is seventy-three years of age, tall in person, and very hale. The Pope, Pius VIII. is sixty-eight, and in tolerable vigour. Bernadotte, king of Sweden, is sixty-six, and has recently had a severe illness, but is a strong and healthy man. The next is William IV. of England, who is sixty-five, in good health, and does not appear to be more than fifty. Felix, king of Sardinia, is of the same age, and enjoys good health. Frederic VI. of Denmark, is sixty-two years old, and is a very healthy man. Frederic William III., king of Prussia, in his sixtieth year, possesses a good share of health, and bids fair to live to a good old age. The king of the Netherlands, William I., is fifty-eight; he has the appearance of a weather-beaten soldier, as he is; and, although subject to chronic complaints, is robust. Francis, emperor of Austria, is fifty-two, and healthy. Francis, king of Naples, is fifty-one, and gouty. Mahmoud II., sultan of Turkey, is forty-six, and possessed of great vigour of body and mind. His countenance and his eye are particularly striking and impressive, and he is naturally a very superior man. Ferdinand VII., of Spain, is forty-five years old, and has long been a prey to diseases. He has the gout constantly, and is quite incapable of any active exertion; he has, however, lately married his third queen. Louis, king of Bavaria, is in his forty-fifth year, and has lately recovered from a long illness; his merits as a sovereign and as a man of letters are acknowledged to be very high. Nicholas I., emperor of Russia, is thirty-four, is tall and handsome in appearance, hardy and active, and accustomed to laborious exertions. The youngest and only female sovereign is Donna Maria da Gloria, the legitimate queen of Portugal, who is in her thirteenth year. She promises to be beautiful, but her health is delicate, and she is very lame.

JEWISH LEGEND.

An emperor, who had little or no religion, called together the jews of his court, of whom there were many, and stated his determination that they should all come into the presence of his people, and prove whether judaism or christianity were the best religion: if the former were shown to be the best, the christians were to be slain; if the latter, the jews were to be destroyed. No sooner did the jews hear this than they fasted, put on sackcloth, and entreated one of the chief rabbis to prevail on the king to alter his intention. As, however, he was inflexible, the rabbi, whose name was Eliezer, asked if he would give him ten days time, and allow him to pay a visit to the court every day. To this the king acceded. Accordingly Eliezer came to see the emperor the next day: but he looked very much dejected and grieved, which the king observing, inquired the cause. To this Eliezer answered, "Before I left, some strangers called, who insisted I should settle some affairs for them which I know to be out of my power, and on my begging them not to trouble me, they departed." "Should they return to molest you," said the emperor, "let me know." And Eliezer, having offered his thanks, retired. The following day Eliezer said to one of his servants, "Take a cane in your hand and give me twenty stripes over my face, neck, and shoulders." At this the servant was astonished, and refused thus to punish so good a master; but at length, as the command could not be evaded, he obeyed, and the blood trickled down the rabbi's body, who immediately had his wounds dressed, and in this woful plight returned to the palace. As soon as he entered, the king inquired what had befallen him? "The two brothers I have named before," said Eliezer, "returned, and wished me to arbitrate between them; I told them I would do so as far as lay in my power, and asked them what they wished me to do. They inquired if I were not a judge of diamonds; I told them I was. One of the brothers then said, 'We have a kind father; he has given me a most beautiful and valuable diamond, and mine is the best.' 'No,' rejoined the other, 'the one that our father has bestowed on me is superior to yours; and this, O rabbi, is the affair we want you to settle.' On hearing this, I desired them to produce the diamonds, promising them to decide fairly; but they replied that their father was living in a distant country, that the diamonds were in his possession, and that they were not to receive them until a certain time. Astonished at their demanding my opinion under such circumstances, I remonstrated with them, when, to my great surprise, they violently assaulted me and gave me these wounds." No sooner had the rabbi made this statement, than the emperor and his nobles appeared exceedingly exasperated; and so enraged was the king that he was about to swear that the two brothers should die for their cruelty and folly; but Eliezer prevented him. "What!" exclaimed the emperor, "shall too such wretches live? He who acts thus is worthy of death!" "Stop, O king," replied Eliezer; "thou—thou art the man! Hast thou not issued a decree as to the two religions God has given to the world? Hast thou not threatened death to those who do not decide between them? And who can tell which is best until the end of time?" Brit. Mag.

AN ABSENT MAN.

There are few that have paid any attention to the finance of England, but must have heard of Dr. Robert Hamilton's Essay on the National Debt, which fell on the houses of parliament like a bombshell, or rather, which rose and illuminated their darkness like an orient sun. There are other writings of his, too, in which one knows not which most to admire, the profound and accurate science, the beautiful arrangement, or the clear expression; and yet this most profound and clear-headed philosophical thinker, and most amiable of men, became so completely absorbed in his own reflections, as to lose the perception of external things, and almost that of his own identity and existence. In public the man was a shadow. He pulled off his hat to his own wife in the streets, and apologized for not having the pleasure of her acquaintance; went to his classes in the college on the dark mornings, with one of her white stockings on the one leg, and one of his own black ones on the other; often spent the whole time of the meeting in moving from the table the hats of the students, which they as constantly returned; sometimes invited them to call on him, and then fined them for coming to insult him. He would run against a cow in the road, turn round, beg her pardon, "Madam," and hope she was not hurt. At other times he would run against posts, and chide them for not getting out of his way; and yet his conversation, at the same time, if any body happened to be with him, was perfect logic and perfect music. A volume might be filled with anecdotes of this amiable and excellent man, all tending to prove how wide the distinction is between first-rate thought, and that merely animal use of the organs of sense which prevents ungifted mortals from walking into wells. The fish-market at Aberdeen is still where it used to be near the Dee, and has a stream passing through it that falls into that river. The fish-women expose their wares in large baskets. The doctor one day marched into the place, where he was attracted by a curiously figured stone in a stack of chimneys. He advanced towards it till he was interrupted by one of the benches, from which, however, he tumbled a basket into the stream, and the fish which it contained were speedily borne towards their native element. The visage of the lady was instantly in lightning and her voice in thunder, but the object of her wrath was deaf to the loudest sounds, and blind to the most alarming colours. She stamped, gesticulated, and scolded; brought a crowd that filled the place; but the philosopher turned not from his eager gaze, and his inward meditations on the stone. While the woman's breath held good she did not seem to heed his indifference, but when that began to fail, and the violence of her acts moved not one muscle of the object, her rage felt no bounds; she seized him by the breast, and yelling in an effort of despair, "Speak to me, or I'll burst!" sank down in a state of complete exhaustion, and before she had recovered the doctor's reverie was over, and he had taken his departure.

HERALDIC BEARINGS.

The other day a one-horse two-wheeled car undulated past me, not so rapidly as to prevent me from observing on its door a spirited painting of Apollo and pair pursuing a "pathless way" through sky and clouds. The emblem is very apt for a coach pannel, more especially a one-horse car. The custom of fancy painting on coaches, long out of fashion, seems likely to be revived; and instead of the thrifty self-coloured travelling carriage, more useful than pretty, we may expect to be regaled with the sight of flying Cupids, non-descript birds, and nosebags gayer than even the incredible botanical discoveries of De Vaillant himself. Without pretending to much taste, I would venture to recommend the superiority of a fancy picture on a carriage, which, at all events, means something, over a silly coat of arms, which means nothing; unless it be that the antiquated dowager within the chariot wishes thus to prove to the world the antiquity of her family.

I had a grandfather, the reflection of which, and the contemplation of his coat of arms, a pelican feeding her young with her own blood, used to inspire my young mind with very lofty ideas—the holy land, crusading, sacrificing, &c. &c.—until I discovered that a near relative claimed public respect under the protection of a demi-lion rampant, and which he asserted to be the authentic family bearing. This led me to consider the silly vanity of both, and I now never look at a coat of arms without a titter of contempt.

The "port-cullis" reminds me always of a gridiron, the "martlet" of an old hen whose legs were crushed by a wheelbarrow; and I never see a "chevron" without thinking of a cow-house unthatched in a squall. An "escutcheon of pretence" reminds me of a bread and butter plate placed on the tops of the cups and saucers, in an overcharged tea-tray; and three "bezants" (pardon my vulgar imagination) are, for all the world, like a pawnbroker's sign. An "armed hand, proper," conveys to me no other idea than a butcher's paw and knife; and a "stag's head, caboshed," seems to indicate a miserable state of the carving science. In the "wreath," I discover the huge hank of party-coloured worsted, from which my old grandmother used to knit my winter stockings; and all manner of "darts and arrow heads" are to me an eyesore since the exciseman clapped his armorial bearing on a little key of whiskey, which my Scotch friends had sent me under the travelling cognomen of kipper salmon. If I regard any of the "fantasies" of heraldry with complacency, it is the race of "wyverns, griffins, and cockatrices," and, as my old schoolmaster used to say, "hoc genus omne;" they bring to my mind the days of my childhood, when my coppers and wonder were expended on gilded griffins, like man himself, made of clay, but with the slight difference of wooden legs and a tail, twisted like a smig round a prong.

I will not say that armorial bearings are always inappropriate and senseless: what could be more fitting to the corporation of Liverpool than their crest of an overgrown duck? an emblem of their good cheer. Yet, who can refrain from laughter, at the idea of an otherwise shrewd man giving his ten guineas to the herald's office for a search, to ascertain whether his grandfather had painted on his coach door a mule's head "coupeé," or a pig "sailant," pierced with a javelin through the vitals!

The motto, though seldom used, is the most sensible part of a coat of arms: Virtus sola nobilitas—Virescit vulnere virtus—Astra castra, numen lumen—and many others familiar to every one, convey a beautiful sentiment.

Heraldry was one of the play-things of the chivalric times, when the minds of all were too brutalized to be capable of distinguishing between real glory and the mere name of it. We read in that veritable history, "La Mort d'Arthur," that the renown of Sir Lancelot, Sir Tristram, Sir Lamdrake, and many other knights of the round table, was so great that the mere sight of their armorial bearings on their shields was sufficient to deter others from justing with them; and that often, to enjoy the sport of tilting at all comers, they entered the lists with plain shields. A coat of arms was of some value then, but its worth is sadly degenerated in modern times.

A dust-man no more respects the sixteen quartered paneled chariot than he does "Old Company Cart, No. 50," and would as soon upset the one as the other, when on the wrong side of the road; and my lord's "supporters" would aid him but little in an attempt to bully his butcher or his baker. Under these circumstances, I put it to the good sense of the carriage-keeping part of the community, the propriety of dispensing with their "arms," and following the laudable example stated in the commencement of this, and indulge their own taste and the public pleasure by fancy-painting their coaches. Courier.

NOTICES OF DISTINGUISHED PERSONS.

Jeremy Taylor, bishop of Down, said, one day, to a lady of his acquaintance, who had been very negligent of the education of her son, "Madam, if you do not choose to fill your boy's head with something, believe me, the devil will."

When Charles I. was pressed by the parliament to give way to a small catechism for children which they had composed, he said, "I assure you, gentlemen, I would license a doctrine at variance, sooner for men than I would for children; and I make it a great matter of conscience that children should not be corrupted in their first principles."

It is related by Count Segur, as a characteristic trait of Napoleon, that he possessed the faculty of throwing aside the most important occupations whenever he pleased, either for the sake of variety or rest; for in him the power of volition surpassed that of imagination. In this sense he was as much master of himself as he was of others.

Cardinal Mazarin was an extremely handsome man, and had a very fine face: this he was so anxious to preserve, that, not many days before he died, he gave audience to the foreign ministers with his face painted.

Prince Eugene, being always very busy, held the passion of love very cheap, as a mere amusement, that served only to enlarge the power of women, and to abridge that of men.

To the honour of the humanity of Marshal Saxe the following story is told by his physician. The night before the battle of Rancour, M. de Senac observed his illustrious patient very thoughtful, and asked him the reason of it, when he replied, in a passage from the Andromaque of Racine,

"Think, think, my friend, what horrid woes
To-morrow's morning must disclose
To thousands; by Fate's hard decree
The last morn they shall ever see.
Think how the dying and the dead
O'er your extensive plain shall spread;
What horrid spectacles afford,
Scorched by the flames, pierced by the sword."

Adrian, the Roman emperor, for talent and learning has been universally allowed to have had but few equals at any period. His memory was so retentive that he could repeat a whole book after having once perused it. He excelled in every branch of learning, and was, without doubt, the best orator, poet, grammarian, philosopher, and mathematician of his time. He was born the twenty-fourth of January, the seventy-sixth year of the christian era; began to reign in the year 117, and finished it in the year 138; and on the approach of his death wrote the following verses addressed to his soul. Thus translated by Prior:

Poor little, pretty, fluttering thing
Must we no longer live together?
And dost thou prone thy trembling wing
To take thy flight thou know'st not whither?
Thy humorous vein, thy pleasing folly,
Lies all neglected, all forgot;
And pensive, wavering, melancholy—
Thou drest'st and hop'st thou know'st not what.

Sir John Tabor went to Versailles to try the effects of the bark upon Louis the fourteenth's only son, the dauphin, who had been long ill of an intermittent fever. The physicians who were about the prince did not choose to permit him to prescribe to their royal patient till they had asked him some medical questions. Amongst others, they desired him to define what an intermittent fever was: he replied, "Gentlemen, it is a disease which I can cure, and which you can not."

Scacazonne, returning one day from Rome, found himself, when within a short distance of Vienne, without cash to purchase a dinner. But resolving not to go without one if he could avoid it, he very quietly walked into the nearest inn, and, appearing quite a stranger, he demanded a room in which to dine alone. He next ordered whatever he considered most likely to prove agreeable to himself, without in the least sparing his purse, as the good host believed, and ate and drank of the best. When he had at length finished his wine and refreshed himself with a short nap for his journey, he rang the bell, and with a very unconcerned air, asked the waiter for his bill. This being handed to him, "Waiter," he cried, "can you tell me any thing relating to the laws of this place?" "Oh, yes, signor," "I dare say, for a waiter is never at a loss. For instance," continued Scacazonne, "what does a man forfeit for killing another?" "His life, signor, certainly," said the waiter. "But if he only wounds another bodily not mortally, what then?" "Then," returned the waiter, "as it may happen, according to the nature of the provocation and injury." "And lastly," continued the guest, "if you only deal a fellow a sound box on the ear, what do you pay for that?" "For that," echoed the waiter, "it is here about ten livres, signor, no more." "Then send your master here; be quick; be gone." Upon the good host's appearance, his wily guest conducted himself in such a manner, uttering such accusations against extortion, such threats, and such vile aspersions upon his house, that on Scacazonne purposely bringing their heads pretty close in contact, the landlord, unable longer to bear his taunts, lent him rather a severe cuff. "I am truly obliged to you," cried the happy Scacazonne, taking him by the hand, "this is all I wanted of you; truly obliged to you, my good host, and will thank you for the change; your bill is eight livres, and the fine upon your assault is ten; however, if you will pay the difference to the waiter, as I find I shall reach the city very pleasantly before evening, it will be quite right." Liverpool Chronicle.

SIGNS OF PROSPERITY.

FROM THE CHINESE.

Where spades grow bright, and idle words grow dull;
Where jails are empty, and where barns are full;
Where church-paths are with frequent feet outworn;
Law court-yards weedy, silent, and forlorn;
Where doctors foot it, and where farmers ride;
Where age abounds, and youth is multiplied;
Where these signs are, they clearly indicate
A happy people, and well-governed state.

LORD CASTLEREAGH AND MRS. DAMER.

Mrs. Damer's prejudice against her cousin, the late Lord Castlereagh, was softened into something like regard by the following characteristic circumstance:—His lordship had promised to make Sir Alexander Johnson chief justice and president of Ceylon, on which Mrs. Damer sarcastically remarked, "The fellow will cheat you; he is a tory." Soon afterwards Lord Castlereagh sent express to Sir Alexander—had his commission drawn out—saw the great seal affixed—shook him by the hand, and wished him joy. This was late at night. On the following morning he fought the duel with Canning. Sir Alexander waited on him, when Lord Castlereagh said, with a smile, "You are come to congratulate me on my escape." "Yes," said Sir Alexander, "and to say that I cannot help marvelling at your fortune last night: who but yourself could have transacted business?" "O, I had a reason for it," said his lordship; "had I fallen before the great seal was set to your commission, you would have lost the appointment, and my cousin would have said of me, 'The fellow, sir, was a cheat—he was a tory.' When Mrs. Damer heard this, the tears started in her eyes. "Go," she said, "to my cousin, and say I have wronged him; that I love his manliness and his regard for honour, and that I wish to renew our intercourse of friendship." Family Library.

DR. HUNTER.

About ten years before his end, his health was so much impaired that, fearing he might soon become unfit for the profession which he loved, he proposed to recruit himself by a residence in Scotland, and was on the eve of purchasing a considerable estate, when the project was frustrated by a defect in the title-deeds. This trifle banished his rural plans, and he remained in London, continually declining in health, but pursuing distinction with the same ardour with which he had courted it in his early days. He rose from a bed of sickness to deliver an introductory lecture on the operation of surgery, in opposition to the earnest remonstrances of his friends. The lecture was accordingly delivered, but it was his last; towards the conclusion his strength was so much exhausted that he fainted away, and was finally replaced in the chamber which he had been so eager to quit. In a few days he was no more. Turning to his friend Combe in his latter moments, he observed, "If I had strength enough to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant a thing it is to die!" He expired on the thirtieth of March, 1783. Hunter sacrificed nothing to pomp; he was indifferent to common objects of vanity. When he invited his younger friends to his table, they were seldom regaled with more than two dishes: when alone, he rarely sat down to more than one. He would say, "A man who cannot dine on this, deserves to have no dinner." After the meal, his servant (who was also the attendant on the anatomical theatre) used to hand round a single glass of wine to each of his guests. These trifles are mentioned as a trait of the old manner of professional life, and as a feature of the man who devoted seventy thousand pounds to create a museum for the benefit of posterity. Ibid.

MISS BARTOLOZZI.

This lady, who is well known in the theatrical world as an actress and singer, and sister to Madame Vestris, appeared the other day before the commissioners at the insolvent debtors' court on her petition to be discharged. She was accompanied by her mother. At first she seemed much affected, wept, and it was apprehended would go into hysterics; but the indulgence of being seated having been granted, she recovered her self-possession. It appeared that within the last few years she had contracted debts to the amount of nearly two thousand pounds, principally for stage dresses. Within one year her debt for shoes amounted to upwards of one hundred pounds; for millinery in two years there was an item in her schedule of three hundred and forty pounds to one tradesman, to another four hundred pounds; and to a Mr. Giornardo, within the last year, for various articles of clothing, between eight and nine hundred pounds. The lady was not opposed; but the commissioners observing that she had obtained such large quantities of clothing, and did not appear to be in possession of a very extensive wardrobe, inquired in what manner she had disposed of the property? Miss Bartolozzi and Mr. Cooke, her counsel, endeavoured to make it appear, that although these articles of dress were made up, apparently in a very costly and expensive style, they were not fit to be worn a second night, and that, therefore, they could be considered in no other light than worn-out apparel. The chief commissioner seemed, however, resolved to discover where the dresses were deposited, and at length was informed that they were at the residence of a Mr. Howard, a solicitor. The chief commissioner said that it was evidently a speculation to retain this property for the benefit of the insolvent. She was acting very incorrectly in concealing any of that property, and should it be discovered, the consequences would be very serious to her. The case was then adjourned for a short time, and the property in question having been produced, Miss Bartolozzi again made her appearance, and, without any further comment being made on the case, she was discharged. Chat of the week.

GOOCH'S OPINION OF DR. CHALMERS.

On Sunday I went to hear him preach at the Scotch church in Hatton-garden, and at the peril of my ribs succeeded in getting in: and in the evening heard him again, at the Wesleyan chapel, where he preached to a congregation of four thousand. It was a striking sight, every pew full, the standing places crowded up to the very doors. It is difficult to compare strong impressions which we have received at different periods of our life, but I think I may say that I never heard so powerful a preacher; a good deal of his power, however, depends on his manner—an earnestness of heart, a fiery vehemence, which occasionally would be rant, but the vehemence of the manner never rises above the energy of the thought and expression. He has a curious but very useful custom; at the end of a passage, ornamented in the highest possible degree and perfectly on fire with energy, he makes a dead pause, and then states the pith of the passage with the calmness and familiarity of conversation: thus sending his hearers away, not only with warm feelings, but with clear conceptions. Family Library.

SOMERSET AND SEYMOUR.

The proud duke of Somerset had employed James Seymour to paint the figures—artists say portraits—of his horses at Petworth, and condescended to sit with his humble namesake at table. One day at dinner his grace filled his glass, and saying with a sneer, "Cousin Seymour, your health," drank it off. "My lord," said the artist, "I believe I have the honour of being related to your grace." The proud peer rose from table, and ordered his steward to dismiss the presumptuous painter, and employ an humbler brother of the brush. This was accordingly done; but when the new painter saw the spirited works of his predecessor he shook his head, and retiring, said, "No man in England can compete with James Seymour." The duke now condescended to recall his discarded cousin. "My lord," answered Seymour, "I can now prove to the world that I am of your blood—I wont come."

ANECDOTE OF NELSON.

While Gooch was with Mr. Barrett, the attack upon Copenhagen took place, and on the return of Lord Nelson, the wounded were placed in the naval hospital at Yarmouth. Being acquainted with some of the young surgeons, Gooch, though then but a boy, was not unfrequently at the hospital. "I was," he says in a letter written long afterwards, "at the naval hospital at Yarmouth, on the morning when Nelson, after the battle of Copenhagen, (having sent the wounded before him) arrived at the roads and landed on the jetty. The populace soon surrounded him, and the military were drawn up in the market-place ready to receive him; but making his way through the dust, and the crowd, and the clamour, he went straight to the hospital. I went round the wards with him, and was much interested in observing his demeanor to the sailors. He stopped at every bed, and to every man he had something kind and cheering to say; at length he stopped opposite a bed on which a sailor was lying, who had lost his right arm close to the shoulder joint, and the following short dialogue passed between them: Nelson, 'Well, Jack, what's the matter with you?' Sailor, 'Lost my right arm, your honour.' Nelson paused, looked down at his own empty sleeve, then at the sailor, and said, playfully, 'Well, Jack, then you and I are spoiled for fishermen—cheer up, my brave fellow!' And he passed briskly on to the next bed; but these few words had a magical effect upon the poor fellow, for I saw his eyes sparkle with delight as Nelson turned away and pursued his course through the wards."

TRIBUTES PAID TO THE DEY OF ALGIERS.

Naples and Sicily paid an annual tribute of twenty-four thousand Spanish dollars. Tuscany, by treaty of 1823, was exempt from tribute, but made consular presents of twenty-five thousand Spanish dollars. Sardinia is indebted to the mediation of England for her freedom from tribute, but she has paid considerable sums at every change of consuls. Portugal concluded a treaty similar to that of Naples. Spain was subject to no tribute, but made presents at every change of consuls. Austria, through the mediation of the Porte, was exempt from tribute and presents. England made a present at every change of consuls. The United States adopted the same arrangement as England. Hanover and Bremen, under the protection of England, obtained the same condition, but their consuls paid large sums on arriving at Algiers. Sweden and Denmark paid annually a tribute of warlike ammunition and naval stores to the value of about four thousand piasters. Besides this, these states gave, on the renewal of the treaties every ten years, presents to the amount of ten thousand dollars; and their consuls, on entering on their functions, made presents to the dey.

VARIETIES.

THE HORSE.—Who, that has closely noticed the actions of horses upon occasions of state and show, will deny their being endowed with more than the ordinary brute intelligence? Observe the animal in his stable, or when led to water, and the same creature when adorned and harnessed, passing through crowds of spectators. Is there no consciousness of admiration in the sidelong glance of the eye, the constant and sudden shifting of position, the superfluous tramping? And so of the race-horse; see him when clothed, and being led about the course; his neck forming a horizontal line with his body; his eye serene and passive, and "in his 'pace' as meek as is a maid;" then notice him when his rider has mounted, and his housing is thrown off, and every limb and feature is instinct with fire and intelligence. The horse is a noble creature, and, like all generous spirits, is just so far appreciated as to be taken advantage of, and then left for the dogs.

SWIFTNESS OF BIRDS.—A German paper, speaking of the swiftness of various birds, says, "A vulture can fly at the rate of one hundred and fifty miles an hour." Observations made on the coast of Labrador convinced Major Cartwright that wild geese could travel at the rate of ninety miles an hour. The common crow can fly twenty-five miles, and swallows, according to Spallangain, ninety-two miles an hour.

MILITARY PENCHANT.—Even literary men have been "bitten" by this mania; or, why do they call a monthly miscellany a magazine, and a critique a review?

A youth applauded a dancer with rapture, and bawled out "encore" as she leaped off the stage after turning a graceful pirouette. "So you think that one good turn deserves another," said a person who sat in the same box with him.

CONUNDRUMS.—Why is a maid-servant, when a procession passes nigh her master's house, like a ship on the coast at the commencement of a heavy gale? A. Because she always runs out to sea (see.) Why is a beautiful and fascinating girl like a butcher? A. Because, a la beau monde, she is a "killing creature."

HISTORICAL DOUBTS.—An auctioneer, at a late sale of antiquities, put up a helmet with the following candid observation:—"This, ladies and gentlemen, is a helmet of Romulus, the Roman founder; but whether he was a brass or iron founder I cannot tell."

RELATIONSHIP.—By a marriage which took place a few days ago, the lady becomes mother to her brother, sister to her son, grand-mother to her nephew, aunt to her grandson, sister to her daughter, and mother to her sister.

MISS PATON.—The proprietors of the London theatres have come to the conclusion of excluding Miss Paton from their establishments. What will they do with Madame Vestris?

AN ALIAS.—An old offender was lately placed before a learned justice of the peace in the country. The constable informed his lordship that he had in his custody John Simmons, alias Jones, alias Smith. "Very well," said the magistrate, "I will try the two women first—so bring in Alice Jones."

GOOD NATURE.—Louis the fourteenth, in a gay party at Versailles, thought he perceived an opportunity of relating a facetious story. He commenced, but ended the tale abruptly and insipidly. One of the company soon afterwards leaving the room, the king said, "I am sure you must all have observed how very uninteresting my anecdote was. I did not recollect till I began, that the turn of the narrative reflected very severely on the immediate ancestor of the prince of Ar-magnac, who has just quitted us; and on this, as on every other occasion, I think it far better to spoil a good story than distress a worthy man."

THE AFTER MATH, OR SECOND CROP.—The following singular circumstance has lately been related:—About a year ago the hair of a person named George Wright, sixty-three years of age, who resides at Beeston, and which was then dark brown, turned completely white; in the course of two months afterwards it came entirely off, and in about two months more he had a fresh crop of dark brown hair, which he now wears.

TOLERATION.—"To what purposes have I a conscience of my own," said John Gerson, chancellor of Paris, "if I must live and die according to the conscience of another man?"

MARCH OF INTELLECT.—A person reading the term jeux d'esprit, understood it to mean jews desperate, and asked another what sort of Jews were meant.

PHILISTINES.—This people, celebrated for their wars with the Israelites, dwelt on a small strip of sea-coast south of the Tyrians. They were originally, it is thought, a colony from Egypt. They possessed five cities under the government of five princes, and confederated together for mutual defence. Trade and piracy were their chief means of subsistence. Their long and obstinate resistance against the arms of the Israelites testifies their valour and love of independence. A sea-faring people, the chief object of their worship was a sea-god, Dagon.

EFFECT OF ADMONITION.—A fellow who was brought up before the magistrates at Birmingham, on a charge of felony, was dismissed with a serious admonition. He appeared much affected, and left the room with a deep sigh, and a silk pocket-handkerchief, the property of a gentleman on the bench, which he had contrived to filch from the table during the impressive harangue which was so considerably addressed to him.

MODESTY.—From the time of the flood to the present period, not one man ever derived any benefit from modesty, and not one woman any harm from it.

GAMBLING.—A new species of gambling has lately been introduced among the lower orders, called "puff-and-dart." It consists in blowing a sort of dart through a narrow tube at a target, on which certain numbers are affixed, any of which if the puffer happens to hit, he wins.

OLD MAIDS.—There are now residing in one house at Bath, a whole family of old maids, consisting of four sisters—the youngest about sixty and the eldest about seventy. When they are seated together at work, their neat, clean, and matronly appearance excites much attention.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Letters from Europe.—Our readers no doubt remember that William Cox, recently embarked for England, for the purpose of establishing with us a foreign correspondence. The letter which we this day publish was received by the packet ship Caledonia, with a request from the writer to retain it until the series could be regularly commenced in London. But knowing the anxiety of the public to hear from him, we have ventured to disregard his wishes, especially as we hope but a short time will elapse before we may expect his communications by almost every opportunity, embracing subjects of the highest interest to the general reader. In reply to the numerous inquiries respecting him, perhaps we may as well take this occasion to say that he arrived in Liverpool in good health after a passage of twenty-five days.

Trans-atlantic editorial liberality.—In looking over a late file of foreign papers, transmitted to us by a correspondent, among the many notices of this periodical, we were pleased to observe the following in the "Chronicle" and the "Free Press" of Glasgow. We take this opportunity to acknowledge the numerous favours of this nature which we have received on both sides of the Atlantic; and if our journal is at present in any degree worthy the support it enjoys, we ascribe it more to this generous assistance of our editorial friends, than to any merit of our own. However flattered we are by the articles which we have selected, it is not our vanity alone which prompts their publication; but we have lately been sadly abused by some of our contemporaries, to whom we have never before alluded, and it is curious to observe the difference between the petty slanders of some of our own countrymen who deem themselves rivals, and the liberal praise bestowed by distinguished foreigners, who have no interest either in our failure or success. It is also our wish to reciprocate the good feeling which, we trust, will ever exist between the two countries.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Since we formerly mentioned this splendid journal, we have perused the greater part of the numbers which form the seventh volume. In point of elegant typography it surpasses every journal in this country; and many of its poetical and literary articles equal the best of the periodical press of the old world. Every volume contains four admirable engravings, and the music of forty-five popular songs. Its cost per annum is only sixteen shillings and eight pence! We do not wonder that it has a large number of subscribers in America; and have no doubt that did the price admit of the usual allowance to booksellers, it would also have a wide circulation in Britain. The success of such a journal reflects great credit on the editor, and is the best refutation of the charge, that the Americans take no interest in any thing but trade and politics.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Until a file of this work was the other day put into our hands by a citizen of New-York, we entertained no idea of the elegance and beauty to which the arts both of engraving and typography had attained among our republican brethren on the other side of the Atlantic. The "New-York Mirror" is a weekly publication, wholly devoted to literature, and containing in every number, besides many excellent original contributions, both in prose and verse, a variety of selections of the same sort, culled with great taste, and arranged with great neatness and effect. The reading is thus so various as to be adapted to almost every taste; while, as an additional recommendation, there are at regular intervals published in its pages a certain number of the finest popular songs of the day, with the music, printed in the first style of the art. Nor is this all: as frontispieces to stated portions of the work, there are also published along with it some admirably executed engravings of the most celebrated public buildings in the city of New-York—all of them displaying great skill, chasteness, and delicacy. In the portion of the work before us is contained a pretty large variety of those engravings; and while they impress us with a very high idea of American architecture, they at the same time, in point of general execution and finish, equal any specimens of engraving we have seen in this country. It is no wonder that a periodical of so varied and attractive a sort should command the immense circulation which we understand it enjoys among our transatlantic brethren, as well as in Canada and the West Indies. Why is not a work of the same kind started in Great Britain? We surely are not so foolishly proud as to refuse to copy a good idea, from whatever source it may be drawn; and it is not less from a wish to have the excellent idea of the "New-York Mirror" acted on in this country, than a desire to do justice to the taste and talent of a great, because a free people, that we thus have discharged the duty of drawing attention to the subject.

Family Library, No. VII.—Williams's Life of Alexander the Great.—The manner in which the Harpers have published this work, while it is characterized by their usual neatness, will enable every one to possess a copy. It is admirably adapted to the use of schools, although it may with equal satisfaction occupy the attention of the public in general. A neatly executed map affords the student an opportunity of uniting geography with history, which, in many cases, is neglected. It is easy to perceive the superior advantages of studying them together.

Cabinet History of the British Isles.—We have perused this excellent work with much satisfaction. The name of Sir J. Mackintosh will be sufficient to insure it a place in every library. The public could not have been presented with a production which promises to be more useful.

SWIFT AS THE LIGHTNING'S GLANCE.

Sung by Mr. Richings, as Oberon, in the Grand Romantic and Fairy Opera of Oberon, at the Park Theatre, New-York, composed by Carl Maria Von Weber.

ALLEGRO MANESTOSO.

Swift as the lightning's glance, Brave knight, be-hold I bring thee and thine to thy na-tive

France, And the pa-lace of thy king. Kneel at his feet, with the bride thou hast won;

Europe shall ring with the deed, with the deed thou hast done, Europe shall ring with the deed, with the deed thou hast done. Now for e'er I break the spell, With the grateful fairy's last fare-well! With the grateful fairy's last fare-well!

fare well! fare well!

ONE SIGH TO THE HOPE THAT HATH PERISHED.

BY THYRA.

ONE sigh to the hope that hath perished,
One tear to the wreck of the past;
One look upon all I have cherished,
One lingering look—'tis the last!
And now from remembrance I banish
The hopes that my heart hath proved vain—
Ah! vanish, dear memories, vanish!
Return not to thrill me again.

But as the fond ivy clings closest
To that which is withered and dead,
And in its green beauty reposes
On the ruin whose glory hath fled;
Thus to hopes and to joys that have faded,
More fondly doth memory cling,
And o'er the fair prospects long shaded
Its freshness and vividness fling.

The cloud that each moment is bright'ning
With the flash that so soon fades away,
Is the darkest in heaven when the lightning
Hath ceased on its surface to play;
Thus the heart, when some bright dream each minute
Springs up with too dazzling a light,
Hath the gloom of the tempest within it,
And is shrouded the soonest in night.

ORIGINAL TALES.

A TRIP TO THE SPRINGS, OR FASHIONABLE FOLLIES.

"Come, Catharine, my love," said Mr. Fenton to his wife, after she had curtsied good night to the last party that left her drawing-room, "now that all our friends have departed, and our children have gone to their rooms, let us have a little chat before we also retire."

"With all my heart," said Mrs. Fenton, re-seating herself, "with whom shall we commence?"

"Nay, Catharine," replied Mr. Fenton gravely, "I think we had better begin at home. I wish to speak to you about our daughter Clara and young Grant. In spite of my express commands, that all intercourse should cease between them, I observed them continually together this evening. This must not be. You have done wrong in not being more watchful. But they must be separated."

"I have proposed," said Mrs. Fenton, "travelling with Clara, in hopes that new scenes, and perhaps new lovers, may efface the remembrance of this youthful passion; but you cannot leave your business to go with us?"

"Why not go without me? Your brother, Mr. Thornton, with his wife and daughter, are going to spend some time at the Springs and Niagara, why not take both the girls and their brother George, and join them? If Clara's constancy stands out a fashionable summer, I shall be surprised."

"This is a charming proposition. I will go to-morrow to Mrs. Thornton, to ascertain when she sets out; and now let us retire, for it is quite late."

While Mrs. Fenton was passing her daughter's room she heard voices within; anxious to tell them of the pleasant tour proposed, which she knew would particularly delight Rosa, the youngest, she tapped gently, saying,

"Are you awake, girls?"

"Oh yes, mamma," cried Rosa, springing up to open the door; "do come in; we are talking over the party."

"I have news to tell you; good news!"

Clara, who was sitting in a melancholy posture at the window, gazing out on the moonlight, looked hastily up, for to her good news was associated with the idea of Philip Grant; but as she caught her mother's watchful glance, she dropped her eyes in embarrassment, and appeared busily engaged in crimping the ruffle on the sleeve of her night-dress.

"News!" exclaimed Rosa; "what are we to have another party?"

"No," said Mrs. Fenton, smiling; "but what do you think of a little excursion, girls? We are to go next week to the Springs."

"To the Springs!" exclaimed Rosa, clapping her hands in rapture, while her sparkling eyes were rendered still brighter with joy. "Oh how joyful! Dear mamma, I must kiss you for that."

The gay young creature threw her arms around her mother's neck, and clasped her lightly

"Well, Clara, what do you say?" asked Mrs. Fenton.

Clara raised her dark melancholy eyes. "Must I go also?" she said.

"Must you go! certainly, my daughter; you do not suppose we will leave you here alone?"

"Well!" exclaimed Rosa, when she had recovered from her astonishment, "did I ever hear the like! One would imagine we were talking of going to school. Why the girl is certainly witless. This comes of sitting up alone by moonlight, as our school-madam would say."

At this moment they were interrupted by the sound of music. A band of musicians, with wind instruments, after a short prelude began the air,

"Forget not the faith thou hast vowed,
Though fortune forget to be true."

Clara started forward in great agitation. Mrs. Fenton advanced to the window. On the pavement beneath, under the shade of the sycamore trees, was a groupe of young men. The form of one who stood more out in the moonlight could not be mistaken. It was Philip Grant.

"Clara, Clara!" said Mrs. Fenton reprovingly; "this must not be; why will you encourage that perverse young man? I again repeat to you your father's commands, to cast this unworthy passion from your heart. You, who are the heiress to thousands, must not stoop to marry the object of your father's charity."

The moon was shining with unequalled brilliancy. All was still except the night breeze, which wafted towards them the low soft notes of that tender Italian air. The tears rolled down Clara's cheek. Too miserable to reply to her mother's severe chiding, she leaned her head against the side of the window, and wept silently and bitterly. Mrs. Fenton had said all she deemed necessary; and now, seating herself by the side of her daughter, she threw her arm around her, and conversed in a low and soothing tone. The music, her sister, all were soon lost to Rosa, who, in a delightful reverie, was occupied in arranging in her mind the new dresses she would have occasion to order. She had not determined whether to travel in her gros de napes or foulard, (for cloth habits were even then too old fashioned for Rosa,) when she was aroused by the departure of the musicians. Mrs. Fenton also ceased her parental admonitions, and with her arm around Clara, slowly led her to her bed. She then kissed her daughters, and left them to themselves.

When Rosa found herself actually in the steam-boat, on her way to the Springs, she could not repress her delight. Every thing was new and charming to her. She ran over the elegantly furnished cabins; admired the costly carpets, the marble tables, the rich damask curtains. All she beheld pleased her. She gazed with admiration on the shores of Manhattan island, so prettily ornamented with handsome villas, on the Palisades, the Highlands, and all the varied scenery of the Hudson. Rosa's attention, however, was frequently diverted from these to the passengers. Here was a new fund of amusement and interest. Five hundred persons, of all kinds and stations, were collected around her, and the evident admiration she herself attracted, kept her in a complete state of excitement. Rosa was just fifteen. She had been no where except from home to school, and had now left the latter during a vacation; it can, therefore, be easily imagined that she felt as if in a new state of existence.

To Clara, however, there was but one object of interest, after her farewell glance at Philip Grant. On the city she gazed with a heart swelling with emotion. Leaning over the railing, her eyes were intently fixed on it, until the mists of distance hid from her view the last spire. Then she realized the bitterness of her separation from one who filled her whole heart, and whom she loved with an intensity and ardour of which no one who looked on her calm exterior would think her capable. Clara had ever been a retiring, dreaming girl, living in a world of her own. While at school, if not immersed in her studies she was wandering away from her companions; and her thoughts, roaming over heaven and earth, seemed fixed on every thing except the world before her.

Clara's mother and sister were very unlike her. They did not understand her character, and her intercourse with them gave her little pleasure. Philip had, alone, been able to interest her feelings. Reserved and retiring as herself, young Grant cared but little for the society of those in whom he found no kindred sentiment. Hearts so much alike soon sought each other. To be now torn apart for ever was a blow that nearly overwhelmed them. Clara's melancholy, so evident to all, was attributed by Mrs. Fenton to ill health, which she hoped to remove by travelling. Rosa felt for the sorrows of her sister; but young and volatile, she soon forgot every thing except the beaux and fashionables around her. Their party was enlarged by the addition of some friends of theirs from South Carolina, Mr. Mrs. and Miss Ross. Ellen Ross had been placed at the same school with Rosa, and a violent and romantic friendship had always subsisted between them. While the younger portion of the party were promenading the deck, Mrs. Fenton, with her sister, Mrs. Ross and Clara, were seated together. At this moment Matilda Thornton came running up to her mother.

"Oh ma!" she said, "there are all the Lacys. They have their servants with them. I wish we had brought ours."

"So do I," replied Mrs. Thornton, in a tone of vexation; "but your father would not permit me to bring any."

"And do see, mamma, how plainly they are dressed; black silks with no trimming, and dunstable cottage hats. How provoking that I should have put on my new mandarine dress and crape hat."

"It is unfortunate," said the lady, who could not endure to see people aping their betters; "have you nothing plainer in your trunk? You might change it even now."

"No," replied Matilda, in a disconsolate tone, "I must wear it now; but there is another thing I wished to mention. The Hollins are all here, and be sure you do not notice them while the Lacys are near. I would not for the world let them know such old-fashioned people are our acquaintances."

"Oh yes—you need not charge me. I know it is well enough to visit them while peaches are ripe; but they ought not to be surprised if I cut them here."

These amiable and sensible arrangements being finished, Matilda again took George Fenton's arm, and resumed her walk. Rosa was not without her share of vanity, and the admiration she excited gave a richer bloom to her cheek; and a new brilliancy to her eye. She noticed in particular a young man, who stood alone at the end of the upper deck, his eyes and thoughts, turned from the crowd and scenery around, seemed fixed, she could not but observe, in deep admiration on herself alone. At first Rosa thought this accidental, but her friend Ellen Ross had also seen him, and laughingly congratulated her on her conquest. Rosa was pleased; for young and romantic, she was on the look-out for adventure. When in the course of their promenade the party passed the young man, Rosa often glanced towards him, and when their eyes met, hers were immediately cast down with a blush, and his turned smilingly away. He was very handsome, had the air of a man of fashion, and seemed to equal all Rosa's ideas of a hero. The stranger, perceiving that his admiration was noticed, and that it was not displeasing to the fair object, took advantage of it, by being always near her party, so that he might be at hand to place a chair for Rosa, or pick up her feather fan. He also seated himself opposite her at table, and assisted her when the other gentlemen were otherwise engaged. By his respectful attentions he gained the good will of all the party, and thus soon established a sort of acquaintance between them. Rosa now found his conversation, she told her friend Ellen, as interesting as his appearance.

"I wonder who he can be?" she said. "He is evidently a gentleman. I wish we knew his name—but we can give him one. What shall it be?"

"The incognito?"

"No, that it is too common; he must have something romantic; something like Ronald MacGregor. Ah, yes, Ronald MacGregor. That was always a favourite name with me. How sweetly it will sound, will it not, Elly?"

"Oh, vastly," replied Ellen, with an air of pique.

"And so I suppose you are going to take this Mr. Ronald MacGregor for your hero. You seem entirely to have forgotten my cousin, whom you have promised me to wait for."

"Oh, true; but Elly dear, I have been thinking it was very foolish in us to make such promises as we did at school. I have not seen your cousin for many years, and he may come home engaged to some one else."

"I kept my word, although I had never seen your brother."

"Well, George fell in love with you, which alters the case. Only imagine how foolish I should feel, if, after waiting for him for two years, yet (for he will not be home until then) he should not like me, and then I should be too old to get a new lover, so I think if I find any deserving enough I shall not remember my promise to you."

"This is your friendship, is it? If I had foreseen such faithlessness I would never have refused the rich Mr. Bradley to accept your brother!"

"Elly, you are absurd to-day! It is not probable I shall ever see this stranger again, so do not look across, and I will promise to be cruel to all my true knights, and wait and see how I like your cousin, or, what is more to the purpose, how he likes me."

The cry of "Kaatskill baggage," aroused the school friends from their romantic discussion. The blue misty mountains which had for some time formed so lovely a back ground to the landscape, now quite near, were seen to great advantage, covered with verdure to their summits; no cottage nor field varied the green unbroken surface, until the eye rested on the Mountain-house. This abode of gaiety was placed in a niche near the top of one of those lofty mountains, and looked like a delightful retirement from the bustle of cities and fashionable life. Our party were among those who landed for the purpose of visiting that celebrated spot. Their drive, through every variety of woodland and mountain scenery, embellished by the laurels and rhododendrons in full flower, brought expressions of admiration from every lip. Even Clara uttered an exclamation of delight, when gazing out of the window she beheld the Mountain-house, with its piazzas and high white columns, standing on a pedestal of rocks, in a dark evergreen grove, immediately above her. But as near as the house seemed, two miles of slow toiling the weary horses passed over before the travellers arrived. They ascended the steps of the piazzas, and astonishment and pleasure were depicted on each countenance while they gazed around. The world seemed spread out to their view immediately below them. The hilly country, so lately passed over, was now a plain; the Hudson had shrunk into a brook; and the Highlands, to which a few hours before they had looked up with awe, now from this elevation appeared hillocks. Our travellers gazed a long time with increasing wonder and pleasure until aroused by Mr. Thornton, who came to remind them that dinner was nearly ready.

"All this is very grand, no doubt," he said; "but I must confess, after so long a ride, I would like something more substantial than rocks and trees; so hasten your toilets, ladies."

"Dear me! exclaimed Mrs. Rosa, "I shall not be ready in a long time. Oh! how I wish I had some of my negro women with me; but your silly laws would free them if I brought them out of our state; what shall I do?"

"My dear Mrs. Rosa," said Mrs. Thornton, "there is no necessity to worry yourself about your attire. I informed myself particularly on that subject before I left the city, and I am told by the best authorities that it is not fashionable to dress at dinner while here. No one stays more than two days at this place, and all the handsomest articles are reserved for Saratoga."

"There are the Lacys in the drawing-room," observed Matilda; "they are in their travelling dresses, and I am sure we may do as they do."

The Lacys stood at the head of the New-York fashionables; therefore any dress that was sanctioned by them was of course proper, and our party accordingly dined in their travelling dresses.

The next morning the house was early astir to witness the rising of the sun. Clara, who had spent the greatest part of the night in mournful reflections, did not awake soon enough; the rest of the party arose, and did not regret the loss of a few hours' sleep, when they witnessed the splendid, and to them new spectacle of the brilliant clouds preceding the march of the monarch of light, coming, to all appearance, from out the earth far below them.

"Come, ladies," said George after breakfast, "put on your hats, and let us walk up the peak."

"Not I," said Mrs. Rosa, who sat shivering by the fire; "I cannot expose myself to this wintry air. I declare, Mr. Rosa, if I had had any idea how cold a place this was, I would never have come. I am half frozen."

"It is not always as cold as it is to-day, and a walk, my dear, will warm you."

"No, no, my teeth absolutely chatter here, so you may go without me."

All the party preferred the comforts of a fire to a walk except Ellen, Matilda, Rosa, and George. They were joined by Mr. Augustus Lacy, who offered his arm to Matilda; and, wrapped up to their throats, the party set out. The fashionable pair, Matilda and Mr. Lacy, had not proceeded far before they began to falter. Climbing steep ascents, and springing over rocks, did not accord with tight dresses or French morocco shoes.

Rosa, Ellen, and George amused themselves very much, watching the ascent of the fashionables. Sighing and complaining, clinging to every tree, and resting every five minutes, they at last arrived at the summit, where they threw themselves on the grass quite exhausted.

"Well!" said Matilda, almost out of breath, "if I had known what kind of a walk I was to take I would never have come. I have ruined my French shoes, torn my blonde gauze veil, and almost killed myself. This is no place for people of quality."

"Can you tell me, sir," said Mr. Lacy to George, "why this barbarous place ever became so fashionable?"

"Surely this magnificent scenery is a sufficient reason."

"Bless me! I think there is scenery enough on the river before one gets here to satisfy any reasonable person; there is no necessity to risk one's life for more."

"For my part," said Matilda, "I would never leave the city, were it not the fashion. If I were a fairy I would change all trees into houses, all fields into paved streets, and bushes into people."

"Very good! very good, faith! you have a fine taste, Miss Thornton."

"Is there no charm," said George, "in sitting thus on the very summit of a steep and lofty mountain, while so vast an extent of beautifully variegated country is spread out before you?"

"None to me, on my word," said Lacy. "I see little sense in fatiguing one's self to death to climb up to the moon, merely to see our fine rivers and mountains dwindle into brooks and hillocks, besides running the risk of having one's head snap off by a bear, or some other wild beast. Come, let's go home; 'pon my word, I don't half like remaining in such a desolate spot."

"Bears are seldom seen in summer," said George, "and never so near the house; besides, they will not attack you unless you provoke them."

"Well, I wish I may never see Broadway again, if I would come here were it not the ton."

With a contemptuous smile George sprang up, and proposed to resume their walk. Matilda and Lacy told them to go on and they would follow, and meet them on their return.

"I cannot walk so fast," said Lacy to Matilda; "one would think those ladies had been brought up in the country. As for Miss Fenton, she jumps and skips along like a young fawn."

Rosa, Ellen, and George walked merrily on, enjoying the pleasurable feeling exercising in such cool air always produces. They left the house far behind them, and insensibly penetrated to the darkest recesses of the pine forests. Here the ladies seated themselves on a fallen tree, while George left them to gather some scarlet lilies, which grew on the top of a mass of rocks near them.

"How silent and lonely it is all around," said Rosa; "the rays of the sun can seldom penetrate these massy evergreens. The song of the birds echoes as if in a large hall."

"It is very gloomy here," said Ellen, looking timidly around; "this place looks like a retreat for wild beasts. I do not much like being so far from the house. Ah! Rosa, Rosa! look, what is that horrid thing?"

Rosa looked up—from a recess in the rocks a bear was actually making his way towards them. Ellen fell motionless to the ground, while Rosa uttered a loud shriek. At that moment a stranger rushed between them and the animal, which, after surveying the threatening attitude of his enemy, turned and calmly walked away. George now appeared, and snatching up Ellen, soon succeeded in reviving her. He then led her slowly homeward, motioning Rosa to follow. After the first excitement, Rosa threw herself down on the tree, and relieved her terrified heart by a flood of tears. The stranger knew this would be of service to her, and stood quietly by her side, until she became more composed. When Rosa had recovered a little she raised her eyes, and Ronald MacGregor, the hero of her imagination, stood before her! How charming! He had appeared just at the right moment to save her life perhaps. Now indeed she might think of him. Ellen herself would not object. These thoughts flashed rapidly through Rosa's mind, and when she again looked up to thank him for the service he had rendered her, the evident pleasure that shone in her eyes made his heart throb with joy. Young and romantic as herself, Rosa's beauty, and the circumstances of their meeting, had made a deep impression on his imagination, and he already began to hope his heart had found a resting-place in the bosom of this fairy creature.

"How singular you should be here just at this moment," said Rosa, as she took his offered arm to return. "I am sure we left you behind in the steam-boat."

"I did intend to go farther, but I was so irresistibly attracted to the Mountain-house, that I was forced to abandon my other plans."

This speech might have passed unobserved were it not for the tone in which it was uttered, and the expression of the eyes, which told Rosa it was directed to herself. This, she was conscious, was not quite proper in an entire stranger, and immediately became grave and silent. Her companion saw the change, and repented the indiscretion by which he was sensible it was caused. Although his endeavours were now in vain to render her as cordial and animated as before, his respect and admiration increased.

Ellen had now become quite strong, and the party moved briskly homewards. The ladies often looked timidly around, although repeatedly assured no danger was to be apprehended, as the animal was no doubt far away. Screams and crashing of branches were heard above them, and the next moment Matilda and Mr. Lacy were seen flying down, springing from rock to rock, with vulgar haste, laces and French shoes being quite forgotten.

"Oh the bears! the tigers!" they cried.

Notwithstanding the entreaties of George for them to stop, the affrighted fashionables hurried on; delicacy and affection were given to the winds, and when our party overtook them, they found them sunk in exhaustion on the grass. Fortunately for all, they reached the road just as an empty carriage was passing. This was stopped by George, who after placing the ladies in it, invited the stranger to take a seat. He declined it, and bowing, turned to depart.

"I am truly indebted to you," said George, "for your services to-day, and should be glad to make your acquaintance. My name is George Fenton."

Now, thought Rosa, he must tell his name. The stranger hesitated, blushed, smiled; said he should be proud to cultivate Mr. Fenton's acquaintance, bowed, and disappeared.

"So," said George, "I thought he would have told us his name; but the gentleman, if one he be, seems inclined to remain incognito."

On arriving at the house they found the post coaches which were to take them away already at the door, and the remainder of their party in alarm at their protracted stay.

"What do you think of my constancy to your cousin now?" whispered Rosa to Ellen, while on the way down the mountain. "What could be more like a hero than the stranger's conduct? I think I am obliged by all rules of romance and chivalry to surrender my heart to him? If I mistake not, he is in one of the coaches behind."

"Oh! I dare say," observed Ellen coldly, "he will follow you all over. But you had better take care how you listen to every stranger you see. He does not seem disposed to make your acquaintance openly."

Clara was placed on the same seat with the friends, and Mrs. Fenton sighed as she noticed the contrast between them. Rosa and Ellen were all bloom and animation and happiness, while every feature of Clara's pale and expressive countenance betrayed her sorrow; and her mother felt a pang of remorse when she saw how great an alteration a few days had produced in this sensitive being. Since they had left home she had been in a state of apparent apathy. Nothing moved her, nothing interested her. She appeared entirely engrossed with her own sad thoughts.

"It is cruel to grieve her so," thought Mrs. Fenton; "but when we arrive at the Springs she will, no doubt, be more amused, and will perhaps recover from this deep dejection."

But at the Springs Clara was the same. She spent most of her time in her own room. All attentions were rejected by a quiet withdrawing, and a cold seriousness, which succeeded in sending from her all whom the interesting style of her beauty had attracted. After a short stay at Lebanon, Mrs. Fenton and her party sat out for Niagara and Canada, and on their return engaged rooms at Ballston Spa. Mrs. Thornton was not at all pleased with this last arrangement.

"How can you wish to stay at so stupid a place as Ballston?" she said to Mrs. Fenton; "all life and fashion is at Saratoga."

"It is for that very reason I preferred coming here. Here is no ceremony; we all do as we please. There they are all slaves to etiquette. Depend upon it, the really best society is here, while the mere dashers and dressers go to Saratoga."

The rest of the party were almost all of opinion that dressing and going to balls was the principal thing they came for; and accordingly, after a short stay, they all removed to Saratoga. While on their way there Matilda and Mrs. Thornton busied themselves arranging their dresses for that day.

"We must appear quite plain at dinner," said Mrs. Thornton; "for the Lacys, and many of the first people, I hear, never dress until evening; we shall then look so much genteeler, as the rest of the company will, no doubt, have on all their finery."

As Mrs. Thornton and her daughter were the most fashionable of all the company, their opinion was always submitted to in these matters. Accordingly, at dinner the ladies of our party all appeared in plain dark silk dresses, with muslin pelerines; and their dismay can be imagined, when the Lacys and their large party entered in full dress! Gay mandarines, palmyrenes, and painted muslins, lace caps, and fancy coiffures dazzled their eyes, and made their plain attire appear still more homely. To Mrs. Fenton, who was not one of fashion's slaves, this was of little moment, and she was much amused at the evident mortification of poor Mrs. Thornton and Matilda. They were so completely disconcerted by this really trivial circumstance, that all pleasure fled. Their appetites failed them, and they could not recover during dinner.

"Well!" exclaimed Mrs. Thornton, on their return to the drawing-room, "who could have imagined the Lacys would have dressed so much!"

"Pray mamma," said Matilda sullenly, "how could you be so mistaken? I felt so mean in my shabby silk!"

"Never mind, my child, we will see to-morrow if we cannot look a little better."

The next morning, anxious to repair their fault, the ladies, at Mrs. Thornton's suggestion, selected their gayest and richest dresses for dinner. Covered with lace and ribbons and ornaments, they sailed in triumph into the dining-room, where, to their astonishment and confusion, they beheld the Lacys, and all the rest, in calico and gingham dresses, with brown linen and black silk aprons! Unable to recover from this blow, Mrs. Thornton, on pretence of illness, precipitately arose and left the apartment, followed by her husband and daughter, and the smiles and shrugs of the Lacys. Fortunately for Mrs. Thornton's peace of mind, the Lacys and their friends left Saratoga that afternoon. Her party being now the most distinguished there, she was at liberty to indulge her own whims, and dress in any manner she might fancy. This she did, much to the annoyance of those who looked up to her as their model, and who endeavoured in vain to follow her through all her changes. The evening of this unlucky dinner there was a ball at the Pavilion. Rosa was dancing, and endeavouring to attend to her partner, and to appear as animated as usual; but her thoughts, in spite of her efforts, often wandered to the handsome stranger. She had again seen him at Niagara, and indeed at almost every place where they stopped. He evidently followed her, and contrived often to meet her alone, or while walking with Ellen and George, but never appeared openly. This perplexed and occupied Rosa, and she at last became conscious he interested her more than any of the devoted admirers who continually surrounded her, could ever do. He had not, however, appeared at the Springs. She had not seen him for three weeks, and now began to fear she should never again behold him. All the sweet fancies and agreeable visions she had been indulging in must now be abandoned. Sighing at these sad anticipations, Rosa raised her eyes, and beheld the object of her romantic reverie, the mysterious Ronald MacGregor, before her. He was leaning against the wall opposite, gazing on her with an expression of the greatest admiration. Rosa's eyes fell, and she blushed deeply. The stranger immediately approached, and inquired after her health and that of her party.

"They are all well, I thank you."

"But you are dancing, I perceive; may I not hope for the honour of your hand in the next cotillion?"

Rosa would have danced with him willingly, but he was a stranger, and had acted so oddly; she was aware it was not proper, yet knew not in what manner to refuse him. After a slight hesitation she replied, with naïveté,

"I would with pleasure, but I have not the honour of your acquaintance."

"If that is your only objection, I can easily obviate it."

He turned and left the room. In great agitation Rosa watched for his re-entrance.

"If he can procure an introduction," she thought, "I shall be placed in an awkward situation. He may be an improper acquaintance. I fear I have given him too much encouragement; but he certainly is a gentleman. I am sure Ellen's cousin, Arthur Stanton, cannot be half as handsome or agreeable."

The cotillion was ended. Rosa seated herself beside her mother, and at the same moment beheld Mrs. Ross enter the room leaning on the stranger's arm.

"Ladies," said Mrs. Ross, "permit me to introduce my nephew—Arthur Stanton. Arthur, this is your cousin Ellen, whom I suppose you cannot recognise as the little girl you left eight years ago."

Ellen received her cousin with the greatest pleasure, and was delighted to find that he and the unknown were one. Here was a charming termination to the mystery! Her favourite plan of uniting Rosa and her fondly remembered cousin might now be brought about.

Rosa was silent with wonder and confusion. The eyes of the smiling Stanton were fixed on her with an expression of the deepest tenderness.

"Now, Miss Fenton," he said, "you cannot refuse to dance with me?"

"Oh no," she replied, smiling; "I have no excuse to offer."

That evening Mrs. Fenton joined her entreaties with those of a Mr. Danford to prevail on Clara to dance. As he was a young man of fortune and family, Clara's prudent mother had been much gratified with his attentions to her daughter, and was very much vexed at her extreme coldness to him. When Mr. Danford arrived first at the pavilion, he had been very much struck with the pensive beauty of Clara's countenance, and attributing her dejection to illness, had endeavoured to do all in his power to amuse and interest her. He often urged her to walk or ride with him—was continually by her side when she accompanied her mother to the fountain, or strolled languidly around the piazzas. His assiduities were seldom rewarded except by a faint smile; he even fancied sometimes his approach caused an expression of pain to cross her countenance. Mr. Danford, however, by degrees became too deeply interested in Clara to be easily discouraged by her coldness, particularly as her mother in thanking him for his efforts towards rendering her daughter more cheerful, had entreated him to bear with the listlessness of sickness and still assist her to beguile Clara from the sadness in which she was at present plunged. The attentions of this person had always been unpleasant to Clara; but when repeated refusals could not prevent him from again and again entreating her to accept his heart and hand, and when with her mother to second him he became more urgent and importunate, poor Clara sometimes thought she would willingly lose her life, so that she might but be free from her tormentor. This persecution, joined to her separation from Philip, was fast wearing Clara down. She became thinner and paler every day. Still uncomplainingly she bore her sad lot and scarcely spoke or moved voluntarily. This evening Mr. Danford, whom nothing could daunt, had been very anxious for Clara to dance with him. Her mother also joined him, and urged her to gratify them "only once." At first Clara shook her head dejectedly, too wearied to reply. At length she positively refused, and begged them to let her remain in peace, for she was too weak and ill to speak, much less to dance. Still her tormentor urged her to retract her denials, until at last the poor girl, worried out of all remains of patience, turned suddenly towards him, exclaiming vehemently,

"What! do you wish such a poor, miserable, heart-broken wretch as I to dance! Do you not see I am dying under your persecutions? I will bear this no longer—I tell you I never will dance with you—I never will love you nor marry you—so torment me no longer."

She walked rapidly through the door near which she had been sitting, and followed by her dismayed mother, rushed into her room.

"Clara! Clara!" began the vexed Mrs. Fenton. "How can you behave in this manner?"

"Oh, mother!" said Clara, while the tears burst over her face, "dearest mother, have compassion on me—do not let that hateful man torment me to my dying hour—oh take me home! I am most wretched here!"

"Clara, dear, you know you must not look towards home with hope."

"I hope for nothing—that feeling is gone for ever. I do not ask to go to him—it is not the distance which separates us that I mourn—but you would force from me my only treasure—you would have me forget him—to love and marry another. 'Tis that which distracts me—'tis that which is draining life away."

"Dear Clara, you know I only act for your benefit—do compose yourself."

"No, no!" she replied, walking rapidly around the room; "there is no more composure for me here. I was quiet—I was composed, but you and that detested Danford have worried and persecuted me until I am mad—distracted. But do not hope I shall ever be wearied into your measures. If you wish it, I will vow never to look on Philip Grant again, but I will also vow never, never, to marry that dreadful Danford."

Clara's mother gazed in astonishment on the change a few minutes had created in her daughter. Her face, before so pale, was coloured high with emotion. Her gentle eyes flashed wildly, and her hair, tossed back from her fair forehead, fell disordered on her neck. Mrs. Fenton could scarcely believe that this could be Clara—that she, who had appeared so cold, gentle, and retiring, had such a fund of deep and passionate feeling lying dormant in her heart.

"How must this poor child have suffered!" she thought. "I did not dream she possessed such strength of soul—yes, yes! I see it all now—I have nearly sacrificed my child to gratify my ambitious views. But I will endeavour to rectify my fault immediately, and shall commence by writing to my husband."

Clara, who was still walking in great agitation about the room, now suddenly stopped. A flute was heard beneath the window breathing the same sweet Italian air which she had listened to a few nights before she left home, three months since.

"Mother! mother!" she rapturously exclaimed, "Philip is here—do you not hear him?"

"You are mistaken," replied Mrs. Fenton, who was busily writing. "It is some other flute."

"No, no, I cannot be mistaken. Yes, Philip, I have not forgotten the faith I vowed, although fortune has been 'most untrue.'"

Mrs. Fenton in the mean while finished her letter. Her plans for detaching Clara from Philip, she said, had hitherto been of no avail; she believed that hers was an attachment which nothing could eradicate, and which she feared was destroying health if not life. They were sacrificing their daughter, she added, to gratify their own ambition, and ended by entreating her husband to retract his refusal to their union, and permit her daughter to return home before it was too late. She was in the act of folding up her epistle when Rosa entered the room smilingly with a letter in her hand. Mrs. Fenton broke the seal. It was from her husband, and her surprise and pleasure can be imagined when she found it the same in substance with the one she had just finished to him. Mr. Fenton said that since Philip had been separated from Clara, and had lost all hope of ever obtaining her hand, he had sunk into the greatest dejection. Nothing aroused him. In vain, Mr. Fenton said, he had done all in his power to render him more cheerful! he had lost all life and spirit, and all wish to do or be any thing. He never complained, but that he was suffering was too evident, for he became thinner and paler every day. "I love the boy," added Mr. Fenton, "and cannot bear to see him suffer thus through my ambition; so if Clara has not changed her mind, and if you are willing, I give my consent to their union. I have sent Philip with this letter, so bring them both home as soon as possible, and in heaven's name let them be happy." Mrs. Fenton was delighted to find her husband's sentiments so much in unison with her own. It was indeed a singular coincidence that the husband and the wife should have arrived at the same conclusion at the same time. Joy now took possession of all hearts. The happy Philip, who had been anxiously waiting Mrs. Fenton's decision, was sent for by her and welcomed as her future son. Soon after, our party returned to New-York, and the now blooming and happy Clara was united to Philip Grant. The mystery regarding Arthur Stanton's incognito was soon explained. He had arrived unexpectedly from Europe and was on his way to his father's residence when he met Rosa. The impression she made on his romantic and impetuous feelings was so great that he determined to give up his intention of going home until he made a farther acquaintance with her; her name and place of residence would insure him the pleasure of again meeting her. Mrs. Rosa, he soon discovered, must be his aunt, and fearful of wounding his father's feelings, should he hear that he went to Kaatskill before he saw him, he remained incog until such time as he judged he had succeeded in raising such an interest for him in Rosa's heart that she would not forget him while away. Arthur Stanton was soon the accepted lover of Rosa. The marriage, however, did not take place until the following year. Soon after which, Rosa set out for the south to attend the wedding of her brother George and Ellen Ross, and among the happiest reminiscences of the gay parties is the trip to the Springs.

For the Mirror.

TO A VERY YOUNG AUTHOR.

BY ISIDORA.

Wake, boy, nor in the world of dreams
Thus idly soar on fancy's wing;
Forswear the muse's witching themes,
Nor dare to taste the madd'ning spring.
Arise, and break the "whispering reed,"
And throw the "gray goose quill" away;
For if on fancy's dreams you feed,
You'll lack a dinner many a day.
Wake! seize the plough, the scythe, the plane,
The awl, the chisel, or the square;
Head-work you'll find is wholly vain,
Unless you learn to live on air.
See yonder beau, so smart and trim,
With cambric ruffles, broadcloth fine;
Think you the pen did that for him?
No, boy, he never wrote a line.
And see that other, plump and sleek,
Whose great, round, rosy face displays,
As plain as such a face can speak,
Good quiet nights and well-fed days.
Think you it was the rhyming trade
That brought him such good cheer, my lad?
No, no! an author ne'er display'd
A form so round, a face so glad.
But there goes one whose elbows show,
And face of care, his luckless trade;
The soul that's stamp'd upon his brow
Is but the "mark upon the blade."
Boy, think of garrets, duns, and debt,
Long scores, short commons—bateful themes!
Abjure the rhyming trade—forget
Your journey to the world of dreams.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY.

To the Editor of the Mirror.

Brandywine Springs, September, 1830.

Sir—Among the nondescript bipeds of the times, who flourish their ephemeral hour in this haunt of fashion and of beauty, there is one who is a dandy of the first water. The thing has been here now for some eight or nine days; from what part or portion of the confederacy, I know not—though he seems to have a "down-east" accent. He is not a native of Missouri, and is, I dare be sworn, a stranger to alligators and the Red river. He sports an indefinite number of rings on each hand; his numerous brooches and bosom-studs are secured by half-a-dozen chains, that cast a kind of halo over an embroidered vest, ingrained with flowers and "all sorts of things." He holds in his dexter, whenever he promenades the beautiful terrace, a glass, which ever and anon he gives to one of the upper or dormant windows of his soul, with what he supposes a most unapproachable suavity. His face is a vacant, sleepy globe, of an oblong appearance—and his glance is as void of expression as an oyster freshly caught and prematurely exposed to view. He has received the ridicule and pity of so many, that, dull as is his penetration, he begins to see through the smiles of the ladies, and feels the smothered music of their laugh, as they pass him in his eccentric circumgyrations about the premises. Such premeditated dandyism finds no advocates among the sober sojourners here from the city of Brotherly Love. I have sometimes wondered how such an anomaly would feel or proceed in a drawing-room in Arch-street, surrounded by a spiritual band of fair, intellectual quakeresses, each one with "her tresses parted on her sinless brow." His fund of pretty things would be like nothingness before them, and he would "desire to depart."

No place appears to me to secure the affection and the imagination, in a kind of thrall, like these springs. The roads in the vicinity are superior for gig-riding on an afternoon, when it is cloudy without rain; and the evenings! they are like a saint's vision—so pure, animating, and pleasant. The restless tide of fashion and beauty humming in the piazza—the swell of music when the moon is rising over the fair woodlands and fields to the east—the sweet country air, and the wide expanse of scene presented at one glance to the eye, do most marvellously illuminate the understanding and cheer the heart. It is pleasant too, to make up a small and select party to pick blackberries, which are very abundant in the vicinity—"pour passer le temps;" and with a flute and a guitar, brought by some benevolent beau for the use of his intended, and some three or four good vocalists, we manage to fill the woodland side with melody as we assemble beneath some fine tree, after all our mouths are well stained, and the rosy lips of the fair have become purple from the gathered spoils of sequestered hedges. In such adventures, where a beautiful scene is occasionally presented, tout à coup, to the view, and where every thing breathes of leisure and peace, there is a rare combination of circumstances calculated to induce clever thoughts and feelings.

A few miles distant from this nucleus of the graces, the stream, called, in defiance of euphony, Brandywine, goes sparkling on its quiet way. I have walked its banks alone, many, many miles. I wish that Bryant could see it. Never was nature, in its quiet holiness, more sweetly developed than on the forest-banks of the Brandywine. For leagues they are overhung with the aspen, the willow, and the ash, and the blue tide lapses along to "the music of its own wild chime." It is impossible to resist the solitary sweetness of its cadence, for it trembles like a spell upon the ear and heart. At intervals, high precipitous rocks, over which the green shrubbery of the wood hangs its rustling drapery, are discerned, towering into the air, poised so carelessly to the eye, that a breath of the summer breeze would seem to move them. Many elegant and tasteful chateaux have been built on high and picturesque portions of the shores, and present an appearance impressively beautiful—in many cases their white walls and luxuriant gardens appear to skirt some precipitous steep that looks frowning darkly down upon the blue river beneath. Description fails to portray the soothing sounds and influences that spring up at every step of a sojourner's progress through these calm recesses. It seems to me that the vale of the Arno, or Chaumony itself, could hardly yield more "thick-coming fancies." No man of mind or heart can retire from such a spot without unanalyzed pleasure and food for future contemplation. A number of manufactories, in very romantic locations, skirt the stream—they are generally built with taste, and add much to the coup d'œil. The country round about is rife with the storied associations of the wars and conflicts of the olden time. Hereabouts, in former times, the sanguinary giant of battle stamped his iron feet, and scattered his glowing death-shot; and the onset shout has rung of old where swains now hie to breathe declarations and read answers of peace in the partial eyes of their beloved ones, and where the song-bird overflows the bowers with a rich stream of melody. If you imagine this description imbued with the vis poetica, you must recollect that the place is redolent of its influence. There are a number of common-place powder-mills about the Brandywine, that are not so agreeable to muse upon when one bears in mind the tetchy and eccentric nature of their contents, for gunpowder has the irascible reputation of taking fire at the slightest offence. On the gates of these houses are inscribed the words "no admittance;" a precaution, it appears to me, quite unnecessary. By the way, my ears were grievously disturbed at Wilmington by the explosion of a powder-mill. Although situated nearly two miles from the town, it shook it like an untimely fig-tree. It is generally supposed to have been struck with lightning. No living thing was destroyed, except an adolescent grimalkin, who was singed and done for in the twinkling of an eye. If her sufferings were great, it is a consolation to her surviving kindred in the cat-line, to know that they were brief. She died in youth. It was not her melancholy lot to grow old and find the keen discrimination of her whiskers blunted in the lapse of years, or to behold uncaught mice bounding before her languid eye. No! she went when her velvet paws were uncramped by the diseases to which all cats are subject; and few of her race will be permitted to cause such a pother in their moments of dissolution; for certes her death made a great noise in the world. As she was blown out of the centre of the earth's attractions and has not since been heard of, there is no hypothesis in the soothing belief that she has gone to the skies!

Apropos of Wilmington, I hope every one who visits that borough will spend one first day afternoon (Sunday) in the Friend's Meeting-house. It is situated on an eminence west of the town; it is embowered with a few fine trees, and commands a landscape of serene and extended beauty. Let one listen to some good speaker, moved eloquently by the spirit, while he glances out of the open window between the rustling leaves to the south and east, and he will bear a charmed feeling from the spot not soon to be forgotten. To the south, through locusts, poplars, and willows that crowd the eminence, the view embraces the pleasant vale of Christiana with its sinuous stream; to the east the sunbeams fall in a rich flood upon the green meadows, the heavy clumps of trees, and the pillared gates and statues near the distant and magnificent groves of Eden Park. Beyond, the Delaware stretches with its cloud-like sails; and the lands of Jersey melt blue and faint into the distance. It is a place to drink deep at the well of devotion and poetry.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PETER THE PIRATE.

"Unknown to fear, the bucanier,
Self-crown'd the ocean ranger,
Blow high, blow low, his course will steer,
His element is danger."

It may not be known to the reader, that the little town of Baltimore, in Munster, was once the rival of Algiers in maritime audacity, or that the strong-hold of the Irish bucaniers was destroyed by the daring servants of the dey. Such, however, is the fact: Baltimore was reduced by the pirates of the Mediterranean in the year sixteen hundred and thirty-one, and the neighbouring country pillaged. Nearly the whole of the inhabitants were carried into captivity, and the history of the melancholy affair is sufficiently romantic and novel to excuse the telling.

The renowned Patrick Deignan was wont to say, that there was rebellion in the sound of the O; treason, he declared, lurked within its magic circle, and therefore he held it impossible that one who allowed this rotund character to precede his name could be loyal. The doctor had not much acquaintance with history, or he could have illustrated his doctrine by reference to the annals of other days. There was a time when it was dishonourable in a big or little O to be either a good subject or an honest man. Sir John Davies assures us, that every chieftain in his time kept a pair of Donald Beans on his establishment, for the purpose of supplying his larder with beef and mutton, borrowed from the domains of his neighbours; and every one knows, that until within the last fifty years the whole of the western coast was almost exclusively in the possession of Milesian pirates or smugglers. We read in the old chronicles collected in Harris's Hibernica, that various expeditions, under the bournments of the day, were undertaken against their strong-holds; but, although many of them obtained an atrocious distinction, none of them ever arrived at the opulence and extent which were attained by Baltimore in the beginning of the seventeenth century. It, as well as the adjoining district, was peopled by the O'Driscolls, a hardy, daring, and maritime race. Their chief strong-hold was at one time full of all the luxuries and wealth, not only of Europe, but of Asia; and they did not fail to lay under contribution every merchant vessel that ventured out without a convoy. Their vessels were to be met in every sea; and in the pride of lawlessness, they even ventured to chase the corsairs of the Ægean, who interfered with their plans. The terror which they inspired was chiefly owing to the bravery and skill of a youthful leader, named Leary, but who was then, and has been since, known as "Peter the Pirate." In a population devoted to unlawful pursuits, but little respect was shown to birth, and Peter was never happy enough to know his parents. The chief of the O'Driscolls had reared him in his own house, educated him in his own terrible profession, and hailed with gladness the development of those nautical qualifications which ultimately placed him over the fleets of Baltimore. In his skill and prowess the O'Driscolls had such confidence, that they attacked and fought with a certainty of success; and under his command they never encountered defeat.

Though in the spirit of the ancients—which made Sir Francis Drake a robber and a hero—they did not think piracy dishonourable, yet they did not decline the more gentle offices of trade. They imported such commodities as the people of Munster needed, and exported such productions as their wants did not consume. The blending of the piratical with the mercantile character argued a certain degree of civilization; and they had arrived at the moral conclusion, even now recognised, that it was not proper that merchants should be plundered by any one but themselves. They had already chastised the corsairs; and the largest fleet that ever left Baltimore sailed, under the command of Peter the Pirate, for Algiers. It soon swept the Mediterranean of the infidel bucaniers, and even anchored, it is said, under the walls of the Dey's capital.

Its return was hailed with enthusiasm by the O'Driscolls; bonfires blazed on the hills around, and the shouts of gladness that issued from the populace might have been easily heard at the city called Cork, which, by the way, is not more than a good score miles distant. Of course, the most particular honours were paid the naval hero, Peter the Pirate. He felt—how could he feel otherwise—flattered; but his heart was sad; there was a significant negligence of his apparel, and, like the Persian monarch, he sighed not from the preposterous idea that his gallant comrades should perish in less than a century, but because Honor O'Driscoll did not respond to his languishing gaze—in a word, because she did not return his love. The fact is by no means creditable to her taste; for if the contemporary minstrels are to be believed—and their songs have reached our times—Peter the Pirate was not wanting in those attributes which the daughters of bucaniers admire. He might have sat for the picture of Lord Byron's Conrad; for his was that "magic of the mind."

"That moulds another's weakness to its will."

But he was efficient in those softer graces that recommend gallants, when ladies are critical. He could speak his passion in a tone suited to a soul of sensibility; and, although a hundred victories had shed their honours on him, yet his name was associated with deeds, the bare relation of which might terrify even men to sleep at midnight. The severity of his character would have readily found apology in the estimation of those with whom he associated, had he not suffered in their good opinion by acts of cruelty and vindictiveness towards his unprotected followers. The necessity of discipline might excuse him in the eyes of pirates, were he not prone to take pleasure in the miseries he inflicted. His brow, too, was downcast and forbidding; his lips seldom emitted joyous laughter; and he shunned those pastimes in which the thoughtless children of crime sometimes indulged. The qualities for which he was known had failed to recommend him to Honor O'Driscoll. Her gentle nature but ill suited the dangerous occupations of her kindred, and the gentleness of her disposition turned away instinctively from the recital of those deeds of blood which filled her townsmen with a sanguinary enthusiasm. She had early found—as all ladies are likely to find—a congenial spirit in a youthful kinsman. He was as brave, but not so experienced as Leary; and he had endeared himself to his townsmen by several acts of brave disinterestedness, which marked him at no distant day for a desirable ocean-ranger.

His attention to Honor, and her visible partiality, had not escaped the pirate. His pride, however, would not permit him to doubt of success, and the moment which covered him with glory he judged as most likely to recommend him to the father of the maiden. His proposal was not received by the pirate chieftain with any extraordinary manifestation of delight, and from Honor he experienced a decided refusal. He turned away unmurmuringly, but with a clouded brow, and next morning his favoured rival was found in the streets a corpse. This act of domestic violence aroused the vengeance of the whole family of pirates. Suspicion fell on Peter—circumstances confirmed it—and he had to fly precipitately from Baltimore.

The hardy children of the sea were not without a reasonable portion of sensibility. They lamented the fate of the youth, and they sympathized with Honor. The shock affected her spirits—her head. She promised to forget the departed, but could not; and in less than four months from the death of her lover she was gathered to her fathers. The pomp of funeral ceremonial was then fully recognised in Ireland; and the old pirate had enough of the country in him to desire the reflected honour derivable from a splendid "wake and burial." The wine of France and the gin of Holland flowed copiously, while potheen was considered by these aristocrats of the ocean too vulgar a beverage for so joyous an occasion as the death of a chieftain's child! The unseemly revelry had continued for three days, when a strange sail appeared in sight. She neared, and quitted the land in a suspicious manner; but the pirates were too busy with mirth and wine to heed a solitary bark, and towards evening she entirely disappeared.

The keeners had poured forth their dismal chant of sorrow, and the revellers from exhaustion had retired, when a wild and tumultuous shout filled the streets with hostile alarm. Those who had not been entirely steeped in forgetfulness hurried out; but their amazement was complete, when they saw, by the light of the burning houses, that their strong-hold was invaded by the swarthy Africans—the inhabitants of Algiers! For three hours the streets ran with the blood of the O'Driscolls. They made a brave—a desperate stand. They fought for existence, and their courage was inflamed by a national, a professional hatred of their enemies; but their daring was in vain; the strangers prevailed—the ignited houses filled the air with a dull red canopy, and the cries of women and children pierced the ears of their relatives, who struggled, without effect, to save them from worse than butchery!

Amongst the conquerors there was one, says the metrical chronicle of the time, who outdid his fellows in atrocity and desperation. The pirates who guarded the habitation of their chief fell hastily before his sabre, and he strode like a demon of destruction into the chamber of death.

"You pollute not this floor with your presence," said the O'Driscoll, drawing his sabre; but the stout stranger quickly resumed it from him, and flung it on the ground.

"I have come," he said, "unbidden, because I ought to have been an invited guest."

"What?" exclaimed the chief, "that voice?"

"'Tis Peter the Pirate's," interrupted the renegade. "Old man, am I revenged? Your power is gone; your whole race are bond-slaves, and Honor shall be mine."

O'Driscoll stood unmoved; he saw that resistance was useless, and considered remonstrance unmanly. With an ironical smile, conceived in the bitterness of revenge and fatherly tenderness, he bowed to the ruffian intruder, and inquired if he would convey his bride to the soil of Africa.

"I care not for your taunts," said Peter; "where is your daughter?"

"Here!" cried the old man, as he turned down the white pall that concealed the face of the dead beauty. The pirate was shocked at the sight, and in that moment of good feeling stooped to kiss the lips of the corpse. The father, indignant at the familiarity, which he considered little less than pollution, suddenly grasped his battle-axe, and before the Algerines could interfere, separated the pirate's head from his body.

Such is the history which contemporary bards have left us. The O'Driscolls were carried into captivity, and the town destroyed. The sad event was long remembered. It has been made the subject of melodies and epics; and Mr. Crofton Croker has translated one of the songs, which a fugitive pirate sang on the occasion. It is as follows:

THE IRISH BUCANIER.

"Our oars we ply, when seas run high,
And loud the winds are roaring;
Now down the depths, now up the sky,
On eagle billows soaring!

And when we hail the gentler gale,
With glees our stout hearts glowing,
Abroad we spread the spritied sail,
And catch it while 'tis blowing.

For us enough, or fair or blue,
Waves calm or wildly foaming,
So we may launch, through smooth or rough,
Adventurously roaming!

Unknown to fear, the bucanier,
Self-crown'd the ocean ranger,
Blow high, blow low, his course will steer,
His element is danger!"

CHARACTER OF AN HEIRESS.

"Louisa Creswell, with a form and eye and charms well calculated both to inspire a passion and to harbour one, was decidedly incapable, at least as yet, of the latter. Whims she had, and wishes, momentary preferences, kindness, softness; but love she could not entertain. She could not feel it, and yet she made huge attempts thereat. She read of passion—the volumes of a novel, or of Byron, told what it was; she heard of affection, as what she should feel. And yet she was incapable of that secondary or artificial feeling, which even the coldest hearts arrive at. Such is the plain truth—a truth that no one, who knew her suspected, and that indeed few, in this sage world, could believe true of any woman. Such a temperament in the common walks of life would have succeeded admirably, and such do, perhaps, bid fairer for happiness than warmer ones. For in such hearts Hymen is apt to light up the flame that Cupid might have puffed for ages at in vain.

"But, unfortunately, poor Louisa was an heiress, she had the gift of thousands, sufficient to content and elevate, in a worldly sense, whomsoever she might select. She was good, too—bonne, as the French say, which means more than good; and though despising neither rank nor title, she could have done without either. She wanted happiness, and had certainly, she thought, wherewithal to purchase or command it. This rendered her, contrary to her nature, difficult to please; and she waived and put aside, with all the easy firmness and impertinence of an established beauty, the thickening addresses of the common race of dandies.

"A man of humbler claims, though of no less pride, succeeded in making some impression. Fitz-Erne was he. No personage was so uncommon, or more handsome; he was dark, reserved, susceptible, just the stuff for a hero—and though never condescending to be sentimental, or giving tokens of such faculty, yet he must be so. Now what had Louisa to do with sentiment, seeing she neither had, nor comprehended it? So it was! the incomprehensible had charms for her, and Fitz-Erne was smiled on.

"Fitz-Erne, on his part, if he had fixed upon one maxim in life, it was that of not being interested or ambitious in his loves. He had steeled his heart against high-born beauty; he meant, it seemed, high-born beauty with the pride and indifference of birth about it. But the said beauty, decked in smiles, in meaning smiles, acting kindness, looking preference—for that he was not prepared. It perplexed, flattered, frightened him. Pride and vanity had a smart wrangle together within him, but the heels of pride were tripped up. He loved the lady for her charms, her heart. For him to have doubted that she had one, would have been infidel indeed. Louisa's eye, though generally languid, could yet light up. Her form and expression promised feeling, which propriety and good breeding, no doubt, concealed. And the said feeling and warmth which Fitz-Erne supposed in her, was more valuable in his eyes, because, like other charms, it lay veiled. Moreover, the beauty uttered no silliness—she had been too well bred. Temperament and education had endowed her with an apathy that was at once modish and convenient, and rendered her fortunately contented with looking perfection, without encountering the more arduous attempt of speaking or of acting it.

"Fitz-Erne, however, was mistrustful. His character, however firm and decisive in all other considerations, was wavering and wayward in this. Pride checked him at one time, the fear of being ridiculous at another; suspicion would at times intrude. He was a suitor after the fashion of Sheridan's "Falkland," except that his suspicions were of himself, more than of his mistress. Miss Creswell grew soon weary of those tortuousities of sentiment. Though Fitz-Erne was of a sincerity in all these moods that actually put him to torture, still, as he externally covered all with the most smiling and easy air, his conduct naturally appeared to the lady as mystification—as coquetry, in fine; which in man is the most despicable of all realities or appearances.

"The explication of this conduct on the part of Fitz-Erne may appear hereafter. It of course alienated Miss Creswell. Why did she not listen to any one of the nobler or high-born suitors that attended her steps? She did not so, but met their approaches with coldness. Strange inconsistency of human nature! She sought a passion, who was incapable of feeling one, and would not be contented with less. Young Willoughby crossed her path, and the mixture of feeling and foppery that appeared in him charmed her. He possessed the mad gaiety of youth, while that of Fitz-Erne was of the manly and caustic kind. Then he was frank, free, open, without a shadow of mistrust or of hidden thought. It was a relief to talk with him after having conversed with Fitz-Erne. And although the latter had put him on the first step in life, had impeded the first wing he raised therein, still that moment of success was sufficient for Willoughby. He kept the place that chance and Fitz-Erne had thrust him to, and took with happy audacity the station that it would have required some years' experience naturally to have attained." EXTRACTS FROM CHINESE AUTHORS.

Away with anger and vexation! These are sure to induce premature old age. In a world of ten thousand various concerns, how is it possible that every thing should be perfect! One cannot help sighing to see men such fools as to be always vexed and sorrowing. If you were rich as a king, it is impossible to prevent every year, and every where, numbers of such being laid under the green turf. Whilst, therefore, you may live in pleasure, enjoy it. Why labour to find out for yourself causes of anger and vexation.

Against sorrow, the only argument brought, is the consideration that in a former state of existence, poverty or riches, and all other circumstances, were settled by fate, and sorrow is useless.

Against anxiety. If a man lives a hundred years, the amount of days is only thirty-six thousand, and the greater part of that time is passed either in sickness or in sleep. None enjoy perfect health and the absence of sorrow. To see, after a life vainly spent, declining old age, is a matter deserving sincere commiseration. The vanity of life is still more clearly seen in those who do not attain to a hundred years of age. What use then is there in being constantly anxious and running hither and thither with wave-like restlessness? From this time henceforward awaken to a proper discernment of the case, and let your heart and your body have a little leisure and repose.

The vanity of this world! From ancient times to the present but few who are born into the world attain the age of seventy. Abstract from three score years and ten, childhood and old age, and the time between is but a short period. Besides, there is the scorching heat and the hoar frost, with trouble and vexation. The autumnal moon does not always shine bright. And in the season of flowers they do not always blossom beautifully. Even in the prime of life, health is not the certain portion of man. Therefore, when the flowers do blossom, and the moon shines, sing aloud your song, and hasten to drink from the full golden cup: there is your money in the world than you can ever gain, and more offices at court than you can ever fill. Be contented; high offices and much wealth are often causes of sorrow and anxiety, which soon turn the hair gray. Spring, summer, autumn, winter, pass in rapid succession, swift as the fingers can handle the words. The bell announces eventide, and quickly follows the crowing of the cock to report the approach of morning. Consider, and mark the men who have passed before you: how many of them in one year are laid under the grassy sod. And among the many hillocks raised over the dead, at the annual season of visiting the tombs, one-half of them remain unswept—the family of the tenant beneath has become extinct!

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

SINCE our last young Kean has completed his first engagement on the American boards. In addition to the characters already noticed in the Mirror, he has appeared in Sir Edward Mortimer, in the Iron Chest, and in Shylock. The house on every occasion of his performing has been full and fashionable, and his reception enthusiastically flattering. We shall not enter into an analysis of the above mentioned parts at the present time, but simply assert that every renewed opportunity of witnessing the display of Mr. Kean's powers confirms the first impression of our belief, that he is destined to reach the highest rank of histrionic excellence.

Most of our readers have probably turned over the pages of any given number of "annuals." Many of them may have been enraptured, as in duty bound, with the fair clean type and lustrous paper, and splendid engravings of the last year's Keepsake. These may perhaps remember a very pretty picture contained in that magnificent volume, entitled the Widow of Ems—and perhaps too they may not have forgotten the story that accompanied and illustrated that picture. It is upon this story that some ingenious gentleman (we believe that his name is Bailey) has founded the new farce of Perfection, and he has performed his task gracefully and with skill. The plot of the piece is sufficiently slender, and indeed it may be called only a mere outline, to which it is for the ingenuity of the performers to give body and colouring. The dramatis personæ are Sir Lawrence Paragon, (Placide) a worthy old bachelor, lamenting in solitude and Welsh flannels the fastidious nicety of his marrying days in which he would not marry, and extremely anxious for the conjugal execution of his nephew, Mr. Paragon, (Simpson) whose notions of female excellence are even more extravagant than the baronet's, and who is modestly resolved to marry no woman who is in any particular short of "perfection." With this reasonable purpose in his mind and on his lips, he is introduced by the uncle to Kate O'Brien, (Miss Clara Fisher) a ward of the baronet's, who, being warned of his high requisitions, has a plot to subdue and punish them. Her contrivance is to win his affections without appearing to possess one of the accomplishments upon which he has always so strenuously insisted in his helpmate, and is successful. He makes her a solemn and very pathetic tender of his hand which is accepted, and is immediately horrified with the information that his adored mistress is a cripple—that it is her lot "to limp through life upon a timber toe." Here begins the drollery of the farce, continued through two scenes, the first between Paragon and his servant, Sam, (T. Placide) and the second with the uncle, both of whom, by a series of allusions, apparently unintentional, to the misfortune of his bride, work upon his excited feelings and wring from him sundry most ludicrous exclamations of grief, mortification, and despair. A violent struggle ensues between love and honour on the one hand, and his horror of a wooden leg upon the other—but the former are triumphant. He returns to his mistress and declares his resolution to marry her, let what may come of it; and the piece ends with the surprise and delight of the magnanimous lover on finding that his lady dances like a houri, and is indeed perfection, with the joy of his bachelor uncle and the usual congratulatory and matrimonial addresses before the fall of the curtain. Placide was dry, natural, and very entertaining, as usual, in the baronet, and Simpson young, (much younger than many younger men) lively, and laughable in the bewildered lover. Mrs. Blake and Mr. T. Placide had little to do in Susannah and Sam, and did that little correctly and with a becoming spirit of resignation. But to us, whose ears are the most susceptible portions of our composition, the charm, the bright spot of the evening was a delicious Irish ballad, sung most deliciously by Kate O'Brien's charming representative. There is a pathos in her voice that reaches the very lowest depths of the feelings, and makes them to gush forth as the waters from the rock at the touch of Moses' rod. Like her face, it is most excellent and apt for the expression of all feeling; the soft and tender notes of music fall from her lips as gentle and as sweet as precious balsams from Arabian incense trees. What can be more touching or more beautiful than "Home, sweet home," or "Since then I'm doomed" as she sings them; or what more exquisite than this simple ballad of "Kate Kearney" as it steals forth in liquid melody from her rich and expressive voice? There are more astonishing, many, no doubt, better singers in the world than she; multitudes who can execute more difficult passages, and dazzle their hearers with far more brilliancy and power; but in the sentiment of music, in the perfect adaptation of tone and look and gesture to the feeling of her words, she has few superiors, we had almost said few equals. What an heroic, martial, chivalrous spirit glows in her "Bonnets of blue"—what unsophisticated lightness of heart beams in her eyes and exults in her voice in "The merry Swiss girl"—what a tender and delicate enthusiasm when she sings of the "fatal glance" of Kate Kearney! For ourselves, all critical as we are, and far too busy to be sentimental, we were completely overcome, and many a time since we heard the song, have had our gravest meditations interrupted and our most momentous cogitations put to flight by the bewitching recollection. It was but this very day, while concocting a sage article upon the affairs of France, that we fell into a reverie in the very act of writing, and upon returning consciousness were startled at finding the paper covered with innumerable repetitions of

"She looks so bewitchingly simple,
Yet there's mischief in every dimple;"
and occasional reiterations of the concluding line—
"For fatal's the smile of Kate Kearney."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

CHARLES J. KEAN.

THE extraordinary success of this popular young tragedian, and the genius he has discovered in the delineation of the most arduous characters of the drama, have already ranked him among the most gifted in his profession; and have produced a corresponding desire in the public mind to become acquainted with his early history, and his professional character, stripped of the thousand rumours which always attach themselves to, and are in some measure inseparable from, the rapid and sudden distinction to which genius ever attains. We have therefore taken some pains to possess ourselves of an authentic narrative on the subject, which we are happy to be enabled to lay before our readers.

Charles John Kean was born in the city of Waterford, in the county of the same name, in Ireland, on the eighteenth of January, 1811, and is now in the twentieth year of his age. His father, the celebrated Edmund Kean, who for the last sixteen years has filled so large a space in the history of the stage, from his earliest infancy down to the time of, and for some time after, the birth of his son, was attached to various provincial theatres in Great Britain, where his professional exertions hardly more than contributed to his subsistence. In this capacity he was employed, when, in the year 1809, he met with his present wife, then Miss Chambers, who was descended from one of the first families in Ireland, and to whom he was united at Stroud, not merely against the will, but without the knowledge of her friends.

By this marriage Mr. Kean had two children, of whom Charles was the second, and is the only survivor, the elder having died at the age of about five years. During all this period Mr. Kean had continued travelling through the country playing at the provincial theatres, and thus furnishing himself with the means of supporting his family, which, from the state into which those theatres had at that time fallen, was no easy matter. His earnings scarcely ever exceeded thirty shillings a week, and the uncertainty of receiving even that amount, not unfrequently added to his embarrassment. The period was, however, rapidly approaching when his prospects began to brighten. His originality of conception and boldness of execution of the first tragic characters, began to excite attention, which was not long in settling down into admiration; and his fame, which at first gradually spread throughout the provincial towns, at length reached the metropolis, and procured for him an engagement at Drury Lane, where he made his first appearance in Shylock on the twenty-sixth of January, 1814. In the representation of this part, according to a contemporaneous critic, "the originality of his style, and the vigour of his genius, drew down the most enthusiastic applause, which increased with every scene, and at length became absolutely tumultuous. His fame increased with each successive repetition, and it was admitted that he might safely challenge competition with the most distinguished ornaments of the stage." He appeared in rapid succession in the other characters, for the representation of which he has become so distinguished, and, by the almost unanimous voice of the public, the very highest rank was soon conceded to him. As a necessary consequence he was caressed by men of the first distinction and rank in the kingdom; his family shared in his elevation; fortune smiled upon him, and from the society of a strolling company, and the reception of a pittance scarcely sufficient to supply the ordinary wants of nature, he found himself, as if by magic, the companion of the greatest and the best of whom the proud metropolis of England could boast, with almost unbounded wealth placed at once within his grasp.

Charles was at this time between three and four years old, too young of course, to perceive the strong contrast which his father's affairs now presented, to what they so recently had been, although he participated most fully in their enjoyment. At the age of five years he was sent to one of the first preparatory schools in England, about ten miles from London, under the care of the Rev. Edward Polehampton, Rector of Greenford Parish, adjoining Harrow on the Hill. Here he remained until he was thirteen years of age, when, having finished his preparatory course, he entered Eton college. It should here be observed that the plan of education which was marked out for him, was such as should qualify him for the best society, of which, while a mere child, he had already had a glimpse, and for the enjoyment of which his father's increasing fame and fortune promised him every facility. With these anticipations his education was commenced and carried on; and calculating, as on a moral certainty, upon their being fully realized, his habits of life and his early associations were formed accordingly. His companions were selected from the first rank in point of title and distinction, and his suavity of manners, no less than his literary proficiency, while they gained for him the respect of all who knew him, promised him a high standing in the sphere in which, but for subsequent circumstances, he was destined to move. With these prospects bright before him, and with a mind cultivated even beyond his age, he entered Eton college, where he continued for three years. During this time he was no less remarkable than he had before been for his proficiency; and the same kindness and amiableness of deportment, which had in earlier life been his distinguishing characteristic, continued to secure for him the most affectionate regard of his youthful associates. While at Eton, he was conspicuous for his attainments in the upper division of the college, and when, having completed his course, he was about to take his leave, he was presented by the head master, as well as by his private tutors, and many of his classmates, with tokens of respect and admiration for his good qualities, accompanied with the liveliest wishes of all for his future happiness.

At this time, it became somewhat uncertain to what young Kean should turn his attention. In consequence of domestic circumstances, which are well known, and to which it is necessary only to advert, a separation between his father and mother had taken place. The fair prospects which lay before him during the whole of his life now began to fade, and he was compelled to abandon the hope, which at one time he had had such good reason to entertain, and for which by education he was so well qualified, of enjoying leisure sweetened by the possession of a handsome fortune. Still, however, the idea of going upon the stage never entered his mind. When about completing his studies at Eton, a cadetship in India was offered him through the interest of Mr. Calcraft, a distinguished member of parliament. This would have yielded him a competent support, and perhaps would have been accepted, but for the circumstance to which allusion has already been made, and the sacrifice of feeling which he would have been obliged to make. He returned home on the first of August, 1827. Finding his mother suffering severely from ill health, and resolving to forego every prospect, however fair, which required him to leave her, he at once declined the offer of Mr. Calcraft. The misunderstanding between his father and mother still continued, and young Kean found himself thrown entirely upon his own resources, not merely for his own subsistence but for that of his mother. The embarrassing, and to a sensitive mind like his, heart-rending situation in which he was thus placed, can perhaps hardly be conceived. Without means which could be brought to bear upon the exigency of his situation, and with ideas of personal pride, which his education and prospects could not fail to produce, and which so far from preparing him to breast the billows of adverse fortune, were rather calculated to unnerve him under a trial so severe, what was to be done? His mind was made up fully as to one thing, that he and his mother must rise or fall together; and that whatever prospect might present itself, if inconsistent with this fixed determination, was to be most unhesitatingly rejected. His necessities, at length, pressed him to a determination as to the course to be adopted; and, as the only one which promised him immediate relief, he embraced a proposal made to him by Mr. Price, to perform at Drury-lane. This engagement was for three years, and on the first of October, 1827, just two months from the time of his leaving college, he appeared for the first time in the character of Young Norval, in Home's tragedy of Douglas. He was warmly received; and although his performance was, abstractly considered, in many respects exceptionable, it gave promise of that genius which even the short period that has since elapsed has so fully developed. His voice wanted strength and compass; his manner evinced an unacquaintance with effect, and his person was deficient in that bold and manly firmness which time alone could confer. These were defects for which every allowance was made, and which it was foreseen, as the event has now proved, time and experience would supply. In the course of this engagement he also appeared in Selim, in the tragedy of Barbarossa, and in Frederick in Lovers Vows, in which latter part, from the similarity it bore to his own situation, and the generous feelings of filial affection in which it abounds, and which, it is well known, formed a distinguishing trait in his character, he acquired a great share of reputation. After having gone through these pieces before a London audience, he determined to try the sister kingdoms, and accordingly appeared in Dublin and Edinburgh, as well as at some of the provincial theatres in England, where he enlarged his range of acting, but without entering upon the higher parts, in which he has since evinced such a decided superiority. He now resolved on excelling in a profession into which he was forced by circumstance; over which he had no control, and having studied closely some of the less heroic and passionate of the tragic characters, he returned to London, and in the autumn of 1828, opened at Drury-lane as Romeo. It was evident that he had greatly improved as well in the physical power of embodying his conceptions as in his acquaintance with the stage, and the expectations which his first appearance had excited were, in a great degree, fulfilled. After a very successful course of performance at Drury-lane, he once more determined to try the provinces, where he increased his reputation, while, at the same time, by unremitting application, he was enabled to extend the range of his characters, and impart greater vigour and boldness to their representation.

In the fall of 1828, he once more returned to London, and it being the vacation at Drury-lane, he opened at the Haymarket, where he repeated his principal parts, and appeared for the first time in Reuben Glenroy and Sir Edward Mortimer. It was in this latter character that he first made a most decided impression upon the critics of the metropolis. The boldness of conception, and the physical energy which he threw into this arduous part, gained the admiration of all who saw him during its frequent repetitions, and stamped him at once an actor of no ordinary promise. The circumstances attending its first representation, although somewhat out of place here, are deserving of notice. During the summer of 1828, while he was playing at the Sunderland and Durham theatres, in conjunction with a favourite comic actor, the manager expressed a wish to unite the talents of both in the same play, and suggested to young Kean the propriety of his studying the part of Sir Edward Mortimer for that purpose. In this suggestion he readily acquiesced, and his reception was so flattering, that although he had undertaken the character at short notice, and was comparatively imperfect in it, it was repeated amidst the most enthusiastic marks of approbation. This encouraged him to a more close and careful study of that play, and although he had not then, and to the present moment has not had the benefit of seeing his father in it, it is decidedly one of his best and most effective pieces of acting. This fact is the more worthy of observation, as it goes strongly to acquit him of the charge of imitation, and to entitle him to the signal and extraordinary merit of great boldness and originality of conception.

After the completion of his engagement at the Haymarket, he visited the continent, and played at Amsterdam, and at the royal theatre at the Hague, where he was honoured with the presence of the king and queen and the royal family of the Netherlands. On his return to England, in the latter part of 1829, finding that his father was at Drury-lane, he relinquished the residue of his engagement there, which it will be recollected was for three years, and had not as yet expired, and once more visited the provincial theatres. Here he first ventured upon the higher range of characters, Othello, Richard III., Shylock, Sir Giles Overreach, &c. upon which he then resolved to stake his claims to distinction. In these the fame he acquired was as sudden as his appearance in them had been rapid. Night after night they were repeated to overflowing houses, and the tremendous bursts of applause with which they were received, while they bore the fullest testimony to his extraordinary genius, inspired him with confidence in his own powers, and excited him to renewed and unceasing exertion. The fame consequent on so successful and brilliant a career as his last season in England, soon spread itself across the Atlantic, and the prospect of encouragement in this country, having been confidently held out to the young tragedian, by those who had witnessed and admired his fine acting, he determined on a visit to America. He accordingly left England on the sixteenth of July last, and arrived in New-York on the twenty seventh of August following. He was immediately engaged at the Park theatre, where he appeared on the first of September, as Richard III. to an overflowing house, by whom he was received with the most enthusiastic acclamations, which his performance so well merited. He has since appeared with signal success, and each night been greeted with crowded houses, as Othello, Sir Giles Overreach, Sir Edward Mortimer, and Shylock.

The length to which our remarks have already extended, will necessarily abridge the observations which we feel ourselves called upon to make on Mr. Kean's general style of acting. The model which he has placed before him is undeniably his father's school, than which a more perfect one, whatever may be said to the contrary, has never been established. In pursuing it, however, he stands perfectly clear of the charge of imitation. His conceptions are his own, chastened and improved by a close observation of the beauties which shone so conspicuously through every part of his father's acting, and which, perhaps, would hardly have been attempted to be traced to any other than himself, but for the close resemblance, in a physical point of view, which exists between them. The first painters that ever have lived, have not scrupled to improve upon the beauties of others, and yet who ever denied their claims to genius on that account, or presumed for a moment to detract from their merit, by denouncing them as imitators? Or who has pretended that the host of writers who have moulded themselves upon the excellencies of the British classics, and who, in many instances, have proved superior to them, are to be condemned as plagiarists, and held up as objects of ridicule, not of praise? The most that can be said is, that their school is the same, and that as they are physically similar, so there is a point of resemblance between their conceptions.

Those who have observed Mr. C. Kean's acting, must have perceived that his forte is strong feeling. Hence his great excellence in Othello, Sir Giles Overreach, Sir Edward Mortimer and Shylock. In all these, he represents the bursts of passion in each one so strongly drawn, with the most perfect truth to nature, and, in many instances, with a chasteness not even to be found in the splendid acting of his father. In the delineation of madness he is inimitable, and in such scenes as the last in Sir Giles Overreach, nothing can be finer than the transition, rapid yet distinctly marked, from disappointment to vexation, and from vexation to despair. Although the tongue is silent—the eye—the countenance—the manner—all speak to the heart in a language which it does not refuse to answer. It is related, particularly with reference to this scene, that on one occasion a physician who had observed him with intense interest, was so fully persuaded that he had fainted in reality, as to rush behind the scenes, and insist upon drawing blood, from which he was scarcely diverted by the positive assurance of the actor, that it was but fiction!—At another time, the actress who performed the part of Margaret, was so much affected by the despair of Sir Giles, and the conclusion of the scene, as to forget the play, shed tears upon the stage, and almost sink down from agitation when the curtain fell!

We have adverted to his delineation of madness. On this subject we are well assured of the correctness of the following anecdote. Dining with some gentlemen, one of whom was a distinguished surgeon, at Stratford-upon-Avon, at the last Shakspeare jubilee, the subject of madness coming up Mr. Kean rose and went through a mad scene in pantomime. The expression of countenance and the manner of the young actor astonished his spectators, some of whom vented their admiration in the strongest terms of praise. The surgeon, however, to whom Kean had principally bent his attention during the scene, remained silent, which the latter interpreted into disapprobation. Somewhat hurt at what he considered a failure, he observed that he never had seen a madman, although he had often in vain expressed a desire to get admission into Bedlam. "I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Kean," said the surgeon, recovering himself, "if you will but visit Bedlam and go through the scene you have just given, you will find no difficulty in procuring admission immediately."

The awfully impressive manner in which he pronounces the curse in Sir Edward Mortimer—"May those fiends who strangle babes for very wantonness, shrink back and shudder at your monstrous crimes, and shrinking, curse you!"—and the action accompanying it, of stretching forth his arms and fixing his eyes intently upon Wilford, is a touch of nature as original as it is fine. This was among the earliest of those brilliant points which have since acquired him so much notice. After he had appeared several times in that character, he happened to visit, in company with a literary friend, a splendid collection of paintings, then just opened. Among the rest was one by Sir Thomas Lawrence, representing Satan calling together the fallen angels. The painting happening to catch the eye of his friend, the attitude and expression which had been given to Satan struck him at once, as bearing a strong resemblance to that of Kean in Sir Edward Mortimer, which he instantly pointed out to the young actor, exclaiming, "My heavens, Kean, there you are as Sir Edward Mortimer in the Iron Chest, and painted to the life!"

One evening when he was playing Shylock at Worcester, a gentleman who was well acquainted with his father, happening to enter one of the boxes, in the midst of the scene with Tubal, observed to a friend that he was glad to see that Kean was restored to health, and that he appeared to act with more spirit and energy than he had evinced for a long time. The latter, who observed the error into which his friend had fallen, immediately undeceived him by remarking that it was not Kean, but his son whom he then saw. The surprise which such a communication produced, was only equalled by the compliment which had led to it, and the interest with which the stranger witnessed the residue of the delineation of the unfeeling Jew, convinced him that the praise he had supposed he was bestowing upon the father, was but a just, although unconscious tribute to the genius of the son.

We are in possession of a number of other anecdotes which we shall probably give hereafter, going to illustrate the remarks we have felt bound to make upon Mr. Kean's style, but which the length to which this article has already extended, compels us at present to exclude. Enough has already been said, we think, to show that his claims to public favour rest upon the most enduring basis; and when we add to the genius which all concede he possesses, the most unexceptionable purity of private character, we cannot conceal the pleasure which we feel in the idea, that to the American public will be due the credit of fostering and cherishing one, who notwithstanding his youth, has already taken a conspicuous station among the best actors of the age. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Bishop Hobart.—The Right Reverend John Henry Hobart, bishop of the protestant episcopal church of this state, died at Auburn, on Sunday morning last, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, after having held the office of bishop of this diocese for nineteen years. His virtues as a christian and a man, which endeared him to all who knew him, will long be held in remembrance, not only by the congregations of the three parishes composing Trinity church, but also by the whole episcopal communion throughout the United States. In England he is spoken of as one of the most accomplished scholars and gentlemen that has ever visited its shores from the western world. In his own country, where "None knew him but to love him, Nor named him but to praise," his departure has left a chasm which cannot be easily supplied.

Horticultural Ball.—The splendid fete given by the Horticultural society at Niblo's saloon, on Monday evening last, surpassed in brilliancy and magnificence any thing of the kind ever witnessed in this city. Should we attempt a description, it would, in dramatic parlance, "prove a complete failure," for our senses were too much dazzled and delighted with the tout ensemble to attend to detail. Let it suffice, that there were brilliant transparencies, devices, and illuminations; pyramids of the most delicious fruits; scenes of oriental enchantment; houries and sylphs to animate the scene, and lots of delightful Adonis's to enjoy it.

Bell's Life in New-York.—There is now before us the first number of a new weekly paper, entitled "Bell's Life in New-York, and American Weekly Messenger," edited by W. L. Prall, Esq. This work has been produced in a style of typography which reflects much credit on the publisher. It is to be conducted on the plan of Bell's Life in London, and if the spirit and ability displayed in the first number be kept up, there can be no doubt of its success. The editor is a gentleman of talents, wit, and fancy; and the following extract, from his introductory address, will exhibit him as an honourable and generous competitor in the race for public favour. He says,

"We interfere with no one's interest or pursuit, as we poach on no neighbour's grounds, and enter on an arena purely our own, we hope to avoid all strife, to cultivate peace and harmony with all, and to merit and receive a respectful consideration among the more brilliant luminaries with which our city is adorned. This is our course, this our desire; and with the olive branch in our hand, we cordially invite a good understanding with all our editorial brethren, and unite in wishing them and ourselves the most cheering prospects of success."

I KNEW A SICILIAN MAID.

A POPULAR SONG, COMPOSED BY BARNETT, AND SUNG BY BRAMHAM, WITH UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE, AT THE DRURY LANE THEATRE, LONDON.

I knew a Sicilian maid, Whose sire was a tes-ty old elf; And who al-ways was great-ly a-fraid, That the maiden would choose for her self: So he kept her quite under con-trol, By means of a good lock and key, And I saw her one ev'ning, poor soul, Look down from her lattice on me. And I saw her one ev'ning, poor soul, Look down from her lattice on me.

SECOND VERSE.
With iron her lattice was barr'd,
And to none could she utter a word,
And I thought it both cruel and hard,
That a maid should be caged like a bird
So at night when sleep com-est thou, dear maid,
I flew with a step light and free,
And I said, should the house be on fire,
Sweet maiden, come downward to me.

THIRD VERSE.
Some branches I burnt, and the smoke
By the wind to the house was convey'd,
Then cried "fire" till the father awoke;
And let out the poor trembling maid.
He was very near dead with affright,
Tho' nor flame nor a spark could he see,
And the maiden came down with delight,
And quickly was wedded to me.

VARIETIES.

THE ANT AND THE CRICKET,
Or the Bankrupt and the Banker.

A SILLY young cricket, accustomed to sing
Through the warm sunny months of gay summer and spring,
Began to complain, when he found that at home
His cupboard was empty, and winter had come.

Not a crumb to be found
On the snow-cover'd ground,
Not a flower could he see,
Not a leaf on a tree;

"O! what will become," says the cricket, "of me?"

At last by starvation and famine made bold,
All dripping with wet, and all trembling with cold,
Away he set off to a miserly ant,
To see if to keep him alive he would grant

Him shelter from rain;
A mouthful of grain,
He wished only to borrow,
He'd repay it to-morrow.

If not he must die of starvation and sorrow.

Says the ant to the cricket, "I'm your servant and friend,
But we ants never borrow, we ants never lend;
But tell me, dear cricket, did you lay nothing by
When the weather was warm?" Quoth the cricket, "Not I!"

My heart was so light,
That I sang day and night,
For all nature look'd gay."

"You sang, sir, you say?"

"Go then," says the ant, "and dance winter away."
Thus ending, he hastily lifted the wicket,
And out of the door turn'd the poor little cricket.

Folks call this a fable, I'll warrant it true;
Some crickets have four legs and some have but two.

OLD EPIGRAM,

SPIDERS.—Professor Weber, of Leipzig, states, that he watched a little spider as it was constructing its web between two trees. The three principal points to which it was attached, formed, as usual, an equilateral triangle. The two upper threads were fixed to the trunks of the trees; but not finding a point to fix the lower upon, the spider suspended from its extremity a little pebble, by way of counterpoise. The pebble being heavier than the animal, kept the web perfectly extended. A curious paper was lately read at the Paris Academy of Sciences on the construction of a spider's nest in the earth. This spider is a native of Corsica. The nest is in the form of a well, two inches deep, and six lines in width. The interior is lined with fine web, and the top is furnished with a kind of lid, with hinges, which shuts when the insect is in. This lid, which is composed of earth and web, consists of upwards of forty layers.

MONUMENT TO SHAKESPEARE.—Proposals are in circulation for a public meeting to consider the expediency of erecting a national monument to Shakspeare, worthy of the genius of the poet, (impossible!) the progress of the arts, and the grandeur of the empire. We heartily wish the design success.

A provincial actor performing the part of Augustus, in the tragedy of "Cinna," during the late severe winter, evinced his delicate sensibility to cold by the very un-Romanlike action of rubbing his hands together. A few audible hisses from some classic spectators in the pit reminded the performer of his want of noble bearing. Nothing disconcerted, the actor exclaimed, with a loud oath—"Idiots! a Roman knows just as well as a christian when the thermometer marks fifteen degrees below zero."

ABSENCE OF MIND.—Who does not sometimes forget the day of the month, or the day of the week? It is said that M. de Bonnard, a well-known French academician, asked his own name of one of his friends when he was about to sign a contract of marriage. One of Napoleon's courtiers, talking to Louis eighteenth, in the year 1814, began, "Sire, your genius and your victories—" A similar lapses lingua is just now amusing the good people of Paris. A peer of France exclaimed to his jealous and angry spouse, "I assure you, my dear Fanny!" forgetting that that was the name of the fair one whom the lady suspected of being her rival.

A friend conversing with Talleyrand about the portrait of a ministerial personage, not remarkable for eloquence, exclaimed—"What a striking resemblance! It positively wants only the faculty of speech." "No wonder," replied Talleyrand, "it was sketched in the house of lords."

SAND.—Showers of reddish dust have lately fallen in various parts of Italy. This phenomenon was, in the first instance, attributed to an eruption of Mount Aetna; but it is now believed to have been sand transported from the plains of Africa by a violent sirocco.

QUILLS.—Quills are things that sometimes are taken from the pinions of one goose to spread the opinions of another.

THE MERCHANT AND THE BLIND MAN.

"Fact—not fable."—Halleck.

OGILVIE was born at Edinburgh, in Scotland, and bred a watchmaker. Being wrecked in his fortunes, his eye-sight gone, and his wife dead, he resolved to quit his native country and seek for new friends in the city of London. The sister of his deceased wife requested that she might take his only child, an infant, and adopt it as her own; he consented, and she called the child Julia. Ogilvie soon prepared to bid adieu to Scotland; and that he might have a companion in his misfortunes, he bought a dog, named him Pompey, and put a brass collar on his neck, with these words, in large letters engraven upon it, "Pompey asking alms for his blind master."

Thus equipped, Ogilvie and Pompey set out on their journey, and arrived at the Red Lion inn, on the twentieth of June. The next day Ogilvie was conducted to the parish of St. Giles, where he took lodgings at two shillings and sixpence per week. Being now settled, his host accompanied him and Pompey to the piazza of Covent-garden theatre, where, by the side of the pillars, he took his stand. This situation he occupied on all business days for upwards of eighteen years. Ogilvie's custom was never to speak, but always to hold his hat in his hand, with Pompey by his side. When any person dropped money into the hat he made a bow, but never uttered a word, unless he was first spoken to, and then his answer generally was "yes" or "no."

Mr. Lovel, a merchant in the West India trade, whose counting-rooms were at old City Chambers, and his dwelling in Soho Square, was in the daily habit of passing under the piazza. One afternoon, observing the blind man and his dog, he stopped, and taking hold of the collar, read aloud the inscription. He then addressed the blind man thus, "Pray tell me, sir, by what means you lost your sight?"

"By that scourge of mankind, the small-pox," he answered.

Lovel, putting a one pound note into his hand, bid him go; and walked off. On his way home, his thoughts dwelt on what he had just seen and heard, which filled his bosom with deep sorrow; and what aided to create greater sympathy for the blind man in the mind of Lovel, was the circumstance of his having, only six months previously, lost his own wife by the same disorder, leaving him and his little son John, then six years of age, to bemoan her untimely death. That very night Lovel resolved that he would ever after, either in going into the city or on returning to his house, throw into the blind man's hat a shilling or more, and for eighteen years he kept his determination. During this time Mr. Lovel was prosperous in business, he gave his son a collegiate education, bred him at the Temple, and he became a distinguished barrister.

The earl of Derby having employed the young barrister in a suit of consequence, in which the interest of the crown was concerned, on the trial of the cause the principle contended for by the young barrister was argued with so much ability and eloquence, that the result proved favourable to his client. The information of the facts coming to the ear of the king, his majesty was pleased to confer on him the honour of knighthood.

Mr. Lovel had occasion to apply to the underwriters at Lloyd's, to effect an insurance on a large ship and its cargo, of great value, bound to London from the island of Jamaica. But a letter of advice had been received that morning at Lloyd's, stating the total loss of his vessel and all on board in a hurricane, the day after she sailed from port. This information was overwhelming, and drove Mr. Lovel almost to despair. He called his creditors together, and gave them a just and true account of his affairs; he told them that he could pay them ten shillings in the pound, by delivering up all his property, which he was ready to do. The creditors cheerfully accepted his offer, and executed to him a general release.

Five years previous to the failure of Mr. Lovel, a most singular and extraordinary occurrence happened to the advancement of Mr. Ogilvie's fortune. A celebrated duchess of Piccadilly, with a few friends, one evening attended Covent-garden theatre, to hear Kotzebue's play of Pizarro, which had been adapted to the English stage by Mr. Sheridan. When the amusements were ended, her grace on leaving the house, and just as she was stepping into her carriage, discovered that she had dropped from her finger a diamond ring, of the value of twelve hundred guineas. She instantly proclaimed her loss, with an offer of fifty guineas to the person who might find it. Ogilvie, who stood near, and heard all that had been said, requested her grace to extend her hand and let Pompey see the finger on which she wore the ring, to which she instantly complied, and then drove off for her palace. In less than two hours after all was quiet in and about the theatre, and the flambeaux in the vicinity were extinguished, Pompey found the ring, and delivered it to his master, who early next morning went to the palace of her grace, who received him with joy and gladness. On Ogilvie's presenting her the ring she offered him a prize of twenty guineas, as promised, but he wholly refused receiving the money. She then gave him a half ticket in the lottery then drawing. Ogilvie accepted the ticket, thanked her, bid her good morning, and returned to his stand in the piazza. Eight days after this interview the ticket drew a prize of twenty thousand pounds. The money he deposited in the hands of Mr. Newland, president of the bank of England, made that gentleman his confident, agent, and banker, and the public were ignorant of his good luck, as well as the duchess of Piccadilly, who did not know the number.

Ogilvie still continued in his old place under the piazza; his friend the merchant as usual, day by day, dropped his shilling into the hat, until the whirlwind came, and all the treasures of this man of humanity were drowned; were sunk in the bottom of the ocean. Thus driven by misfortune Mr. Lovel had to abandon his walk under the piazza, and had not passed that way in fifteen days. This circumstance very much alarmed the mind of Ogilvie: he felt that he could not be mistaken, because he knew his voice, and could distinguish his walk from that of all other persons. Fortunately he knew his name. "I will not delay a moment," said Ogilvie, "to search out and find my friend! my benefactor! Perhaps that benevolent man may now stand in need of the very charity which he has so long and so bountifully bestowed on me?"

He prepared himself with money, called a hackney coach, and drove direct to the house of the merchant, in Soho-square. On his arrival Mr. Lovel was not a little confused, and began to apologise for having neglected him so long, but observed there was a cause.

"I hope you will pardon me, sir," said the blind man, "for the liberty I have taken, when I assure you that I am actuated by the purest motives of gratitude, in coming to inquire the cause of your absenting yourself from the piazza?"

"I believe you, sir," answered Lovel. "I shall most willingly give you the particulars of my losses and misfortunes," which he fully related.

As he ended, Mr. Ogilvie put into Mr. Lovel's hand two bank notes, each of five thousand pounds, which he had that morning received of his agent, Mr. Newland, and requested his acceptance of the money as a token of his affection and gratitude, observing, at the same time, "I do not, my friend, consider this sum sufficient to discharge the debt I owe you; but I hope it will enable you to begin business again; and be assured, I shall seek every opportunity to do you good all the days of my life."

So saying he departed, and went to his stand in the piazza. Mr. Lovel commenced business de novo, and in a little time he stood as the first West India merchant on the royal exchange.

The following season Sir John (the son of Mr. Lovel) visited the city of Bath, being the scene of summer amusements for all the people of fashion, and at that time was principally crowded with the company of the nobility and gentry from all parts of Europe. While at Bath, Sir John became acquainted with Lady Erskine, from Edinburgh, and her ladyship introduced him to Julia, whom she had adopted as her own daughter on the death of Julia's aunt, which happened two years before. Julia was the most celebrated beauty and belle of Scotland. The expression of her countenance, the exquisite propriety of her stature, and the exact symmetry of her shape, attracted and fixed the admiration of Sir John. In her air, walk, and gesture, she mingled dignity with grace. Her eyes, which were of a dark grey, spoke the great sensibility of her mind, and the sound of her voice was like the sweetest music. Sir John was a man of sterling integrity, deep learning, mildness of temper, and greatness of soul. At the assembly he had the good fortune of having Julia for a partner in the dance, and the next day he met her at the Font. The nectar of the waters of these wells, as Beau Nash, the old king of ceremonies at Bath, used to say, produced a pulsation of the heart which "none but lovers feel." Sir John declared his passion for Julia, and became her accepted lover, and the consent of Lady Erskine to their union was readily obtained.

The next day they set off for London. On her arrival, Lady Erskine took the lovers with her direct to the palace of her grace the duchess in Piccadilly, who received them with open arms. When she was informed of the intentions of Sir John and Julia, she insisted on their being married at her palace, as soon as the parties had made their arrangements, and so it was settled. The next day Mr. Ogilvie, the father of Julia, and Mr. Lovel, the father of Sir John, met at the palace, when the lovely Julia for the first time in her life had the happiness of seeing her father. On her being introduced to him, the old man lost the power of utterance. Copious tears were shed, and the scene was truly affecting, although it was a joyous meeting to them and to all the company present. Mr. Ogilvie gave his full consent to Julia's union with Sir John, and settled on her ten thousand pounds. Mr. Lovel settled on Sir John an elegant house in Golden Square of the value of ten thousand pounds, and gave him twenty thousand pounds in money. Sir John and Julia insisted that their fathers should retire from business, and live with them in Golden Square, and that Pompey should accompany them, to which they consented.

Her grace gave them a most splendid wedding, and just before the ceremony commenced, which was performed by the Lord Bishop of London, as a token of love and esteem, she put on the finger of Julia the diamond ring which her father and Pompey found at the theatre. J.

THE ESSAYIST.

A WET SUNDAY AT THE DEVIL'S BRIDGE.

"How do persons contrive to amuse themselves on a wet Sunday?"

"They stay at home and read their Bible, sir."

"But what do they do whose Bibles happen to be at the bottom of a trunk, beneath a miscellaneous assortment of travelling necessities and conveniences?"

"We can lend you a Bible, if you please, sir."

"Thank you; I'll ring for it presently."

This dialogue took place,

"As it fell upon a day
In the merry month of May,"

between a pedestrian tourist and a pretty black-eyed wench, who was chamber-maid, waiting-maid, bar-maid, and boots, at the Hafod arms hotel, Devil's Bridge, Cardiganshire. She was pretty enough, smart enough, and lively enough to have suggested to a traveller of Yorick's complexion many other ways of amusing himself, (under the circumstances,) than the one so properly proposed. Even I doubted the moral fitness of journeying a hundred miles to read the Bible at the Devil's Bridge. There is a time and place for all things. "There is some help, too," says Cowley, "for all the defects of fortune; for if a man cannot attain to the length of his wishes, he may have his remedy by cutting of them shorter." I set to work, therefore, and cut mine very considerably shorter. They were upon such a reduced estimate, indeed, that I do not think Joseph Hume himself would have had the conscience to make the "tittle of the whole," less.

It was a very miserable morning; the rain, ever and anon, dashed in gusty splashes against the window, and trickled down the panes, or collected in large uncomfortable-looking drops on the frames, eight in a row, seldom more, and very often only five. It was one of my amusements to count them. The wind roared above, and the cataract roared beneath, the Devil's Bridge. The tops of the highest mountains were shrouded in undulating wreaths of mist. Kites, on level wing, sailed, wheeled, and poised themselves, up and down the romantic glen that faced my room, through which the tur-hid Rheidol foamed its way over enormous masses of black rock. To look upon such a scene out of a square hole in a wall three feet by two, called a window, instead of exploring it, wandering amid its sublime grandeur, and pausing at every step to feel, in silent homage, the stupendous majesty of nature, was a penance which ought to have atoned for a great many more sins than I have ever committed.

The air was raw and chilly, and found its way through chinks and crevices in spite of brown paper, which had been humanely poked into some of them; so that the tips of my fingers grew shrivelled, the end of my nose was as cold as the north pole, and my feet ached. There was a handsome fireplace in the room, and an elegant stove, which only wanted a comfortable turf fire, (such as I smelt in the kitchen,) to make me enjoy my breakfast. But the grate was so black, and the bars were so bright, and the very chimney was so shining, as far as it was visible, that I was loth to disfigure such excellent housewifery. To say the truth, I don't think it had ever had a fire, for few persons travel this wild part in winter; and by way of hinting, I suppose, that an occasional Lapland day in summer must be borne with, there were no such implements to be seen as poker, shovel, and tongs.

Still the rain rattled against my window, and the wind roared, and the mist on the mountains deepened. A colony of swallows, that had settled themselves under the eaves of the house, seemed the only living things that enjoyed it. I would not swear, however, that their vagaries were meant to indicate their delight; but it certainly appeared to me as if they could not contain themselves for joy. They popped in and out of their nests, scudded before the wind, dipped, soared, chased each other, with all sorts of frolicsome motions, darted back to their nests, chirped and twittered, as if it was fine fun to them, and then sallied forth to repeat their gambols. Not so a melancholy, respectable-looking, elderly rook, whom I watched. Where he had come from I know not; and he seemed as much puzzled to make out where he had got to. His nest-tree must have been miles off; probably in some part of the noble grounds of Hafod house. He had alighted on the barren peak of a craggy rock which overhangs the grand cataract. Whether he had never seen it before, or whether the seeing it now reminded him how he had missed his way, was a doubtful point; for his caw! caw! was translatable into either "Heaven bless me, how very fine!" or, "the deuce take it, I have come wrong!" A caw! caw! more expressive of surprise I never heard from a rook in my life; and I should be inclined to say it was the surprise of vexation; for after he had turned his head first on one side, then on the other, about half a dozen times, with that knowing air so peculiar to rooks and crows, he set off again from the glen, cawing all the way like a man who "grumbles in his gizzard audibly," as he trudges back the wrong road to get into the right one.

A plate of excellent toast, a loaf of home-made bread, some faultless butter, two eggs, half a dozen savoury slices from a kiln-dried ham, milk that would call a blush into the cheeks of the best London cream that was ever thickened with chalk, and bohea such as Shee himself would celebrate (no blunder, he who succeeded Lawrence—Shee, and a genuine lover of bohea,) in the next edition of his "Rhymes on Art," made me for a moment, (a lover's moment, which is never less than an hour,) forget wind and rain and mist, and all that I had missed by being debarred from an early morning walk over the hills. So complacent even did my feelings become under the bland influence of this temperate luxury, that I benignantly opened an album which I had tossed from me the night before with superlative disdain.

Why is a book, commonly kept by one fool to be written in by other fools, called an album? "I have not the least idea," said an accomplished young gentleman, to whom I once put the question, just after he had been scribbling some lines in the album of one of our modern Sapphos, which proved he had not the least idea, not even such a little one as would have been large enough for an album.

I closed the album and walked to the window. I felt the fidgets coming fast upon me. I tried to hum a tune, forgetting it was Sunday; but nothing could I hum, save "the rain it raineth every day." There were two cards on the chimney-piece, one on each side of a grotto made of alum, which I mistook for a petrification, and got laughed at by the pretty chambermaid for my blunder, though she assured me many other persons had fallen into a similar one. I read these cards twice over; criticised the style of both; admired the typographical execution of one, and laughed at the march of intellect pedantry of the other.

I can give no stronger proof of the situation to which I was reduced than this authentic relation of my amusements; and, were it necessary, I could farther tell the colours of the carpet, the pattern of the chairs, the length of the sofa, the number of cracks in the cornice, and the very board which creaked under my steps as I paced up and down the room. Four times, in less than two hours, I saw the strapping cook-maid pass under my window with a heavy basket of turf on her arm, and I began to consider whether she was laying in a store for the whole day's consumption, or whether the kitchen fire could possibly burn such a quantity in so short a time. I decided in favour of the former, but could not imagine, as there was no immediate want, why she should paddle through the dirt and rain, unless it were that she knew, from physical prognostics of which I was ignorant, that, bad as the weather then was, it promised to be much worse.

It was now eleven o'clock—not a symptom of a fine day. The very swallows had left off their gambols, and the kites had departed to their nests among the highest crags. The wind had abated, but the rain had increased to such a degree as to give me a lively image of the deluge. In no quarter of the heavens could I see a promising bit of blue sky; nowhere could I behold that semi-transparent appearance in the clouds which betokens the presence of the glorious sun behind, and foretells his triumph over the spongy element. My pretty chamber-maid came into the room.

"Shall you sleep here to-night, sir?" said she.

"Why do you ask, my dear?"

"Because of making your bed, sir."

"I don't know; it will depend upon what the day turns out."

Five minutes afterwards, the worthy landlady made her appearance.

"Shall you dine here to-day, sir?"

"What can I have?"

"Any thing you like, sir."

"Have you any fish?"

"No, sir. We get our sea-fish from Aberystwyth, and that is twelve miles off."

"But you have fine trout in the Mynach."

"We used to catch plenty of trout; but since the smelting-houses for the lead-mines have been established on the banks, the water that runs from them has played the deuce with the fish, and we don't see one in a month."

"You have excellent mutton, I know."

"Yes, sir; but we are out of mutton to-day."

"I thought you killed your own mutton."

"Oh no, sir. We get our mutton from Llanidloes, and that is fifteen miles off; but we kill our own chickens."

"Very well. A roast chicken will do, if I am forced to dine here; but it will depend upon the weather."

"Yes sure, sir;" and she bobbed her curtsy, leaving the room with a detestable smile upon her countenance, as if she was sure of me.

I had now to "cut my wishes" still shorter. I hate chickens, and I love Welsh mutton and trout. I began to think with Dean Swift, that the "stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes;" while I tried to persuade myself, with Addison, that a "contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in this world."

"After all," I exclaimed, "what have I to complain of? It happens to rain a little—no, not a little; but, little or much, who would not prefer a thoroughly wet day amid these picturesque hills, and in sight of that romantic glen with its beautiful waterfall, to a mere April shower in Fleet-street or the Strand? I can get neither Welsh mutton nor trout from the Mynach; but what can be better than a barn-door chick? Besides, it cannot rain this way for ever, and a lovely evening will be doubly welcome coming after so cheerless a morning." Thus I soliloquised, and concluded with confessing that Sterne was right, "there is nothing so bad which will not admit of something to be said in its defence."

I took a book out of my pocket, and sat down as quiet as a lamb to read it. It was "A Pleasant Conceited Comedy, wherein is showed how a man may choose a good wife from a bad. 1602;" ascribed, in Garrick's collection, in MS. to Joshua Cooke. What fulness of thought—what play of the imagination—what nervous simplicity of style, these fellows of the olden time possessed! Their writings have all that freshness and individuality which are the characteristics of minds that look into themselves. Whether much or little is found, something is sure to be found better than can be got from the undigested produce of other men's minds. This "pleasant conceited comedy" is an admirable drama; rich in humorous situations, sparkling with wit, original in characters, and containing some scenes and incidents of great force and beauty. It would act well, if adapted to the modern stage by one who had a true feeling of the only alterations it would require for such a purpose. How infinitely Charles Kemble would deliver the following "jest!"

Fuller. Love none at all; they will forswear themselves, And when you urge them with it, their replies Are, that Jove laughs at lovers' perjuries.

Anselm. You told me of a jest concerning that; I prithee let me hear it.

Fuller. That thou shalt.

My mistress in a humour had protested That, above all the world she lov'd me best: Saying, with suitors she was oft molested; But she had lodg'd her heart within my breast;

And aware, (but me,) both by her mask and fan She never would so much as name a man.

"Not name a man?" Quoth I, "yet be advis'd, Not love a man but me! Let it be so."

"You shall not think," quoth she, "my thoughts disagree'd In flattering language or dissembling show;

I say again, and what I do I know I will not name a man alive but you."

Into her house I came at unawares; Her back was to me, and I was not seen;

I stole behind her, till I had her fair, Then with my hands I closed both her ean.

She, blinded thus, beginneth to bethink her, Which of her lovers 'twas that did hoodwink her.

First she begins to guess and name a man, That I well knew, but she had known far better;

The next, I never did suspect till then; Still of my name I could not hear a letter;

Then mad, she did name Robin, and then James, Till she had reckon'd up some twenty names:

At length, when she had counted up a score, As one among the rest, she hit on me:

I ask'd her if she could not reckon more, And pluck'd away my hands to let her see;

But, when she look'd back and saw me behind her, She blush'd and ask'd if it were I did blind her?

And since, I swear both by her mask and fan, To trust no she-tongue that can name a man."

A bright sunbeam fell upon my page, in the second scene of the fifth act, while I was pondering on the bitter truth contained in the first two lines of the following passage, the whole of which had deeply fixed my attention by its simple pathos:

O misery! thou never foundst a friend:

All friends forsake men in adversity:

My brother hath denied to succour me,

Upbraiding me with name of murderer;

My uncles double-bar their doors against me:

My father hath denied to shelter me,

And curs'd me worse than Adam did vile Eve.

I that, within these two days, had more friends

Than I could number with arithmetic,

Have now no more than one poor cipher is,

And that poor cipher I supply myself.

All that I durst commit my fortunes to

I have tried, and find none to relieve my wants.

My sudden flight, and fear of future shame,

Left me unfurnish'd of all necessities,

And these three days I have not tasted food.

The touch of Ithuriel's spear was not more electrical in restoring Satan to his original shape, than this sunbeam was in restoring me to my original self. I threw down the book. I sallied forth. The sky was at once stormy and serene; above me, it was laughing summer; towards the horizon voluminous masses of dark clouds were rolling themselves sullenly away in every varied form of Alpine mountain, frowning battlements, and vast forests of impenetrable gloom. I stood upon a bold projecting crag which overhung the Rheidol, and watched its roaring waters, leaping, thundering, and meandering down the glen, winning its chafed course to the ocean through a channel strewn with enormous fragments of black shining rock, which looked as if they could have been hurled there only by giants of a former world, or some terrible convulsion of this. It was a scene of grandeur and desolation of magnificence and ruin, as much beyond the power of language to describe as of the pencil to portray. On every side, as far as the eye could reach, mountains piled upon mountains reared their majestic summits, and spread their vast sweeps of abrupt or gradual ascent. Some of them were covered with woods, dense, sombre, and interminable; some were entirely barren, and exhibited features of savage beauty in their rugged chasms, beetling promontories and jaggy defiles; some were tinted with the hues of the various mosses which alone clothed their sides; others, fruitful of a short but abundant herbage, had flocks of sheep and cattle browsing along their ridges, and looking no bigger than hares and kids; while here and there might be seen patches of cultivation, the green pasture, and the sloping corn-field, reposing in sheltered valleys, spread out at the feet of these gigantic hills. Mountain streams, clear, sparkling, and falling upon the ear in lulling murmurs, descended on all sides, sometimes like a silver thread twining a long and rocky channel, now partially concealed by trees and underwood, now gushing forth in graceful curves, and then bounding over a jutting crag, forming a pretty cataract in miniature; or, at others, falling in broad sheets over zig-zag ledges of rocks with the most picturesque effect imaginable. Contrasted with these living waters were the huge dark fissures through which, in winter, roll the turbid torrents formed by the melting snows and heavy rains.

When I had satiated myself or rather, when I grew absolutely fatigued with ecstasy and admiration, I proceeded on my road to a spot called the "Parson's Bridge." Before I left the Hafod arms, I obtained the requisite information for find-

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY.

RIGHT REV. JOHN HENRY HOBART, D. D.

Pro ecclesia Dei.—Hooker's last words.

As if in the illusion of a dream, we find that this illustrious prelate has suddenly disappeared. His absence sheds a general gloom over our city. Thousands lament, that the cherished light of their holy altar is unexpectedly extinguished. As with deep reverence we turn toward the high priest, we are called to mourn, that he is removed from the ministration of the Lord's sanctuary. He has been withdrawn from earth; and now only can we discover, how faithfully he kept alive the hallowed flame, and how emphatically he was a great man in Israel.

His first dawning boyhood promised a bright day; and this promise was most splendidly realized. Born in the city of Philadelphia, on the fourteenth day of September in the year seventeen hundred and seventy-five, he spent there the interesting period of his youth. In him were happily associated, even in his early life, those intellectual and moral traits of character, which are the germs of all true greatness. He had a mind that never wearied; he had a nerve that never was relaxed.

His rare qualities attracted the attention and conciliated the esteem and love of many, who were his superiors in age. When he was yet a lad, great things were predicted of him. His intellectual and moral standing, both at school and in college, won the greatest meed of commendation for his talents, his deportment, and his untiring industry. At Princeton, when in his nineteenth year, he graduated with great reputation. He received the first honours of his class. He was then elected tutor, and was thus led to linger for a time on the same classic ground. But he had resolved to make a dedication of his soul and body to the sacred functions of the ministry of Jesus. He soon left his literary toils to enter on this hallowed work. While in his college course he had very often been induced by his young friends to make a declaration of his religious views. And so ardently did he espouse, even at that early period, before his nineteenth year, the cause of primitive episcopacy, that his fellow-students frequently alleged he would one day be a bishop. He was at the very heart a protestant episcopalian. He approached the altar with a firm step; when in his five and twentieth year, he was ordained; and so zealous, so laborious, so undeviating was his devotion to the distinguishing principles of episcopacy, that in the American church he became at last the very chief of the apostles.

As a preacher, he was devout, earnest, solemn. His enunciation was peculiarly dignified; and his expositions, his expostulations, his entreaties, and his appeals were framed after the best models of those great men, who have declared in our own tongue the wonderful works of God. He had a peculiar delight in the works of HOOKER, BARROW, HALL, HORSLEY, WATERLAND, and kindred spirits. He breathed much of their devotion in the exercises of the pulpit; and in his polemical controversies, from the same quiver which supplied them with shafts he drew his powerful weapons. "Evangelical piety and apostolic order" was his motto.

The first field of his ministerial efforts was the church at Hempstead, Long Island. Both there, and when first called to be an assistant minister of Trinity church in this city, his sermons were committed to memory with great care. His increasing duties and engagements soon rendered it impracticable for him to pursue this course, and he abandoned it. But by the change, he lost little of his power to arrest and to engage his hearers. It often happens that an intellect, by no means transcendent, may light up by the fires of youth a fitful evanescent popularity. But to maintain a splendid reputation in the pulpit for a long term of time, demands the effort of no ordinary genius. Dr. HOBART was a popular preacher in our city for the space of nine and twenty years. He was not a blazing meteor, but a burning and a shining light, that continually increased in splendour. His last efforts were among the very best that he produced.

His numerous unexpected calls to write, would often not admit of careful and deliberate composition. But he was ever prompt, on the most sudden and extreme emergencies. His pen was always ready; and it was always able.

When the infirmities of the late Bishop MOORE of New-York required, that an assistant bishop should be elected in the diocese, Dr. HOBART was the choice of the convention, and in the year eighteen hundred and eleven he was duly consecrated. He forthwith entered on the duties of his high office, with a distinguished earnestness and energy. The diocese numbered in its convention at that time less than thirty clergymen; and in the whole region west of Utica, there was but a single missionary crying in the wilderness. At the last convention (A. D. 1829,) the number of the clergy had increased to a hundred and thirty-four; and in the western counties there were more than thirty missionary heralds, lifting up their voices in the name of Christ and of his Church. For nineteen years the heart that has now ceased to palpitate was glowing with a warm interest, in that holy cause which it espoused as the great cause of the divine Redeemer. Among the prelates that adorn the church in our land, the late mitred worthy was

"The greatest champion of the cause."

Over the largest of the American dioceses, he has left memorials of his episcopate, which will never be forgotten. He was a valiant, spiritual veteran. "The church," said he in one of his most popular discourses now in print, "the church in her faith, her ministry, her order, her worship, in all her great distinctive principles—maintain her at all hazards. For amidst the agitations and tumults of error and enthusiasm, she is the asylum of the great and good; amidst the conflicts of heresy and schism, she is the safeguard of the truth, as it is in Jesus, of all that he and his apostles ordained to advance the salvation of a lost world."

With an untiring hand, for almost twenty years, he bore the ark of God into the remotest corners of his vast diocese, an extent of forty-six thousand square miles. And wherever the ark rested, there was a blessing from the Lord. But his intense efforts could not be longer borne, his frame sunk under his extreme exhaustion; and it might be truly said, he lived and died for the church of God—in the last words of the immortal Hooker, "pro ecclesia Dei."

In his private intercourse, he combined many of the most admirable qualities. He was embarrassed in no circle where he appeared. He was polite, conciliating, affable; with a retentive memory and lively mind, he could at once identify, in social interviews, the countenances of all those whom he had ever seen. Abroad, he was a cheerful guest; at home, he entertained with an unbounded hospitality. The rich and poor have lost in him a noble, generous friend.

The wide influence, which he secured by his great talents and attainments, seemed like a magic charm. His voice was the prompt voice of thousands; and for this they had high sanction. "I have known," says the venerable Bishop WHITE of Pennsylvania, in a letter to a friend just published in a daily paper of this city, "and have had occasions to remark, the character of my now deceased friend, from his very early boyhood; and can truly say, that I have never known any man, on whose integrity and conscientiousness of conduct I have had more full reliance than on his."

When such a man, such a prelate, has moved before the public eye, engaged their understandings, warmed their hearts, for thirty years—his sudden exit from the world must cause a deep sensation in all ranks. And it was so. In the full possession of his faculties, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, the dying prelate, amid the most hallowed and triumphant sentiments of our faith, was called to resign his soul into the hands of his Redeemer. He was at Auburn, on his annual tour of duty; but a bilious fever there arrested him in his career. For ten days he lay upon his bed of sickness; and with two of his devoted clergy and one of his affectionate sons at his bedside, he departed at the early dawn of the sweet day of rest!

Soon, the melancholy tidings reached the city. Like an electric flash, it instantaneously arrested all. All felt the shock; and by its suddenness and its severity they were bewildered, they were palsied. The remains were brought to the metropolis. Amid the most general, solemn, touching sympathies, they were conveyed to the ancient church of Trinity parish, and with impressive funeral rites they were there reposed beneath the holy sacramental altar. All the churches in the city are now veiled in solemn weeds; all the clergy and vestrymen, the religious and benevolent societies, and a great number of the leading members of our community, attest their sorrow by some funeral badge. The diocese cannot repress her grief; her sister dioceses sigh responsive. The beacon is extinguished; there is an awful gloom!

It will be the work of his biographer, to give the full testimony of this great apostle with so bright a name—to tell of his distinguishing characteristics, and his writings, and his extensive influence, and his triumphant death. But when this towering son of our soil, that so lately stood among us, has been just felled; and standing by the newly prostrate trunk, as we now view its branching honours, and contemplate its rich foliage and its precious fruits that were for the healing of the nations, as they lie scattered in profusion at our feet; we are irresistibly impelled, to gather at least a small memento of what so late stood in majesty and pointed to the skies. S.

ing out this place. I was to walk along till I came to a church; and I was to go through the church-yard, and then I should see a path which would lead me to the Parson's Bridge. I detect the common-place mode of hiring a guide on these occasions, who conducts you by some beaten road, and entertains you all the way with a hacknied cut-and-dry description of "beauties which he never saw, and raptures which he never felt." Half the pleasure is to explore, to toil, and to wonder, in silence, what novelty awaits you at every turn, or what scene is to be spread before you when you stand panting on the top of some hill, up which you have managed to scramble at the expense of violating every grace of figure, and all elegance of motion.

I came to the church, which I mistook at first for a small farm-house, as any one might from its appearance; nor was it till I saw the porch, the bell at one end, with a long iron chain descending from it for the purpose of ringing it, and the little black grave-stones, set in white frames of wood and-plaster, that I knew it was a church. I made for the church-yard, but the gate had a padlock on it.

Here I may be allowed to express my regret that they who had the care of my education never thought of having me taught Welsh. The neglect has already proved the source of some serious inconveniences, and heaven knows how many more I may yet have to endure before I get out of the principality. When I first entered it, I very innocently inquired the name of every place I came to, and of every unknown object I met with; but the answers I received were just as intelligible to me as if I had been travelling among the Magyars, whose Hogy, Wogy, Pogy poetry Dr. Bowring has so beautifully translated. The alphabet was no assistance to me. Written words, or appellatives, were as unreadable as their pronunciation was unpronounceable. The last effort I made was at a turnpike-gate, between Pennybont and Rhayader, in Radnorshire. The name of the gate was painted on the toll-board; it consisted of about eleven consonants and one vowel, as thus, Cwmddfigorbdt. I asked the old woman in a man's hat (with a red silk handkerchief tied under it so as to cover both her ears, and hang down in a comfortable tail behind,) who kept it, what was the name of the gate?

"Cumbodfigorbith, sir."—"Cumbodfigorbith?"—"Yes, sure, sir."

"Cumbodfigorbith," I repeated, as I walked on, but immediately stopped to write it down in my note-book, quite satisfied it was not a word that could be carried safe in the memory another hundred yards.

But to return to the church-yard. The gate, as I have said, was padlocked; there was a small house close to it, the only habitation in sight. I knocked at the door. A rosy-cheeked lass, with a malicious pair of black eyes, that scarcely eighteen summers' suns had looked upon, came to it.

"I see the gate of the church-yard is locked," said I.

"Yes."

"Will it be opened soon?"

"Not soon."

"What am I to do? This is the way to the Parson's Bridge, I believe? Is there any other way?"

"Round-about."

"Round-about?"

"Round-about."

I now found that she could only understand English a little, and could hardly speak it at all. She looked mortified and embarrassed, in spite of a very innocent and good-humoured smile, which gave her an opportunity of disclosing a set of exquisitely white teeth. I wished from the bottom of my heart that I could speak Welsh, for there was a something in her manner and appearance which told me we could have carried on a very interesting conversation; but I could not, so I tried to make the most I could of her round-about.

"Do you mean through that gate?" said I, pointing to one half off its hinges, which seemed to lead into a cow-yard, where two pigs were enjoying all the luxury of muck up to their very snouts.

"Yes—round-about," she repeated, at the same time waving her hand with a semicircular motion, to indicate the road I was to go. I took the hint and departed.

It was late in the evening when I returned to the Hafod arms, with an appetite better adapted for a turkey than a chicken. As I approached the house, a sudden bend in the road discovered my pretty chambermaid engaged in a piece of innocent flirtation with a tall strapping youngster, who had hold of her hand in a very tender manner. She blushed a little as I passed. I was too hungry to moralize or be sentimental. I proceeded to "mine inn," and regaled myself temperately upon one of the smallest chickens I ever saw, except under the maternal care of a hen. London New Monthly Mag.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE COUNTRY.

To the Editor of the Mirror.

Pittsfield, Ms. September 14th, 1830.

DEAR SIR—I reached this delightful village on Saturday, and am so charmed with its beauty, both natural and artificial, animate and inanimate, that I feel in no haste to take my departure. Massachusetts, that is, what little I have yet seen of it, is a well watered garden; and the inhabitants, so far as my brief intercourse with them has enabled me to judge, are hospitable, polite, and intelligent. For beauty of person and endowment of mind, the females are not surpassed by any that grace your great babel of York.

On Sunday morning I accompanied the two Misses  to church, and in the evening attended a pleasant little social party of both sexes, at the house of Mr. C. Yesterday morning I visited the Pontoosuc woollen factory, where I spent several hours in examining its various departments, and listening to the interesting explanations of my polite cicerone, Mr. S. As this is the first opportunity I have ever had of inspecting an American concern of this character, and feeling much interested in the subject of domestic manufactures, I shall trouble you with a short and imperfect description, which you are liberty to publish or throw under your table, as your humour may happen to be.

In this establishment there are employed at present about one hundred persons, of both sexes, perhaps fifty of each; and it is capable of working annually about one hundred thousand pounds of the best American and Saxony wool, manufacturing daily what would be equal to one hundred and fifty yards of superfine broadcloth. Mr. S. informs me, that the business is generally transacted by the proprietors and stockholders themselves, who employ no disinterested agents.

For convenience and pleasantness of location the Pontoosuc factory has few, if any competitors; being perfectly secure from the inundations of freshets, and yet always certain of a plentiful supply of water. It is situated about two miles from the village, at the outlet of a beautiful lake, from which it derives its name. This lake, which fills an area of ten or twelve hundred acres, forms a never-failing reservoir for the supply of the factory. A substantial stone dam, at the outlet, creates a head of water, with power amply sufficient for all the purposes intended. Near this dam is a grist-mill, with four run of stones; and a canal of sixty rods in length supplies the factory below. After performing its duty at the factory, the water falls into its natural channel, but is soon put again in requisition at the fulling-mill, about twenty rods further.

The main building of this interesting establishment, standing at the termination of the canal, which supplies its machinery with the means of motion, is one hundred and forty-five feet in length by forty-eight in width, and four stories high, exclusive of the attic. Here the water falls from its artificial conduit, into the buckets of an overshot wheel of eighteen feet diameter, and as many in length, which revolves in the centre of the building. Having made this descent of about twenty-two feet, it is conducted to its natural channel by means of an arched passage. A short distance further, on the same line, stands the dye-house, and beyond that the wool-house. In the rear, and parallel with these edifices, there is a row of eight tenements for the workmen, two and a half stories high, with a garden to each. A short distance east of the factory, on the public road, stands the store or warehouse of the establishment, near to which is an extensive boarding-house. The residence of the superintendent is situated between the factory and the store, so that the whole together forms quite a little village.

I have been thus minute and particular in this attempt at description in order to impress you with the magnitude and importance of the concern. Perhaps, however, you have in your mind's eye the picture of a few rough wooden shanties, as combustible and unsubstantial as a poet's dream, or the schemes of modern politicians. No such thing. The above-mentioned buildings are all of brick, except the wool-house, handsomely and substantially erected on an everlasting foundation of immovable adamant. Besides those I have already mentioned, there are a number of other buildings connected with the establishment, such as a drying-house, a machine-shop, with several smaller tenements.

Trusting that you have now a tolerable idea of the external appearance of this seat of industry and fountain of wealth, let us take a peep at the interior. Come, my friend, I will be your cicerone, and we will enter the main building at once.

This edifice, as I told you before, is divided into five stories, including the attic; in the latter, however, you will find neither of the nine ladies you so often flirt with, but instead thereof, ten as industrious jennies as were ever set in motion by water, steam, or any other power. Each story of this building, the first excepted, is one entire room. On the first floor are twenty shearing frames, seven gig-mills, two presses, and one brushing machine. In the apartment above this are eleven carding machines, four billies, and one picking machine. I suppose it would be deemed indiscreet to have the billies and jennies in the same apartment. In the third story are twenty-five broad power-looms, producing broadcloth fit for the duke of Orleans, or even a better man, La Fayette himself. In the fourth story are four sating looms, four for weaving cassimere, and four burling desks. Above all are the spinning jennies—all at work, like a colony of bees.

If you enter the dye-house you will see four large vats for dyeing blue, and two enormous copper kettles, one of which holds eleven hundred gallons. On viewing it I thought of the cabbage story, and some of the wonderful vegetables which are sent to you editors as bribes for a puff oblique. In this building there is also an apparatus for scouring wool.

In the fulling-mill are three gig-mills; six fulling stocks, I think they call them, together with a warping and spooling machine. Every thing is in motion, with a clatter that does not very forcibly remind one of the music of the spheres. But examine the cloth, sir, after it has received the finishing touch, and say if there is any thing superior now walking up and down Broadway, with a dandy inside of it.

By the way, if I recollect rightly, Mr. Ellsworth, of your city, has a constant supply of cloths from this factory, which you can examine and satisfy yourself. Nay, so firmly am I convinced of your good taste in these matters, that I have no doubt when next we meet, of seeing you in a domestic coat, made of cloth manufactured at the Pontoosuc works. Having visited the woollen factories in Leeds and at Exeter, in England, I can truly say that I am equally pleased with the establishment I have here attempted to describe.

This establishment is situated in the midst of highly cultivated farms, and surrounded at a distance with lofty mountains. It forms a pleasing scene of manufacturing industry, amidst the general agricultural pursuits of the surrounding highly picturesque and romantic country. And let me ask you, setting aside the prejudices of political partizans, is it not right that the fleeces, shorn from the flocks which speckle the neighbouring hills, should be thus transformed, by native industry, into an article of the first importance, while domestic markets are thus formed for the consumption of the agricultural products of the industrious farmer?

Adieu, for the present. My next will probably be dated at Lebanon springs, when you may expect some account of the Shakers.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A NIGHT ON FLATBUSH ROAD.

THERE is nothing in the world I dislike so much as to hear people telling their dreams. Dreams generally are so fantastic—so unconnectedly absurd, that I always shudder with terror when I see an old lady preparing to relate the visitations of her sleep. I would rather "endure the tooth-ache patiently" than hear her; and yet when she begins, some horrid spell comes over me, and I cannot move out of the way, but listen with ears minutely acute; in vain I endeavour to let the words pass by unheard, but no—they sink deeply upon my heart, and benumb for a while my faculties with superstitious dread. I have frequently caught myself dozing at the religious harangue of our pastor; but never could I sink into the same oblivion when a sage dream unraveller was recounting the horrors of the midnight slumber.

I had occasion, some years ago, to visit the family of a relation, who then were spending the autumnal months at Flatbush. Night had approached before I thought of returning home, but as the day I had spent was one of the most felicitous I had ever enjoyed, it gave me abundance of courage to face the long gloomy road before me. I was in the act of giving orders for my wagon to be prepared, when my old aunt appeared and entreated me to remain until morning. Some short dialogue ensued, wherein I positively declared my intention of going on.

"You are mad to persist," she said, upon finding her previous arguments unavailing. "I am warned some danger awaits you."

"How!" reiterated I, "warned some danger awaits me?"

"Yes! in my sleep last night you appeared—the dream I had was frightful—it betokens ill."

I trembled, but concealed my uneasiness by answering with apparent unconcern,

"Dreams! phew—they are the plague only of bodily infirmity—they never trouble the healthy, and portend nothing."

So speaking, I endeavoured to reach the door, but was prevented. She insisted upon my hearing her dream—I begged her to postpone it—she would not. I shook with apprehension, like a poor fly caught in the spider's snare. I had no power of escaping, and so I suffered myself to return to my seat. I sat down, and the supernatural tale commenced. I will not recall to my remembrance, by repeating the substance of the dream, the same chilling ideas that I that night endured; it was a narration so unearthly—so replete with horror—so void of every thing like nature, that when it was concluded, the warm blood in the channels around my heart felt as if it had changed into streams of freezing water. I waited a few minutes, hoping to recover some energy by conversing on livelier subjects, but I was mistaken—agonizedly deceived—for dreams and their mystified forebodings continued the topic while I remained. I tried hard, but I could not turn the current of the conversation—it had set in so powerfully engrossing, that no dexterity of mine could alter it.

When I rose to depart, night had considerably advanced; my heart beat heavily, a suffocating sensation lay in my throat, and a cold, damp perspiration overspread my skin. The old lady had disclosed her dream—it gratified her garrulous disposition, and she now evinced none of the solicitude for my remaining that she had previously done. I noted the apathy with which she saw me get into the wagon. I could have sworn she wished her sage predictions verified. She asked me once—a cold, formal once—to remain; had the invitation seemed cordial, her offer would have been accepted, notwithstanding the fixed determination I had before expressed of going onward; for no business, however urgent, would have driven me to undertake the road while chilled with the same feelings that I then suffered.

I left the house and drove on. The vast sheet which had enveloped the sky in total darkness was beginning to separate into forms more minute, and through the intervening spaces the wan moon, which was dimly rising, occasionally showed its sickly disk. The road was lonely, gloomy, desolate; not a being nor a dwelling could be seen; a long range of trees rose frowning on each side to a considerable height; all was still—nothing was heard except the rushing of the wind through the wood, and the screeching of the owl, whose sepulchral cries deadened my heart with a weight like lead.

I whistled—I sang—I whipped and talked to my horse, but nothing could invigorate me with courage; the dreariness around me was too dismal, and the fantasies of the dream passed before my eyes like a hideous phantasmagoria. As the road emerged from the forest, showing the wide stretched plains, a new instrument of fear came over me. I recollected the sanguinary battle that was there fought during the revolutionary war. Every little circle of protuberances that I saw on the earth I imagined were the spirits of some of the fallen heroes, and every moment I expected the ground would open before me and protrude the ghost of some Hessian to upbraid me with his unfortunate fate.

My fears became agonizing, my heart sickened, and I wished myself dead. I reached the foot of the hill, whose summit commands the beautiful view of the bay and harbour of New-York; my horse slackened his pace, and as he walked slowly up, I heard the sound of footsteps behind me. A tremor like an ice bolt, ran through my veins, and transfixed me to my seat. I listened with terrific suspense—the footsteps approached with a heavy quick tread—I lost all power of urging my horse on, for a feeling, like the horrors of the night-mare, seized upon my faculties.

"He! he! he!" burst an hysteric laugh close upon my ear. My jaw dropped, my eyes started wildly from their sockets, and my tongue clung to the roof of my mouth.

"He! he! he!" continued the sardonic exclamation, and a figure appeared by my side. The moon at that moment glimmered through the haze of a thin cloud; its light fell upon the object of my terror, and showed me a creature not apparently, nor as I believed, of this world. Its form was dwarfish, scarcely approaching four feet in height, with broad brawny shoulders, supporting a head larger than all the rest of the body; it was shaped like a cone and uncovered, with long clotted locks hanging down over the back like snakes.

My horse, as if participating in my fear, started back and stood still. My unearthly visitant turned round, and giving another unnatural laugh he fixed his eyes upon me!

"I am lost!" I inwardly gasped when I saw the repulsive horror of the visage; no language can describe the expression it then had. I had read and seen paintings of the inmates of Pluto's regions, but nothing had I ever seen so horrible as the revolting countenance before me.

I remained for a few minutes petrified; my eyes fixed on—I knew not what. The figure, during this time, laughed and yelled, and made all manner of idiotic grimace, throwing his body at the same time into various fantastic attitudes.

My heart beat thickly in my throat. It was now verging towards midnight. I was in the middle of a dark, dreary road, far from a house, the moon was struggling behind a long line of vapour to make its brilliancy visible, but without effect, and the dimness of its light only served to make the surrounding gloom more ghastly. I clasped my hands in devotion, and afterwards endeavoured to speak to my ominous companion, but failed—an icy feeling choked my utterance. I tried again, and the accents trembled on my tongue:

"In the name of heaven——"

"He! he! he!" interrupted the same horrible laugh. My horse started forward at the sound, the monster followed, and before I reached the top of the hill, he leaped from behind into the seat alongside of me. Every feeling of horror that ever possessed man seized upon me; I felt not like one of the human species; I congealed into a mass of snow, my eyes became bewildered, my brain reeled, and uttering an hysterical scream, I sunk down senseless.

When I recovered, I found myself in bed in a neat apartment. It was broad day; an attendant was by my side. I was informed I was at the house of Mr. G., that I was sent there by the keeper of the turnpike-gate, to which place my horse had rode up and was stopped. I returned my obligations for the attention I had received, but declined giving an account of what had happened.

I shortly afterwards learned that the being I had encountered was a poor idiot, who was in the nightly practice of prowling about the country, frightening strangers, and known to all neighbouring farmers by the name of chuckling Sam. R.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE SPECTRE.

There is a story going the rounds of our periodicals, that a Miss G. of respectable family, young and very beautiful, attended Lord Byron for nearly a year in the habit of a page. Love, desperate and all-engrossing, seems to have been the cause of her singular conduct. Neglected at last by the man for whom she had forsaken all that woman holds dear, she resolved upon self-destruction, and provided herself with poison. Her designs were discovered by Lord B. who changed the poison for a sleeping potion. Miss G., with that delicate feeling of affection which had ever distinguished her intercourse with Byron, stole privately away to the funeral vault of the Byrons, and fastened the entrance, resolving to spare her lover the dreadful knowledge of her fate. She there swallowed the supposed poison—and probably died of starvation! She was found dead soon after. Lord Byron never adverted to this subject without a thrill of horror. The following, from his private journal, may perhaps have some connexion with it:

"I awoke from a dream—well! and have not others dreamed!—Such a dream! I wish the dead would rest, however. Ugh! how my blood chilled—and I could not wake—and—"

"Shadows to-night
Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard
Than could the substance of ten thousand men—
Armed all in proof."

"I do not like this dream—I hate its foregone conclusion. And am I to be shaken by shadows? Ay, when they remind us of—no matter—but if I dream again, I will try whether all sleep has the like visions."—Moore's Byron.

She came to me last night—

The floor gave back no tread;
She stood by me in the wan moonlight—
In the white robes of the dead.

Pale—pale, and very mournfully
She bent her light form over me—

I heard no sound—I felt no breath—

Breathe o'er me from that face of death—

Its dark eyes rested on my own,
Rayless and cold as eyes of stone—

Yet in their fixed, unchanging gaze,
Something which told of other days—

A sadness in their quiet glare,
As if love's smile were frozen there;

Came o'er me with an icy thrill—
Oh—God! I feel its presence still!

And fearfully and dimly

The pale, cold vision passed,
Yet those dark eyes were fixed on me

In sadness to the last,—
I struggled—and my breath came back,

As to the victim on the rack,
Amid the pause of mortal pain

Life steals to suffer once again!—
Was it a dream?—I looked around,

The moonlight through the lattice shone;—
The same pale glow that dimly crowned

The forehead of the spectral one!
And then I knew she had been there—

Not in her breathing loveliness,
But, as the grave's lone sleepers are

Silent and cold and passionless!
A weary thought—a fearful thought—

Within the secret heart to keep;—
Would that the past might be forgot—

Would that the dead might sleep!

N. E. Review.

AUTUMN.

We shall not write a sentimental article upon this venerable and thread-bare subject. We think, however, that our readers ought to be apprised of the fact that summer has departed, with all its deep and unvarying greenness—its fierce sunshine, and its nights of insupportable heat and musical mosquitoes—and that autumn is before us, breathing lightly, but even now perceptibly, the breath of change upon the beauty of nature. Some of our forest trees are already changing, very slightly, indeed, but still enough to show that the brown spoiler is among them.

And we welcome the time of autumn. 'Tis a season of thanksgiving and beauty and exceeding joy. Talk as we may of the sunny atmosphere of France, and the soft blue heavens of Italy, they suffer in comparison with the glorious Indian summer of New-England. Then it is that our forests and our hanging hill sides are coloured with dyes deeper and richer than any which Claude or Poussin ever mingled—varied and magnificent as if the rainbow of a summer shower had fallen among them, stretching away to the dreamy haze of the horizon, shaking their bright leaves against the sky like birds poising upon their golden wings in the mid air; or swaying in waves of blended gold and shadow before the passing wind!

But an autumn sunset—that blending of heaven's own glory with the rich beauty of earth—it is like a dream of a better world. The sun goes down behind the hill or the forest, and the clouds that waited like vassals around him, glow with the remembrance of his glory—every light wreath of vapour changes to a golden pavilion fitted for the abode of angels, and the first great star of evening burns through the glory of the sunset—

"A diamond set in gold."

Oh! we have gazed on a scene like this, until changed and purified and made better by its communion with nature in her exceeding beauty, and passing away from the dull images of earth, our spirit mingled, in imagination, with the mysterious intelligences of heaven. Ibid.

EXTRACTS FROM THE LONDON CARCANET.

RELIGION.

Man, in whatever state he may be considered, as well as in every period and vicissitude of life, experiences in religion an efficacious antidote against the ills which oppress him, a shield that blunts the darts of his enemies, and an asylum into which they can never enter. In every event of fortune it excites in his soul a sublimity of ideas, by pointing out to him the just judge, who, as an attentive spectator of his conflicts, is about to reward him with his inestimable approbation. Religion also, in the darkest tempest, appears to man as the iris of peace, and dissipating the dark and angry storm, restores the wished-for calm, and brings him to the port of safety.

One riseth by another's fall, and some do climb so fast,
That in the clouds they do forget what climates they have past.

PRIDE.

The proud heart is the first to sink before contempt—it feels the wound more keenly than any other can. Oh, there is nothing in language that can express the deep humiliation of being received with coldness when kindness is expected—of seeing the look, but half concealed, of strong disapprobation from such as we have cause to feel beneath us, not alone in vigour of mind and spirit, but even in virtue and truth. The weak, the base, the hypocrite, are the first to turn with indignation from their fellow-mortals in disgrace; and, whilst the really chaste and pure suspect with caution, and censure with mildness, these traffickers in petty sins, who plume themselves upon their immaculate conduct, sound the alarm bell at the approach of guilt, and clamour their anathemas upon their unwary and cowering prey.

DEATH.

It is doubtless hard to die; but it is agreeable to hope we shall not live here for ever, and that a better life will put an end to the troubles of this. If we were offered immortality on earth, who is there would accept so melancholy a gift? What resource, what hope, what consolation would then be left us against the rigour of fortune, and the injustice of man?

THOUGHT.

The ever active and restless power of thought, if not employed about what is good, will naturally and unavoidably engender evil.

To mortal men great loads allotted be;
But, of all packs, no pack like poverty.

FRIENDSHIP.

Friendship hath the skill and observation of the best physician, the diligence and vigilance of the best nurse, and the tenderness and patience of the best mother.

CONVERSATION.

Conversation is the daughter of reasoning, the mother of knowledge, the breath of the soul, the commerce of hearts, the bond of friendship, the nourishment of content, and the occupation of men of wit.

MIND.

The mind which, like the delicate leaves of the mimosa, shrinks from every touch, is ill calculated to solicit the assistance of the powerful, or to gain the favour of the great. The very looks of the prosperous it construes into arrogance; and it is equally wounded by the civility which appears to condescend, and by the insolence which wears the form of contempt.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Give me but the liberty of the press, and I will give to the minister a venal house of peers—I will give him a corrupt and servile house of commons—I will give him a full swing of the patronage of his office—I will give him the whole host of ministerial influence—I will give him all the power that place can confer upon him, to purchase up submission, and overawe resistance; and yet, armed with the liberty of the press, I will go forth to meet him undismayed; I will attack with that mightier engine the mighty fabric he has raised; I will shake down from its height corruption, and bury it beneath the ruin of the abuses it was meant to shelter.—SHERIDAN.

They mourn, but smile at length, and smiling mourn;
The tree will wither long before it fall;
The hull drives on, though mast and sail be torn;
The roof-tree sinks, but moulders on the hall
In massy hoariness; the ruin'd wall
Stands when all wind-worn battlements are gone;
The bars survive the captive they enthrall;
The day drags through though storms keep out the sun;
And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on.

VANITY.

The most lasting families have only their seasons, more or less, of a certain constitutional strength. They have their spring and summer sunshine glare, their wane, decline, and death; they flourish and shine perhaps for ages, at last they sicken; their light grows pale, and at a crisis when the off-sets are withered and the old stock is blasted, the whole tribe disappears. There are limits ordained to every thing under the sun. Man will not abide in honour. Of all human vanities, family pride is one of the weakest. Reader, go thy way; secure thy name in the book of life, where the page fades not, nor the title alters nor expires—leave the rest to heralds and the parish register.—BORLASE.

VILLAGE BELLS.

I was induced to ascend into the belfry, where I found ropes for eight bells—those musical tones which extend the sphere of the church's influence by associations of pleasure, devotion, or melancholy, through the surrounding country. What an effective means of increasing the sympathies of religion, and exciting them by the fire-sides, and on the very pillows of the people! Who that, as a bride or bridegroom, has heard them, in conjunction with the first joys of wedded love, does not feel the pleasurable associations of their lively peal on other similar events? Who, that through a series of years has obeyed their calling chime on the sabbath morning, as the signal of placid feelings towards his God, and his assembled neighbours, does not hear their weekly monotony with devotion? And who is there that has performed the last rites of friendship, or the melancholy duties of son, daughter, husband, wife, father, mother, sister, under the recurring tones of the awful tenor, or more awful dumb peal, and does not feel at every repetition of the same ceremony, a revival of his keen but unavailing regrets for the mouldering dead?

Things have remained for some time in this situation, at once so critical and so delightful, and all parties seemed afraid, by a single word, to break the heart which held them in their places; but such a state is not made to endure long; the march of human time goes on; its law is to leave nothing unchanged; and while the heart would fondly cling to the fragile bliss of the present, it finds itself left behind, sighing in vain after what is gone for ever.

Idleness is the great fomentor of all corruptions in the human heart.—BLAIR.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MR. C. KEAN.—HAMLET.—Throughout the whole range of the acted drama, there is hardly any one so difficult of representation as the tragedy of Hamlet. Abounding as it does in fine sentiment, addressed no less to the understanding than to the heart, it possesses few of those palpable points which are equally intelligible to all, and which afford even to an indifferent actor an opportunity of interesting an audience. To the multitude it is coriary, while to those who take pleasure in tracing the workings of the human heart, it is an intellectual treat of the highest order, combining incident and philosophy with so admirable a skill, that, while it pleases and delights the imagination, it strengthens and matures the judgment. These, however, are advantages which, while they are universally felt and acknowledged, render the delineation of this play, particularly of the character of Hamlet itself, arduous and difficult; and when we recollect that this was an obstacle with which the most celebrated performers of any age had contended, and which many of them had not been able to overcome, we confess that it was not without some discouraging anticipations that we visited the theatre to witness Mr. C. Kean's representation of the philosophic prince. He had, however, scarcely appeared upon the stage before our apprehensions were quieted, and we soon perceived that his conception and his execution were such as the poet had fancied. There was no noisy ranting—no trick—no aiming at effect—every thing was easy, chaste, and natural. This we consider the highest possible praise. The actor who merits it, shows that he disregards the idle plaudits of the moment, which boisterous declamation is always sure to some extent or other to call forth, and that instead of acting to the ear, he portrays to the understanding. Such was the case with Mr. C. Kean's performance of Hamlet.

There is one merit which has been conceded to him, even by those who are far from being warm in their admiration of his performances generally, that of a clear, melodious, and distinct reading. Perhaps there is hardly a play in the English language so well adapted for its display as Hamlet. It imparts to its fine moral lessons a beauty and an interest which they would seek in vain in gesticulation or action, however appropriate; and while it rivets the attention, instructs and exalts the mind. This is pre-eminently one of Mr. C. Kean's merits, and one, which, if he had no other, would entitle him to the highest rank in the list of tragic actors. But in addition to this, his fine action throughout, the chasteness of his gesticulation, and his thorough acquaintance with what, in technical phrase, we believe is called the business of the play, stamp his Hamlet as a most finished performance, and convince us, that he excels no less in philosophy and sentiment, than in what we have before given him credit for, strong and intense feeling and passion.

We have not time to enter into a minute examination of the performance; but we cannot omit adverting with marked approbation to the first scene with the ghost, his instructions to the player, the interviews with Ophelia, and particularly the pathetic delivery of

"I did love you once."

.....

"To a nunnery, go," &c.

and the closet scene with his mother, as finished in the highest possible degree. Upon the whole, we think that Hamlet is one of Mr. Kean's best characters, and one in which he cannot fail of making a strong impression; and we hope, on his return, to have the pleasure of witnessing its frequent repetition.

After having written the above remarks, the following communication was handed to us. Though it treats on the same points that we have just recapitulated, yet as it is more detailed and complete, we publish it entire.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

HAMLET.

So far as Hamlet depends solely on himself, so far as he is independent of what is technically termed "support," Mr. Kean acquitted himself with wonderful ability. The Queen, Horatio, Rosencrantz, and gentle Guildenstern, (which two latter names we abominate,) seemed systematically set to annoy him; and as thoroughly as frequent mistakes could accomplish so desirable an end, they were marvellously successful. It was fortunate that Mr. Kean was "at home" in the play; and these constantly recurring errors did not materially discomfit him; if he had been easily dispossessed, the entertainment would have been spoiled. It is unhappily true that, while the perfection of the histrionic art is requisite to the complete illustration of Shakspeare, an insignificant performer has the power to ruin, by dint of mere blunders, the finest scene of the drama; and when we see the truth of this acted out, we are very ill-disposed to "forget and forgive." Yet, notwithstanding these reservations, which detracted much from the general effect, we have seldom seen Hamlet so well sustained, and so unanimously approved.

In giving a detailed account of this performance we hardly know where to begin; and, having begun, should be as uncertain where to conclude it. The beauties of Hamlet are so intellectual, and their delivery requires such temperance, nothing short of the most careful study and discriminating practice (aided by superior genius) will ever meet with eminent and enduring success; and when this is attained, the merits of the performance will be so equal, a selection must be made at the expense of the majority, it being impossible to record the whole.

It is within the scope of description to impart the terrors of a devastating tempest with a spirit and energy little inferior to reality; but the same power is weak to convey the sweetness of a moonlight scene; and (to apply the illustration) the same pen which, with "ample room and verge enough," might give a faithful sketch of Richard, would fail to portray with any tolerable accuracy, the delicate colouring of Hamlet. Its beauties are of that quiet, contemplative character, which can only be appreciated by the actual spectator. We cannot do justice to Mr. Kean's soliloquies by saying they were pronounced with "good emphasis and good discretion;" that this line was spoken with great pathos; that, with masterly irony; while both were answered with loud applause. In attempting to designate, therefore, we have merely a hope of conveying to our readers an idea of this actor's constant discrimination in observing old points, and introducing new ones; and since we cannot say how, will point out a few instances where, he does well.

We note his instructions to the player as the very best scene. This alpha and omega of acting was pronounced with great clearness and propriety, and received with enthusiastic applause. We have never before heard it delivered so finely.

Hamlet presents the best field for fine acting of any play in our language; and Mr. Kean very satisfactorily attested his abilities in this particular. As examples, we quote perhaps the most successful:

"Seems, madam! nay, it is; I know not seems.

"Tis not alone my inkly cloak, good mother,
Nor the dejected 'haviour of the visage,
No, nor the fruitful river in the eye,
Together with all forms, modes, shows of grief,
That can denote me truly: these, indeed, seem,
For these are actions that a man might play;
But I have that within which passeth show;
These but the trappings and the suits of woe."

"Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice,
And could of men distinguish her election,
She hath sealed thee for herself; for thou hast been
As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;
A man, that fortune's buffets and rewards
Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and blest are those Whose blood and judgment are so well commingled,
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger
To sound what stop she please; give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee."

"Look here, upon this picture, and on this;
The counterfeit presentment of two brothers.
See, what a grace was seated on this brow—
Hyperion's curls; the front of Jove himself;
An eye like Mars to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury;
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;
A combination, and a form, indeed,
Where every god had seemed to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man."

A transition in the soliloquy on death was new and eminently fine:

"Who would fardels bear
To groan and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The undiscovered country—from whose bourne
No traveller returns," &c.

In the scene with Ophelia (immediately following) the fine climax of ill-disguised affection and feigned madness ending with "to a nunnery, go," was wrought up with great judgment, and concluded with exquisite pathos.

The respect and awe with which he listened to the ghost of his father was very happily conceived; his fear had less of acting and more of reality than we have usually seen displayed. This was especially the case in the concluding scene of the third act, where Hamlet's alarm is finely contrasted with the Queen's wonder, the ghost being to her invisible.

Mr. Kean has been censured for occasional ranting; this evening, at least, there was no ground for such criticism. His Hamlet was as thoroughly exempt from extravagance as the most strict interpretation of his lesson to the player requires. He did better than this. He delivered many passages with moderation, which all Hamlets whatsoever are wont to pronounce with violence. The last line of the following was an honourable instance:

"I'll have these players
Play something like the murder of my father,
Before mine uncle; I'll observe his looks;
I'll tent him to the quick;—
If he do blench, I know my course."

This line, so well adapted to the "strut and bellow," is a stumbling-block to all Hamlets that we "have seen play, and heard others praise." Mr. Kean gave it in a firm, decided tone, yet within the compass of ordinary conversation, his manner, meanwhile, corresponding with his utterance.

In the celebrated line,

"Is it the king?"

he was exceedingly happy; but we were surprised that no applause followed it. For the most part, every thing worthy of such notice received it; we have seldom seen so discriminating an audience; but this one line, in our judgment, "a most palpable hit," was entirely unobserved.

We quote another passage of singular excellence that was observed, and loudly applauded:

"What should such fellows as I do crawling between heaven and earth?"

The intonation given to the word crawling, was very happy, and spoke a volume of sarcasm.

We have always been jealous on the subject of innovations, and are ever slow to acknowledge their propriety. But Laertes' and Hamlet's leaping into the grave of Ophelia, a moment after the corse is lowered, has ever seemed to us an outrage on propriety and humanity itself. We can conceive of no degree of fondness nor grief that amounts to a cause for such monstrous indecorum; nor are we able to imagine a degree of angry excitement sufficient to induce the brother and the lover of a newly-buried maiden, to grapple with each other, and utter vociferous and revengeful language while standing upon her coffin! Still, it is so "set down;" and so it is usually performed. But Mr. Kean intercepts Laertes at the words

"Hold off the earth awhile,

Till I have caught her once more in my arms."

and standing in the front of the stage, discloses himself:

"This is I; Hamlet the Dane!"

He then causes Laertes to approach and grapple with him where he stands. A most sacrilegious outrage on the ashes of the dead is thus dispensed with. And, in a mere theatrical sense, apart from all considerations of impropriety, there is so much of awkwardness, of buffoonery, of boys' play, in jumping into a grave to scuffle, we are rejoiced when we see a man of sufficient judgment and independence to adopt a different course. Young, we believe, was the "original" of this innovation: it is much to Mr. Kean's credit that he follows his distinguished precedent. One thing, however, should be observed: Hamlet, in his subsequent address to Laertes, must omit the following line:—

"To outface me with leaping in her grave!"

The play with the foils would have been exquisite, if Hamlet had been well "supported" in it; by which we mean to say (for without an explanation the remark is a mere truism) Mr. Kean showed himself an admirable "master of fence," but was not well seconded by Laertes: and we wonder at this, too; for we have seen him "play a bout" with the elder Kean, in the same character, with excellent skill.

To "sum up" for Mr. Kean: his performance was, for the most part, unexceptionable; his audience, large; and his success, signal.

A word to the king. We advise him to practise dying till he can expire without raising a laugh. It is absolutely scandalous that the closing scene of Hamlet should be ruined by the titter of an audience, which his majesty's manner of giving up the ghost imperiously provoked.

We cannot conclude without adverting to the subject on which the editor of the American commented, on Saturday last—the perpetual slamming of doors, rattling of footsteps in the lobbies, loud talking, &c. The thing has become intolerable. We venture to say, one half of the audience lost, at least, one half of the play from this provoking interruption; and whatever may be the necessary means for correcting it, the manager is bound promptly to supply them. In the first place, the lobbies should be carpeted throughout, without which the noise of footsteps will continue in despite of all precautions. The locks to the box doors should be such that they will open and shut without rattling; and the doors themselves so prepared with list, that, when closed, even with vulgar violence, they may not ring like the clashing of thunderbolts. In addition to this, the police should be doubled, quadrupled, or increased in still greater proportion, until order supersedes misrule, and is really established as a precedent. It is wonderful that these evils have been suffered to exist so long: they incommode every individual spectator; and the manager owes it to his own credit, no less than the convenience of his patrons, to have some efficient remedy speedily applied. CASSE.

ROMEO AND JULIET.—This play, which is not often represented on our boards, was produced on Monday evening, for the benefit of Miss Clara Fisher, with the cast of Mr. C. Kean as Romeo and Miss Fisher as Juliet.

Romeo differs from all the other characters in which, during his short residence in this country, Mr. C. Kean has become known to the American public. Its feeling, although intense, is not of that manly and spirited character which is found in Richard, Othello, or Shylock, nor yet of the philosophic description which runs through Hamlet, but rather of a morbid cast, which, without becoming sentimental, gnaws and corrodes the mind, and finally drives it to despair. Still, however, it affords ample room for fine acting; and the soft and tender scenes with which it abounds, although of a character which to the manly mind seem somewhat sickly, can only be rendered effective by a first-rate and highly-gifted performer. It affords no opportunity of passing off a counterfeit passion upon the audience; and noise and rant, however they may be adapted in some plays to command a temporary approbation, would be in this miserably out of place. In this Mr. C. Kean's discrimination was obvious, and his performance of Romeo throughout showed that he never for a moment lost sight of Hamlet's direction to the players, and "held the mirror up to nature." The balcony scene was given with admirable effect, and the rapid transition from tenderness to anger and revenge, in the scene in which he slays Tybalt, drew down the most enthusiastic approbation. His reading of the soliloquy,

"I do remember an apothecary," was beautiful; and the deep pathos which he threw into the last scene, where he drinks the poison, and expires with Juliet's name still quivering on his lips, was, we will venture to say, unequalled. We might dwell upon other beauties, but it is unnecessary. Those who witnessed Mr. C. Kean's delineation of Romeo will anticipate any remarks which we could possibly offer in praise of it; and all will agree that it was a performance in no wise calculated to detract from the distinguished standing he has already taken among us as a tragedian.

Mr. Kean goes next to Philadelphia and Baltimore. In the former city, we understand, his engagement commences this week. He will return here in the early part of November, to fulfil a re-engagement, which we are happy to hear has been made with him. In the mean time we congratulate him on his triumphant success in this city—the result of no adventitious aid, but the reward to which his splendid talents fully entitle him—and heartily wish him the same encouragement elsewhere, which crowded houses have bestowed upon him during every successive night of his performance here.

MR. FORREST.—This noble tragedian has commenced an engagement on the Park boards, under the usual auspices of success which await his popular representations of some of the finest characters in the whole range of the drama. In his peculiar line of parts, those which require bold delineation and forcible expression, masculine vigour of conception and impassible energy of manner, our "American Forrest" stands without a superior, perhaps without an equal. The masterly sketches of Roman grandeur, and his original and inimitable embodyings of the magnanimity, the unshaken firmness, and acute sagacity of the aborigines of this country, will ever secure to him the ready admiration and warm support of all enlightened and impartial audiences. But wherefore dwell on the excellence of Forrest? It stands engraven upon the hearts of his fellow-citizens, and has often furnished a delightful and enlivening theme to our pages.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Algiers and France.—The conquest of the former by the French arms, and the revolution which immediately succeeded in France, are events of such magnitude and importance, that we think a small portion of the Mirror may with propriety be devoted to reflections which naturally grow out of them.

The Barbary powers, stretching several hundred miles on the Mediterranean coast, comprise a great part of what was once denominated Mauritania. This district of country is considered by writers the finest region in Africa, yielding in profusion some of the most valuable productions of the earth, among which may be enumerated sugar, wool, cotton, grain and meats of most kind; oil in immense quantities, honey, the richest fruits, and almost every other commodity that is essential to the enjoyment, or that contributes to the support of man. But notwithstanding these advantages, and the consequent luxurious manner in which its inhabitants might be both fed and clothed, such have been their habits, taught by a barbarous power to whom they were subject, that for ages they have been so accustomed to a system of murder, rapine, and plunder, that all those civilized nations whose commerce was connected with the countries bordering on the Mediterranean sea, have been placed under the humiliating necessity of paying them an annual stipend, or otherwise run the risk of seeing their subjects or citizens robbed and murdered, whilst those who survived were sure to be condemned to slavery of so shocking a character as scarcely to be preferable even to death itself. This arose from the difficulty of sending to a great distance across the water a sufficient military force to subdue them. None but a nation like France, having the command of powerful means, and having a position near them, would have dared to make the attempt. But so great a scourge have they been to the christian world—such have been their cruelty and their audacity—such their murderous propensity and their love of piracy, that at length it awakened the indignation, and called into action the vigorous arm of the French monarchy, which, with a spirit and an energy worthy of all praise, has succeeded in completely overthrowing that frightful and bloody despotism, expelling the dey and most of his adherents, and seizing all the public property and treasure in gold and silver to an almost incredible amount, much of which, the price of lawless booty, it is believed had lain concealed in vaults even for many generations. This almost immeasurable fund is now happily brought to light, and will find its way into Europe, where its free circulation among a christian people, will, in all human probability, be the means of conferring lasting benefits on the world.

In the issue of this bold project of the French government, every civilized nation had a deep interest; and all must feel themselves the debtors of that august power for the prompt and honourable manner in which they have accomplished the great work. We cannot doubt it will be the harbinger of civilization and of a liberal and enlightened policy throughout the whole of that region, which has so long slumbered under the dominion of ignorance and of slavery, governed and controlled as it has been for centuries by the worst and most detestable portion of the human family, whose vile propensity was the effect of circumstances.

The revolution which has just taken place in France was, we believe, as unexpected as it was wonderful in its character. The unanimity of sentiment and the identity of feeling which seemed to pervade almost the entire population—the scrupulous regard shown both for public and private property—the energy, zeal, and daring spirit exhibited by every class of that people—and the peaceable and quiet manner in which they resumed their private pursuits after fulfilling their duty, all unite to show how accurate is their knowledge of political rights, how confirmed is their hatred of an odious and debasing tyranny, and how deeply and thoroughly are they impressed with an exalted sense of moral obligations. We believe it is altogether without a parallel in the history of political movements. The dethronement of a king and the expulsion of his corrupt advisers and adherents, giving his place to an enlightened successor, and establishing and confirming a government upon free and liberal principles, resting at once on the solid basis of truth and justice, and receiving the acclamations, and commanding the full respect and confidence of the people throughout all the departments of so extensive an empire, and the whole accomplished within the space of a few days, is an occurrence calculated to strike the mind with much more than ordinary astonishment. It shows conclusively that the universal dissemination of the principles of rational liberty had fastened on the minds of the whole population. And here we think the subject demands the most solemn contemplation.

So great an event, bursting forth in the heart of Europe, may not unaptly be compared to a tremendous earthquake, whose vibrations will be felt to the remotest extremities. It is impossible the contagion should not spread. Other governments on the continent of Europe furnish the strongest motives with the people to rise in their majesty and shake off the cruel trammels of tyranny and oppression; and since nothing is so seducing under all circumstances as example, this great and sudden change in the French government cannot fail to be viewed with fearful solicitude by all the surrounding despotisms. Had the present revolution, however, partaken in any degree of the sanguinary and terrific character which marked the former one, other nations would contemplate it with horror, and would stand aghast at its alarming approaches. But seeing so much effected for the happiness of the French people by a single blow, and at a very small sacrifice, and with a celerity and good order which even the dreams of the veriest enthusiast would not have anticipated, we must think it bears along with it a most portentous aspect. The neighbouring powers will probably find so much employment at home, that any attempt at an interference with the internal concerns of France would evince a higher degree of folly than has been shown by the unhappy monarch, who in defiance of the admonitions of wisdom and the voice of experience, has fallen, as it were, the voluntary victim of his own stubbornness, pride, and bigotry, and must consequently end his days in exile and wretchedness. Under such changes it is impossible to believe that a single crowned head throughout the continent of Europe, can contemplate so interesting an event without emotions of alarm and terror.

Female Politicians.—Politics are at best caviare to the mind of a delicate female. We do not mean to assert that the fair sex should never mingle in conversation about politics in its more enlarged sense, should be ignorant of the history of their own country or that of Athens, or take no interest in events of importance to the moral or civil welfare of mankind. It has been our delight within these few last days to have heard the cause of French liberty asserted and vindicated with the most naïve and thrilling eloquence by a lady no less distinguished for her mental accomplishments than her beauty. Such themes are peculiarly adapted to awaken the sensibility of a well-educated woman, and receive from the vivid impressions, peculiar to the sex, an animating and enlivening interest. But this is not the paltry politics of the beer house or the poll. The eternal wrangling of discordant opinions about men and offices, and the petty details of elections and caucuses, can have little charm for the refined taste or polished judgment, and lend no grace to the intercourse of the domestic circle. A more disgusting object cannot well be conceived than a blustering woman, with stentorian voice, clamouring for the success of an alderman, and offering bets upon the number of votes which may be calculated upon for a favourite constable. Disagreeable as the subject is from the lips of a female, so long as it is confined to a private party, it is calculated to do little harm. It may impair the harmony of one social circle, interfere with the domestic arrangements of one family, and drive from its intercourse all sensible company. Here the evil rests. But when a lady, forgetting the inborn and retiring dignity of her sex, steps forward as a public declaimer, and actually enlists in the party warfare waged by the press, it is difficult to restrain the expression of pity, if not contempt, which the spectacle must excite in every well informed mind. Abandoning the privacy for which she was by nature ordained, and by education fitted, she renders herself the conspicuous object of public criticism, the target at which all the shafts of political malice and bitter acrimony will be aimed. And what has she to gain by so unequal a contest? Is it office she seeks? Her sensibility should have shrunk from competing with male hunters, thronging, probably round a tavern, and ridiculing her silly pretensions and unblushing effrontery. Is it the triumph of a political favourite she would promote? How paltry are her efforts, and how insignificant must they, from necessity be, when contrasted with the systematic and combined opposition of her antagonist. No, there can be no excuse for a female deserting her allotted privacy, and volunteering to encounter gladiators in the political arena. She has all to lose—nothing to gain; success itself would come unrecommended by its appropriate triumph.

Music.—This delightful art seems to have taken deep root in the taste and affections of the Philadelphians. They have three theatres open, and musical performances have lately occupied the pre-eminence in all. Mrs. Austin and Madam Feron at one house, the Plumers at the other, and the French opera at the third, have afforded opportunities for the entertainment of musical amateurs, not often within their reach. The combined talents of the two first named singers offered peculiar attractions, and will, we sincerely hope, be presented at our own theatre. We regret to learn by the papers that Mrs. Austin was seized with a sudden indisposition in one of her most exquisite cantatas and compelled to withdraw, amidst the deep sympathies of a numerous audience. Her recovery is hailed as the pledge of renewed and unsurpassed delight, the loss of which no other source could have supplied. We anxiously await her re-appearance, so generally called for, on the boards of the Park.

Valuable curiosities.—The following is from a late French journal. We hear that vases in rock crystal, oriental agate, jasper, and other rare and precious materials, richly ornamented with enamel, gold, precious stones, &c. of the Florentine manufacture of the sixteenth century, have been found in the palace of the dey of Algiers, together with various suits of Spanish and Moreaque armour, equally fine and curious, all of which will most probably be brought to enrich the museums of Paris. Among the gold coin found, there are several of the time of Charles V. Some are very curious, and will be deposited in the cabinet of medals.

VARIETIES.

THE MOTIONS OF A CHILD.—How easy, and artless, and beautiful are all the motions of a child. Every thing that he does is graceful. All his little ways are endearing; and they are the arms which nature has given him for his protection, because they make every body feel an attachment for him.

TIBERIUS.—When the inhabitants of Hium sent ambassadors to Tiberius to condole the death of his father Augustus, a long time after he was dead, the emperor considering the unreasonableness of it, requited them accordingly, saying:—"And I also am sorry for your heaviness, having lost so valiant a knight as Hector, who was slain about a thousand years before."

THE WEEPING WILLOW.—If you ask me to point out one tree more graceful than all others, I would point you out the weeping willow. Its long silk-like boughs droop not less pensively than the eye-lids of some sleeping beauty. And when the air stirs them what a delicious motion waves among them—where is the painter who can impart that motion to his canvass. Where the poet, whose strains have such music in them as that which lives in the weeping willow? Where throughout all the works of nature is any object more beautiful than this?

IRISH HOSPITALITY.—Curran, in one of his celebrated speeches, thus beautifully described the native hospitality of his country:—"The hospitality of an Irishman is not the running account of posted and ledgered courtesies; it springs like all his other qualities, his faults, his virtues, directly from the heart. The heart of an Irishman is by nature bold and confiding; it is generous, and he gives; it is social, and he is hospitable."

WILLIAM THE FOURTH.—The proclamation of William the fourth at Bristol took place in a torrent of rain, which continued during the best part of the ceremony. A wag, observing the drenched appearance of the cavalcade, cried out, "Here beginneth the rain of William the fourth."

ROSEDALE.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

I DON'T know how it happened when we were house-hunting the other day, that nobody ever thought of Rosedale. I should have objected to it, both as out of distance—it's a good six miles off—and as being utterly uncommendable by one rational person to another. Rosedale! the very name smacks of the Minerva press, and gives countenance to the nonsense and trumpery thereunto belonging. Rosedale cottage! the man who, under that portentous title, takes that house, cannot complain of lack of warning.

Nevertheless is Rosedale one of the prettiest cottages that ever sprung into existence in brick or on paper. All strangers go to see it, and few "cots of spruce gentility" are so well worth seeing. Fancy a low, irregular white rough-cast building thatched with reeds, covered with roses, clematis, and passion-flowers, standing on a knoll of fine turf, amidst flower-beds and shrubberies and magnificent elms, backed by an abrupt hill, and looking over lawnly fields to a green common, which is intersected by a gay high road, dabbled with ponds of water, and terminated by a pretty village edging off into rich woodlands: imagine this picture of a place tricked out with ornaments of all sorts, conservatories, roseries, rustic seats, American borders, gothic dairies, Spanish hermitages, and flowers stuck as close as pins in a pincushion, with every thing, in short, that might best become the walls of an exhibition room, or the back scene of a play: conceive the interior adorned in a style of elegance still more fanciful, and it will hardly appear surprising that this "unique bijou," as the advertisement calls it, should seldom want a tenant. The rapid succession of these occupiers is the more extraordinary matter. Every body is willing to come to Rosedale, but nobody stays.

For this, however, it is not difficult to assign very sufficient cause. In the first place, the house has the original sin of most ornamented cottages, that of being built on the foundation of a real labourer's dwelling; by which notable piece of economy the owner saved some thirty pounds, at the expense of making half his rooms mere nutshells, and the house incurably damp—to say nothing of the inconvenience of the many apartments which were erected as after-thoughts, the addenda of the work, and are only to be come at by out-side passages and French window-doors. Secondly, that necessary part of a two-story mansion, the staircase, was utterly forgotten by architect, proprietor, and builder, and never missed by any person till the ladder being one day taken away at the dinner hour, an Irish labourer, accidentally left behind, was discovered by the workmen on their return perched like a bird on the top of the roof, he having taken the method of going up the chimney as the quickest way of getting down. This adventure occasioned a call for the staircase, which was at length inserted by the by, and is as much like a step-ladder in a dark corner as any thing can be.* Thirdly, and lastly, this beautiful abode is in every way most thoroughly inconvenient and uncomfortable. In the winter one might find as much protection in the hollow of a tree—cold, gusty, sleety, wet; snow threatening from above like an avalanche; water gushing up from below like a fountain; a house of card-paper would be the solidier refuge, a gypsy's tent by far the more snug. In summer it is proportionably close and hot, giving little shade and no shelter; and all the year round it is overdone with trippery and finery, a toy-shop in action, a Brodignagian baby-house.

Every room is in masquerade: the saloon Chinese, full of jars and mandarins and pagodas; the library Egyptian, all covered with hieroglyphics, and swarming with furniture-crocodiles and sphynxes. Only think of a crocodile couch, and a sphynx sofa! They sleep in Turkish tents, and dine in a gothic chapel.† Now English ladies and gentlemen in their every day apparel look exceedingly out of place amongst such mummery. The costume wont do. It is not in keeping. Besides, the properties themselves are apt to get shifted from one scene to another, and all manner of anomalies are the consequence. The mitred chairs and screens of the chapel, for instance, so very upright, and tall, and carved, and priestly were mixed up oddly enough with the squat Chinese bonzes; whilst by some strange transposition a pair of nodding mandarins figured amongst the Egyptian monsters, and by the aid of their supernatural ugliness really looked human.

Then the room taken up by the various knick-knackery, the unnamed and unnameable generation of gew-gaws! It always seemed to me to require more house-maids than the house would hold. And the same with the garden. You are so begirt with garlands and festoons, flowers above and flowers below, that you walk about under a perpetual sense of trespass, of taking care of doing mischief, now bobbing against a sweetbriar, in which encounter you have the worst; now flapped in the face by a woodbine to the discomfiture of both parties, now revenging these vegetable wrongs by tripping up an unfortunate balsam; bonnets, coatskirts, and sounces in equal peril! The very gardeners step gingerly, and tuck their aprons tightly round them before they venture into that fair demesne of theirs, which is, so to say, over-peopled. In short, Rosedale is a place to look at, rather than live in; a fact which will be received without dispute by some score of tenants, by the proprietor of the county newspaper who keeps the advertisement of this matchless villa constantly set, to his no small emolument, and by the neighbourhood at large, to whom the succession of new faces, new liveries, and new equipages driving about our rustic lanes, and sometimes occupying a very tasty pew in the parish church, has long supplied a source of conversation as unfailing and as various as the weather.

The first person who ascertained, by painful experience, that Rosedale was uninhabitable, was the proprietor, a simple young man from the next town, who unluckily took it into his head that he had a taste for architecture and landscape-gardening and so forth; and falling into the hands of a London upholsterer and a country nurseymen, produced the effort of genius that I have endeavoured to describe. At the end of a month he found that nobody could live there; and with the advice of the nurseryman and the upholsterer, began to talk of re-building and new modelling; nay, he actually went so far as to send for the bricklayer; but fortunately for our man of taste he had a wife of more sense than himself, who seized the moment of disappointment to disgust him with improvements and improvers, in which feat she was greatly aided by the bills of his late associates; put a stop at once to his projects and his complaints; removed with all speed to their old residence, an ugly, roomy, comfortable red brick house in the market-place at B—; drew up a flaming advertisement, and turned the grumbling occupant into a thriving landlord. Lucky for him was the day in which William Walker, esq. married Miss Bridget Tomkins, second daughter of Mr. Samuel Tomkins, attorney at law! And lucky for Mr. Samuel Tomkins was the hour in which he acquired a son-in-law more profitable in the article of leases than the two lords to whom he acted as steward both put together!

First on the list of the tenants was a bride and bridegroom come to spend the early months of their nuptial life in this sweet retirement. They arrived towards the end of August, with a great retinue of servants, horses, dogs, and carriages, well bedecked with bridal favours. The very pointers had white ribbons round their necks, so splendid was their rejoicing, and had each, as we were credibly informed, eaten a huge slice of wedding-cake when the happy couple returned from church. The bride, whom every body except myself called plain, and whom I thought pretty, had been a great heiress, and had married for love the day she came of age. She was slight of form, and pale of complexion, with a profusion of brown hair, mild hazel eyes, a sweet smile, a soft voice, and an air of modesty that clung about her like a veil. I never saw a more lovable creature. He was dark and tall and stout and bold, with an assured yet gentlemanly air, a loud voice, a confident manner, and a real passion for shooting. They stayed just a fortnight, during which time he contrived to get warned off half the manors in the neighbourhood, and cut down the finest elm on the lawn one wet morning to open a view of the high road. I hope the marriage has turned out a happy one, for she was a sweet gentle creature. I used to see her leaning over the gate, watching his return from shooting, with such a fond patience! And her bound to meet him when he did appear! And the pretty coaxing playfulness with which she patted and chided her rivals the dogs! Oh I hope she is happy! but I fear, I fear.

Next succeeded a couple from India, before whom floated reports golden and gorgeous as the clouds at sunset. Inexhaustible riches, profuse expenditure, tremendous ostentation, unheard-of luxury, ortolans, beccaficos, French beans at christmas, green peas at easter, strawberries always, a chariot and six, twelve black footmen, and parrots and monkeys beyond all count. These were among the most moderate of the rumours that preceded them; and every idle person in the country was preparing to be a hanger-on; and every shop-keeper in B. on the watch for a customer; when up drove a quiet-looking old gentleman in a pony-chaise, with a quiet-looking old lady at his side, and took possession, their retinue following in a hack post-chaise. Whether the habits of this eastern Cæsar corresponded with his modest debut, or his magnificent reputation, we had not time to discover, although from certain indications I conceive that much might be said on both sides. They arrived in the middle of a fine October, while the China roses covered the walls, and the China-asters, and dahlias, and fuschias, and geraniums in full blow, gave a summer brilliancy to the lawn; but scarcely had a pair of superb common-prayer books, bound in velvet, and a bible with gold clasps entered in possession of the pew at church, before "there came a frost, a nipping frost," which turned the China-asters, and the China-roses brown, and the dahlias, and geraniums black, and the nabob and the nabobess blue. They disappeared the next day, and have never been seen or heard of since.

Then arrived a fox-hunting baronet, with a splendid stud and a splendid fortune. A young man, a single man, a handsome man! Every speculating mamma in the country fixed her eyes on Sir Robert for a son-in-law; papas were sent to call; brothers were enjoined to go out hunting, and get acquainted; nay, even certain of the young ladies themselves (I grieve to say it!) showed symptoms of condescension, which might almost have made their grandmothers start from their graves. But what could they do? How could they help it, poor pretty things? The baronet, with the instinct of a determined bachelor, avoided a young lady as a sparrow does a hawk, and discovering this shyness, they followed their instinct as the hawk would do in a similar case, and pursued the coy bird. It was what sportsmen call a fine open season, which being translated, means every variety of wintry weather except frost—dirty, foggy, sleety, wet; so such of our belles as looked well on horseback, took the opportunity to ride to cover and see the hounds throw off; and such as shone more as pedestrians would take an early walk, exquisitely dressed, for their health's sake, towards the general rendezvous. Still Sir Robert was immovable. He made no morning calls, accepted no invitations, spoke to no mortal till he had ascertained that there was neither sister, daughter, aunt, nor cousin in the case. He kept from every petticoat, as if it contained the contagion of the plague, shunned ball-rooms and drawing-rooms, as if they were pest-houses, and finally, had the comfort of leaving Rosedale without having even bowed to a female during his stay.

The final cause of his departure has been differently reported; some hold that he was frightened away by Miss Amelia Singleton, who had nearly caused him to commit involuntary homicide, (is that the word for killing a woman?) by crossing and recrossing before his hunter in Sallow-field-lane, thereby putting him in danger of a coroner's inquest; whilst others assert that his landlord, Mr. Walker, happening to call one day, found his tenant in dirty boots on the sphynx sofa, and a Newfoundland dog, dripping with mud, on the crocodile couch, and gave him notice to quit on the spot. For my part I regard this legend as altogether apocryphal, invented to save the credit of the house by assuming that one of its many inhabitants was turned out, contrary to his own wish. My faith

* This instance of forgetfulness is not unexampled. A similar accident is said to have happened to Madame d'Arblay in the erection of a cottage built from the profits of her admirable Camilla.

† Some of the pleasantest days of my life have been spent in a house so furnished. But then it was of fitting dimensions, and the delightful persons to whom it belonged had a house in London, and a mansion in the country, and used their fancy villa much as one would use a marquee or a pleasure boat, for gay parties in fine weather. Rosedale, unluckily place, was built to be lived in.

goes entirely with the Miss-Amelia version of the history; the more so, as that gentle dame was so inconsolable as to marry a former beau, a small squire of the neighbourhood, rather weather-beaten, and not quite so young as he had been, within a month after she had the ill luck not to be run over by Sir Robert.

However that may have been, "thence ensued a vacancy" in Rosedale, which was supplied the same week by a musical family, a travelling band, drums, trumpets, harps, pianos, violins, violincellos, trombones, and German flutes—noise personified! an incarnation of din! The family consisted of three young ladies who practised regularly six hours a day; a governess who played on some instrument or other from morning till night; one fluting brother, one fiddling ditto, a violin-cello music-master, and a singing papa. The only quiet person among them, the "one poor half-penny-worth of bread to this monstrous quantity of sack," was the unfortunate mamma, sole listener, as it seemed, of her innumerable choir. Oh how we pitied her! She was a sweet placid-looking woman, and younger in appearance than either of her daughters, with a fair open forehead, full dark eyes, lips that seemed waiting to smile, a deep yet cool colour, and a heavenly composure of countenance, resembling in features, expression, and complexion the small Madonnas of Raphael. We never ceased to wonder at her happy serenity until we found out that the good lady was deaf, a discovery which somewhat diminished the ardour of our admiration. How this enviable calamity befell her I did not hear—but of course that din! The very jars and mandarins cracked under the incessant vibration; I only wonder that the poor house did not break the drum of its ears; did not burst from its own report, and explode like an overloaded gun. One could not see that unlucky habitation half a mile off, without such a feeling of noise as comes over one in looking at Hogarth's enraged musician. To pass it was really dangerous. One stage-coach was overturned, and two post-chaises ran away in consequence of their uproarious doings; and a sturdy old-fashioned country gentleman, who rode a particularly anti-musical, startlish, blood-horse, began to talk of indicting Rosedale as a nuisance, when just at the critical moment, its tenants had the good fortune to discover, that although the hermitage with its vaulted roof made a capital concert-room, yet that there was not space enough within doors for their several practisings, that the apartments were too small, and the partitions too thin, so that concord was turned into discord, and harmonies went crossing each other all over the house—Mozart jostled by Rossini, and Handel put down by Weber. And away they went also.

Our next neighbours were two ladies, not sisters, except as one of them said in soul; kindred spirits determined to retire from the world, and emulate in this sweet retreat the immortal friendship of the ladies of Llangollen.* The names of our pair of friends were Jackson and Jennings, Miss Laura Jackson (I wonder whether Laura really was her name! She signed herself so in prose and in verse, and would certainly for more reasons than one have disliked an appeal to the Register; besides she ought to know; so Laura it shall be!) Miss Laura Jackson and Miss Barbara Jennings, commonly called Bab. Both were of that unfortunate class of young ladies, whom the malicious world is apt to call old maids; both rich, both independent, and both in the fullest sense of the word cockneys. Laura was tall and lean, and scraggy and yellow, dressing in an Arcadian sort of way, pretty much like an opera shepherdess without a crook, singing pastoral songs prodigiously out of tune, and talking in a deep voice, with much emphasis and astounding fluency all sorts of sentimentalities all the day long. Miss Barbara, on the other hand, was short and plump and round-faced and ruddy, inclining to vulgarity as Laura to affectation, with a great love of dancing, a pleasant chuckling laugh, and a most agreeable habit of assentation. Altogether Bab was a likeable person, in spite of some nonsense, which is more than could honestly be said for her companion.

Juxta-position laid the corner-stone of this immortal friendship, which had already lasted four months and a half, and cemented by resemblance of situation, and dissimilarity of character, really bade fair to continue some months longer. Both had been heartily weary of their previous situations:

* I need not, I trust, disclaim any intention of casting the lightest shade of ridicule on the remarkable instance of female friendship to which I have alluded in the next. An union enduring as that has done, from youth to age, adorned by rank, talent, and beauty, cemented by cheerfulness and good humour, and consecrated by benevolence and virtue, can fear no one's censure, and soars far beyond my feeble praise. Such a friendship is the very poetry of life. But the heartless imitation, the absurd parody of the noble and elevating romance is surely fair game, the more so, as it tends like all parodies to bring the original into undeserved disrepute.

Laura keeping house for a brother in Aldersgate-street, where as she said she was overwhelmed by odious vulgar business; Barbara living with an aunt on Fish-street hill, where she was tired to death of having nothing to do. Both had a passion for the country. Laura, who except one jaunt to Margate, had never been out of the sound of Bow-bell, that she might ruralize after the fashion of the poets, sit under trees and gather roses all day long; Bab, who in spite of yearly trips to Paris and Brussels and Amsterdam and Brighton, had hardly seen a green field except through a coach window, was on her side possessed with a mania for notability and management; she yearned to keep cows, fatten pigs, breed poultry, grow cabbages, make hay, brew and bake, and wash and churn. Visions of killing her own mutton fitted over her delighted fancy; and when one evening at a ball in the Borough her favourite partner had deserted her to dance with her niece, and Miss Laura, who had been reading Miss Seward's letters, proposed to her to retire from the world and its vanities in imitation of the illustrious recluses of Llangollen, Miss Barbara caught above all things with the prospect of making her own butter every morning for breakfast, acceded to the proposal most joyfully.

The vow of friendship was taken, and nothing remained but to look out for a house. Barbara wanted a farm, Laura a cottage; Barbara talked of cows and clover, Laura of nightingales and violets; Barbara sighed for Yorkshire pastures, Laura for Welch mountains; and the scheme seemed likely to go off for want of a habitation, when Rosedale in all the glory of advertisement shone on Miss Laura in the Morning Post, and was immediately engaged by the delighted friends on a lease of seven, fourteen, or one and twenty years.

It was a raw blowy March evening, when the fair partners arrived at the cottage. Miss Laura made a speech in her usual style on taking possession, an invocation to friendship and rural nature, and a deprecation of cities, society, and men; at the conclusion of which Miss Barbara underwent an embassage; and having sufficiently admired the wonders within, they sallied forth with a candle and lantern to view their ruralities without. Miss Laura was better satisfied with this ramble than her companion. She found at least trees and primroses, while the country felicities of ducks and chickens were entirely wanting. Bab, however, reconciled the matter by supposing they were gone to roost, and a little worn out by the journey, wisely followed their example.

The next day saw Miss Laura obliged to infringe her own most sacred and inviolable rule and admit a man—the apothecary—into this maiden abode. She had sate under a tree the night before listening not to, but for a nightingale, and was laid up by a most unpastoral fit of the rheumatism. Barbara in the meanwhile was examining her territory by daylight, and discovering fresh cause of vexation at every step. Here she was in the country in a cottage "comprising," as the advertisement set forth, "all manner of convenience and accommodation," without grass or corn, or cow or sheep, or pig or chicken, or turkey or goose—no laundry, no brew-house, no pig-sty, no poultry-yard! not a cabbage in the garden! not a useful thing about the house! Imagine her consternation!

But Barbara was a person of activity and resource. She sallied out forthwith to the neighbouring village, bought utensils and live stock; turned the coach-house into a cow-stall; projected a pig-sty in the roseroy; installed her ducks and geese in the orangery; introduced the novelty of real milk-pans, churns, and butter-prints amongst the old china, Dutch-tiles, and stained glass of that make-believe to the gothic dairy; placed her brewing vessels in 'the housekeeper's room,' which to accord with the genius of the place had been fitted up to represent a robber's cave; deposited her washing-tubs in the butler's pantry, which with a similar regard to congruity, had been decorated with spars and shells like a Nereid's grotto; and finally, in spite of all warning and remonstrance, drove her sheep into the shrubbery, and tethered her cows upon the lawn.

This last stroke was too much for the gardener's patience. He betook himself in all haste to B. to apprise Mr. Walker; and Mr. Walker, armed with Mr. Samuel Tomkins and a copy of the lease, made his appearance with breathless speed at Rosedale. Barbara, in spite of her usual placidity, made good battle on this occasion. She cried, and scolded, and reasoned, and implored; it was as much as Mr. Walker and Mr. Samuel Tomkins, aided by their mute witness the lease, and that very clamorous auxiliary the gardener, could do to out-talk her. At last, however, they were victorious. Poor Miss Bab's live stock were forced to make a rapid retreat, and she would probably have marched off at the same time had not an incident occurred which brought her visions of rural felicity much nearer to reality, than could have been anticipated by the liveliest imagination.

The farmer's wife of whom she had made her purchases, and to whom she unwillingly addressed herself to resume them, seeing, to use her own words, "how much madam seemed to take on at parting with the poor dumb things," kindly offered to accommodate them as boarders at a moderate stipend, volunteering also lessons in the chicken-rearing and pig-feeding department, of which the lady did to be sure stand rather in need.

Of course Barbara closed with this proposal at a word. She never was so happy in her life; her cows, pigs, and poultry, en pension, close by, where she might see them every hour if she liked, and she herself with both hands full, learning at the farm, and ordering at the cottage, and displaying all that can be imagined of ignorance and good humour at both.

Her mistakes were innumerable. Once, for instance, she carried away by main force from a turkey, whose nest she had the ill-luck to discover, thirteen eggs, just ready to hatch, and after a severe combat with the furious and injured hen, brought them home to Rosedale as fresh-laid—under a notion rather new in natural history, that turkeys lay all their eggs in one day. Another time she discovered a hoard of choice double dahlia roots in a tool-house belonging to her old enemy the gardener, and delivered them to the cook for Jerusalem artichokes, who dressed them as such accordingly. No end to Barbara's blunders! but her good-humour, her cheerfulness, her liberality, and the happy frankness with which she laughed at her own mistakes, carried her triumphantly through. Every body liked her, especially a smug little curate, who lodged at the very farm-house where her pigs and cattle were boarded, and said twenty times a day that Miss Barbara Jennings was the pleasantest woman in England. Barbara was never so happy in her life.

Miss Laura, on her part, continued rheumatic and poorly, and kept closely to her bed-chamber, the Turkish tent, with no other consolation than novels from the next town and the daily visits of the apothecary. She was shocked at Miss Barbara's intimacy with the farm people, and took every opportunity of telling her so. Barbara, never very fond of her fair companion's harangues, and not the more reconciled to them from their being directed against her own particular favourites, ran away as often as she could. So that the two friends had nearly arrived at the point of not speaking, when they met one afternoon by mutual appointment in the Chinese saloon. Miss Barbara blushed and looked silly, and seemed trying to say something which she could not bring out. Miss Laura tried to blush rather unsuccessfully. She, however, could talk at all times, her powers of speech were never known to fail; and at the end of an oration in which she proved, as was pretty evident, that they had been mistaken in supposing the company of each all-sufficient to the other as well as in their plan of seclusion from the world, she invited Miss Barbara, after another vain attempt at a blush, to pay the last honours to their friendship by attending her to the hymeneal altar, whither she had promised to accompany Mr. Opeldoc on the morning after the next.

"I can't," replied Miss Barbara.

"And why not?" resumed Miss Laura. "Surely Mr. Opeldoc—"

"Now, don't be angry!" interrupted our friend Bab. "I can't be your bridemaid the day after to-morrow, because I am going to be married to-morrow myself."

And so they left Rosedale, and I shall leave them.

For the Mirror.

IS THERE NOT GLORY IN THE SPELL.

BY EVERARD.

Is there not glory in the spell of this resplendent hour,
That wakes of joy the fountain-well, and fills us with its power?
A dream-like influence it wears, that will not soon depart;
'Tis with a pointed diamond writ upon the bounding heart:
And oft, in days to come, when care may cloud the sunny brow,
Some scene will rise on memory's eye that kindles pleasure now:
Till, like a flood of sunshine poured upon the heart and brain,
We shall drink of recollection's wave, and live these hours again.

For who will lose the tranquil thoughts that on this quiet eve
Upon the tablet of the soul their graven glory leave? (asky—
The glow of moonlight fields and woods—the pomp that fills the
The flush of beauty's ripening cheek—the gladness of her eye?
Oh, like a talisman which cheers a pilgrim on his way,
Each scene in after hours will glow in memory's living ray;
For, as the sky is warm and bright when the sun long hath set,
So visions of this peaceful haunt will bless the spirit yet!

With what a leaden and retarding weight
Does expectation load the wing of time.

Years steal
Fire from the mind as vigour from the limb;
And life's enchanted cup but sparkles at the brim.

LITERARY NOTICES.

JUNIUS.

It will be recollected that some months since we stated our impression that Horne Tooke was the author of the series of letters, published under this fictitious title, and which acquired so powerful an influence over the politics of the times in which they were first published, and which still continue to excite the most lively curiosity and interest. This conviction was derived from facts developed by two American writers, in whose statements we believed the most explicit reliance could be affixed, viz., Dr. J. A. Graham and Col. J. Fellows, of the latter of whose works we gave a full analysis and review. We are extremely gratified to find the opinions and conclusions to which we were then led, and for entertaining which we have received no small share of reproach from one of our contemporaries, so amply corroborated and ably enforced by no less high an authority than that of the editor of the London New Monthly Magazine. We copy the article entire, as one likely to reward the attention of all readers curious in matters of literary history.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

THE POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF JUNIUS.

The real object of this publication (it comes from New-York!) is to establish the right of Horne Tooke to the authorship of Junius's Letters. After the many pretensions that have been made to this discovery, it required some nerve to start another—resting, as it does, wholly upon constructive evidence. If the new claimant prove the true one, it will add another confirmation of the common remark, that what is most obvious is least observed. No man was, notoriously, more mixed up with the active agents of the times, and no man's conduct and sentiments more truly symphonize with those of Junius. Too much reliance has been placed upon Junius's good faith—to which Woodfall's edition of his Letters proves he was but little entitled—or he would, probably, have been discovered long ago.

The editor, or discoverer, we are almost tempted to call him, traces Horne's history, in Stephens' Life, and shows, fact by fact, how intimately, or rather how identically, circumstances in the life of Horne correspond with the occasions of Junius's Letters—how naturally particular incidents in Horne's conduct produced the explosions of Junius's Letters. The first letters known to be from the hand of Junius appeared in April and May, 1767, under the signature of Poplicola; and these are all but brought home to Horne. Wilkes was in exile at Paris, and Horne was just returned thither from a distant tour with a pupil. The contents show the writer must have been some time absent from England—they refer to matters become stale—nay, one of them replies to a letter published in Woodfall's Advertiser some months before. They express the resentments of Wilkes, and are precisely what might have naturally been excited by the communications of Wilkes to Horne. Soon after Horne's return to Brentford, in August of the same year, appeared another letter of Junius, with the signature of "Faithful Monitor;" relative mainly to the Townsends, in which he says, "I have served under the one, and have been forty times promised to be served by the other." Now Horne certainly, and with great zeal, supported Charles Townsend, while a member of Grenville's Ministry, and was promised a court chaplaincy by the brother. In the following year, Horne's activity was conspicuous on several public occasions, particularly in bringing to justice the murderers of Allen, killed by the military in a riot in St. George's Fields—again, in prosecuting M'Quirk for murdering Clarke at the election at Brentford—and again, in the case of the Kennedys, for the murder of Bigby. On all these occasions, which excited considerable sensation at the time, Junius, under different signatures, addressed letters to the "Public Advertiser," written, all of them, in the very self-same spirit which animated Horne.

Horne's quarrel, about the same time, with Onslow, is all but decisive. Horne and Onslow had sparred at a public meeting of the Surry freeholders, and very shortly after Horne published a letter, with the signature of "Surry Freeholder," charging Onslow with an act of ministerial corruption, to which Onslow replied, and announced his intention of prosecuting the printer. In consequence of this threat, Junius writes a note to Woodfall, inquiring "if Onslow means to keep his word about prosecuting—yes or no will be sufficient." The next step is Horne's empowering the printer to give up his name, and enclosing a second letter to Onslow, in the character of "Surry Freeholder." This is followed by a note from Junius, on which he writes, "I know Mr. Onslow perfectly. He is a silly fellow—depend upon it, he will get nothing but shame by contending with Mr. Horne. As to Junius, I must wait for fresh matter, as this is a character to be kept up with credit." The circumstances all but identify Junius and the Surry Freeholder. It is worthy of remark, too, that the whole of the correspondence between Horne and Onslow is published in the edition of Junius's Letters, directed by himself, and arranged studiously, so as to include all his political writings.

Resulting from Onslow's prosecution was Junius's well-known letter to Lord Mansfield. Onslow got a verdict against Horne for four hundred pounds. On the eighth of November, 1779, a rule was obtained to show cause why this verdict should not be set aside, much against the good-will of Lord Mansfield; and the twenty-sixth of the same month was appointed for the argument before the twelve judges. "What was Horne to do? Boldly attack the chief justice—denounce him as a tyrant, unjust and partial in the exercise of his official duties; render him odious to the people, represent him in such a manner that his brother judges, for the preservation of their own characters, will refuse to support him." Accordingly, on the twelfth, four days after the application for a new trial, comes a philippic from Junius against Mansfield to the printer, with a private note, in which he says, "we have got the rascal down, let us strangle him if it be possible." The letter probably had its effect—the decision of the court was reversed. A fresh perusal of the letter will show clearly the personal motives of the writer; and the private notes, with other letters by Junius on the same subject, under other signatures, will go far to identify Horne and Junius.

Beckford's celebrated remonstrance and reply to the king, both known to be written by Horne, and Junius's letters on the same matters, under his own signature, and that of "Modestus," will furnish still farther marks of identity.

But nothing, perhaps, is more conclusive than Junius's letter to the duke of Bedford. On the fourth of September, 1769, Horne, with many others, was proposed to be made a freeman of the borough of Bedford, and the duke, with circumstances of some indignity, interposed his veto against John Horne only, remaining perfectly silent in regard to all the rest. Eleven days after this insult, Junius announces to Woodfall in a private note, a letter to the duke for the following day. The letter shows there was no political or public cause for the vindictive attack—it arose wholly from the personal insult offered to Horne by the duke. The second sentence in the letter is, "You have nice feelings, my lord, if we may judge from your resentments!"—and there is nothing but this of the duke's to Horne.

Or if this fail to establish the identity between Horne and Junius, the correspondence between Horne and Wilkes—the pretended quarrel between Horne and Junius on the same subject—together with the subsequent private correspondence between Wilkes and Junius, will, we really think, leave scarcely a shade of doubt upon the mind of the reader.

This, then, is the chief of what may be termed the internal evidence—we have only been able to glance at it—but the editor enumerates some of a more external kind. Woodfall did not publish his complete edition till 1812, that is, not till a few months after Horne Tooke's death. Woodfall was apparently in the secret. In the preliminary essay, written, it is known, by Mason Good, the acute American points out several passages which seem to indicate Woodfall's acquaintance with it. In this essay, too, which discusses the several claims that had been made to the authorship of the letters, many evasions appear, and these universally involve the name of Horne Tooke. He is not even mentioned in the list of claimants, though Thicknesse, as early as 1789, published a volume vindicating his title. Horne Tooke himself, more than once, upon challenge, avowed his knowledge of the author; to some one who spoke to him of the quarrel between him and Junius, he said, "Junius was my best friend;" and once, in a discussion as to the originals being still in Woodfall's hands, he said, abruptly and peremptorily, they were all surrendered. Lord Grenville is said, on the authority of Mr. Baker, we believe, to hold five letters which indisputably prove the name of the author. He has provided, it seems, for the publication of these documents on his death, and, in the mean while, the duke of Buckingham and Lord Nugent are pledged to silence. Lord Grenville, it is added, has said, the author is not any of the persons who have been suspected. This may have been said, supposing it to have been said at all, the American thinks, in ignorance of Thicknesse's work, to which, certainly, little attention was ever paid—it is not, for pretty obvious reasons, even enumerated in Woodfall's list. At all events, the volume before us—were it only for the close research it displays, and able development—deserves re-printing in this country. It must excite further inquiry.

For the Mirror.

THE PEASANT MAID.

BY ISIDORA.

THEY tell me of a distant land,
Where skies are bright and fair,
And of a kind and gentle hand
To guide my footsteps there.
They speak of gardens, blooming fair,
A rich and stately dome,
With marble halls and fountains rare—
They say it is their home.
They promise robes of beauteous dye,
Rich jewels for my hair;
They tell of sights to please the eye,
Sweet sounds to charm the ear.
They tell me, slaves upon my will
In humble guise shall wait;
They speak of honours greater still—
A high and happy fate.
They lead me to the mirror stream,
Where snow-white pebbles shine—
And tell me fancy's fondest dream
Ne'er showed a form like mine.
They say, this kind and noble pair,
'Tis for this face of mine—
These clustering curls of golden hair,
And eyes that brightly shine,
They wish to lure me from my home,
Their splendid lot to share;
To grace their high and stately dome,
And dwell a princess there!
They say my beauty would inspire
The theme of every tongue—
And that their minstrels to the lyre
Such charms have never sung.
They say no child their arms has blest,
None lives their wealth to claim;
And they with honours will invest
The lowly peasant's name.
'Tis true I love their words so sweet,
I smile, perforce, to hear;
And run to gather garlands sweet
To bind this golden hair.
And then I seek the mirror stream,
This wondrous form to view;
But oftener, in my silent dream,
I see another too.
My father! with his silver hair,
And eyes that cannot see;
He loves me, not for beauty rare,
He never looked on me!
But when I lead him, morn and night,
Where the green paths are dry,
He says I am his orb of sight,
The daylight of his eye!
My mother, too, with kisses kind,
She never called me fair;
But, while her arms are round me twined,
I know that I am dear!
Would splendid robe and jewels rare,
And slaves, and heaps of gold,
Make me forget my mother dear,
My father, blind and old?
And they have taught me, morn and even,
Upon my bended knee,
To pray the gracious God of heaven
From sin to keep me free.
And is it not a sin to be Estranged from friends so kind?
They tell me, sweet serenity
Dwells in a lowly mind.
They teach me duty is the way
That leads to endless bliss;
Ah! then my duty bids me stay—
What tie so strong as this?
Away, away! thou dazzling dream
Of splendour, false and vain!
I'll seek no more the mirror stream,
Nor tempt my pride again!
Farewell! ye kind and noble pair—
If in your splendid dome
Ye held a gorgeous prisoner there,
Whose heart was in her home—
Whose eye, amidst the glittering train,
Beheld a father's tear;
Whose ear, through music's softest strain,
A mother's sigh could hear:
Ye would not bless the chance which led
Ye to our mountain home—
Nor seek to lure a peasant maid
To share your splendid dome!
And when I seek the mirror stream,
'Twill be to drop a tear;
And grieve that flattery's witching theme
E'er bade me worship there!

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

To a gentleman of this city.

No. I.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

DEAR SIR—I shall pass over the better half of my voyage, so far as it regards the time, for, with the exception of cutting through fields of gulf-weed in the stream passing; islands of ice off the banks of Newfoundland, starting up like white clouds in the distant horizon, and assuming the most fantastic shapes as you approach them, of churches, castles, and peopled towns; a shoal of porpoises now and then coming down upon the ship, leaping from the water, with flocks of gulls careering over their heads; the swift dart of the shark, and the blowing of the whale, or the occasional speaking or exchanging signals with some solitary wanderer like ourselves over the vast deep; all is one lengthened ocean waste. Far as the eye can reach wave succeeds wave, heaving its blue bosom to the sky, and lashing and foaming with its own turbulence. A few hours of sun, and a short calm, and then come dark clouds and swelling winds, and torrents of hail and rain, and were it not for the duties of the ship, a life at sea would be one of endless suffering.

We had taken tea below, and the second-mate and myself were busily employed in contriving a snare for a huge rat that had lately much annoyed the steward, when we heard the welcome cry of "land! land!" Rat and trap were left; we jumped on deck, and mounted the shrouds to the mizen-top-gallant mast, and beheld Foul island looming up its bluff base and summit in the far-off horizon. This was the thirty-first day of our departure from New-York, and though we were only in sight of a mere mass of rock, of scarce six miles in circumference, barren of all but a little green turf, confined as long as I had been, for the first time in my life, to a drear watery waste, you can have little idea of the delight with which I again looked out on terra firma. Shrouded in a soft twilight, it seemed like fairy land, and most gladly would I have lowered the boat and have set foot thereon.

Foul island is of no importance except to the mariner, it lying in the centre of his track between the Shetland and Orkneys, and is generally the first land made on an eastward passage to the North sea. We soon passed it, and early the next day came up with Fair island, which is about the same size and latitude. This being well watered, it has become, from the summer rendezvous of a few fishermen, to possess a permanent population of between three and four hundred. We backed the topsails, and lay to, and were immediately boarded by a dozen men or more, who had boldly ventured into the rough sea for the purpose, eager to barter fresh fish, eggs, and fowl for salt meat, tea, coffee, and sugar. I can assure you they were welcome visitors, for our stock of fresh provisions had been some time exhausted.

These islanders inhabit rude huts, half under ground, are completely exposed to the rough ocean winds, and for more than two-thirds of the year are enveloped in fogs, thick clouds, and storms, principally depending upon fish and the passing vessels for their support, and yet, with all these discomforts, their number is fast increasing, and no offer can induce them to emigrate. They hospitably urged us to go ashore, and our captain declared that, if it were consistent, he would have rather visited them in their rude habitations than the finest city in Europe. Touched with the same romantic disposition, a rich gentleman from Boston some time since left his ship to her voyage, and actually passed three months on the island in its gratification. They gratefully remember his generosity and kindness during his stay among them, and are very particular in their inquiries after their "governor," as they call him, from every vessel they board, no matter to what port of America she may happen to belong.

In two more days we had crossed the German ocean, made the naze of Norway, a dark rugged pile of mountains, and were rapidly passing up the Skager rocks, along the Jutland coast. We now began to experience a little of the pleasures of ship sailing, having left the heavy sea- swell for a smooth rapid current, with land continually in sight, a clear sun, and a cracking breeze just abaft the quarter. We soon weathered the Skaw, and crossed to the Swedish shore. These unadorned descendants of the Goths paint every thing red; neat continued villages were thus presented to the eye, and to so great a predilection is the favourite hue carried, that not only the hull, but even the sails of their boats are of this colour. The coast is generally low on the Cattegat, and destitute of wood, yet a little back from the villages I could occasionally copy a more varied and romantic residence, situated on the declivity of a hill, and surrounded by tastefully arranged patches of grass and cultivated ground, and embowered by the towering beech and fir. These were probably the seats of some lord of the manor, who perhaps could trace his pedigree back to the time of their leading forth and settlement by the immortal Odin. But the pride of lineage and the blaze of heraldry concern not me, and as we half lowered our fore and main-top-gallant sails, as a salute to Cronberg castle, and let go our anchor in the roadstead on the thirty-sixth of our passage out, I shall bid you adieu, leaving Elsieur, Hamlet, and Sound-dues till my next.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

BISHOP HOBART.

THE following very affecting record of the last moments of this truly eminent divine, drawn up by his kind and attentive host, has already been published in several papers. Its appearance in our pages might therefore be deemed superfluous, but that the intense interest universally felt in the subject will render its preservation invaluable to all readers.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

THE LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH

OF THE

RIGHT REVEREND JOHN HENRY HOBART, D. D.

Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this State.

This right reverend prelate and pious servant of God, expired at the parsonage house of St. Peter's church in the village of Auburn, the residence of his friend, the writer of this article, at four o'clock on Sunday morning, September 12, 1830, being, it is believed, about fifty-six years of age.

The following article is not destined to draw the character of this distinguished ornament and defender of the christian cause; in it there will be no attempt made to delineate the features of that noble and energetic mind, nor will it be employed in ordinary obituary reflections.

The writer is under the impression that the public, especially that portion of it which is attached to the episcopal church, will be impatient to have before them the particulars of the last days of this extensively known, and ardently beloved individual. Under the pressure of no common emotions, he deems it his duty to employ the first moments he has, after having finished his attentions to the body of the friend of nearly thirty years, in giving the afflicted members of the church, and the weeping relatives and personal friends of the deceased, such particulars as cannot well be expected from another, and which a sense of painful responsibility impels him not to delay. Should the task be found imperfectly performed, let my apology be read in that oppressive weight of feeling which cannot be removed till time has reconciled me to the prevailing stillness and gloom of a dwelling visited by death, to the absence of assiduous physicians, and the retiring of anxious attendants and inquiring friends.

Bishop Hobart arrived at my house on the evening of Wednesday the first of September, in ordinary health, with the exception of a slight cold, which he said made him a little chilly. He rested well that night, and complained of nothing unusual the following morning. He preached that morning in St. Peter's church, and administered confirmation to nine persons. His sermon, alas! his last sermon, was uttered in his usually impressive manner, and listened to by a full congregation with a profound stillness and attention. The text was Job, xxviii. 28.—The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom.

On returning to the parsonage house, he complained of coldness and of oppression at the stomach, from which his friends have known him to suffer very severely for more than twenty years. He ate little at dinner, and shortly after retired to his room, where he slept sometime. At tea he ate nothing, and soon after returned to his room, where he bathed his feet in warm water and went to bed. On entering his room, as he was dressing himself, to hand him some letters, I found he complained still more of being unwell. He was urged to abandon the idea of meeting his appointments for the two next days, and take some active medicine. To this measure he expressed great reluctance, though it was repeatedly pressed upon him by different members of the family. The Rev. Mr. Hollister, of Skeneateles, called about twelve o'clock, noon, with a conveyance to take the bishop to Pompey, where there was a church to be consecrated the following day. About half an hour before this, Dr. Morgan, of this village, called to pay his respects. On discovering the bishop's evident tendency to indisposition, he seconded the remonstrance of the writer against proceeding on his tour of duty. The bishop yielded to his advice, and the doctor went to his office to prepare some medicine, which he kindly offered to administer himself, and proposed to remain till the operation was over. This he did.

It may be interesting to some to be informed of a coincidence which will be here stated. On the ninth of September, 1826, the writer having been but a few weeks a resident of this place, Bishop Hobart held confirmation in the church here. Towards evening of that day he was taken suddenly ill while alone in his room. A young man who has attended him in his last illness, being in an adjoining apartment, heard him fall; the writer was alarmed and ran to his assistance, and found him lying on his face, faint and somewhat convulsed. Orders were instantly given to call a physician, and Dr. Morgan, then an entire stranger to all concerned, was providentially found in the street, and in a few minutes was with the bishop. By a timely prescription and careful attention, the threatened illness passed over, and the next day found our prelate consecrating a church at Moravia, nearly twenty miles from this place. Whenever the bishop has subsequently made any stay in this village, the doctor has called upon him. The bishop was from the first very much pleased with this gentleman, and, as will be seen, grew fond of him, and placed the utmost confidence in him to the last. We now return to the narrative.

The medicine given as above stated took a happy effect, and the prospect was, that after a few hours of repose, and some further medicine, the bishop would be relieved. He rested well for the greater part of the night of Friday, the third; and, though during most of the following day, Saturday, the fourth, he suffered considerably, he found himself much better and more comfortable on Sunday, the fifth, and it was supposed that he would be soon wholly relieved. It was evident, however, that under the most favourable circumstances, he could not in safety attend to his appointments for the two following weeks. During the middle of the day, a letter dictated by himself, was addressed to his son, Dr. William H. Hobart, in the city of New-York, expressing the opinion of the bishop himself that he was convalescent; but as he concluded that he should not have sufficient strength to perform the duties of his visitation appointments, it would be advisable for him to return home as soon as he should be able to travel, and he wished his son to come on for the purpose of attending him on the way.

On Monday, the sixth, the editor of the Gospel Messenger suggested to the bishop the propriety of issuing in the form of an extra, the notice which has been seen generally by the readers of newspapers. In that extra, which was read to the bishop, he requested the alteration of the original expression of the writer, and substituted for it, "his disease is now yielding to judicious treatment." On Tuesday, the seventh, the symptoms were more unfavourable, but there was nothing by any means alarming either to the physician or himself. During Wednesday, the eighth, the bishop's disorder assumed a severer character, but he was evidently much more comfortable through a large portion of Thursday, the ninth, but on Friday, the tenth, and towards the evening of that day, it assumed a fatal aspect. About nine the bishop's son arrived. His introduction into the room of his venerated father produced emotions better imagined than described, and which will not be soon forgotten by those present. The bishop was in full possession of his powers of mind and voice. The inquiries he made after his family, the pious counsels he addressed to his child, the fervour of his religious feelings, the ardour of his affectionate language produced for a time a most thrilling and overwhelming effect. Painfully interesting as this interview was, it was truly gratifying to those who had hitherto surrounded the bishop's bed, that Dr. Hobart could hear from his father's mouth not only his last admonitions and affectionate entreaties to make the Saviour of his soul the supreme object of his love, but that he might have from it an assurance that the father had the fullest confidence in what his physicians had done for him. This sentiment was very frequently expressed during the whole of his sickness. Though he had the advantage of the counsel of several of the most distinguished and able medical gentlemen from other villages, and though he was very much gratified by their visits, and still more by their untiring attention, he never failed to assure both them and his attending physician that he had the most entire confidence in the latter. To him he often addressed the most grateful, pious and tender remarks. Again and again he would say, "My dear doctor, give me your hand, it soothes me, you have been very kind and faithful to me, you have been most judicious in your treatment of me, you will not lose your reward, for whether I live or die you have done your duty. God will bless you, my Saviour will bless you." To his other attendants he was continually addressing the most warm acknowledgments, imploring upon them the richest blessings. On receiving the slightest refreshment or relief, his first expression was, "God be praised," and then he would tenderly and repeatedly thank the immediate agent. Time will not permit any thing like a narrative of his conversations and remarks to those in his room. Throughout his sickness none were admitted who were not necessary to his comfort.

Though Bishop Hobart did not consider himself alarmingly ill, till the latter part of his sickness, still he frequently observed, even in the earlier part of it, that it was the third attack of the kind, and one such, he had no doubt, "would some day be his end." "Perhaps," said he, "this may be that one—if so, God's will be done—O pray for me that I may not only say this, but feel it, feel it as a sinner; for bear me witness, I have no merit of my own—as a guilty sinner would I go to my Saviour, casting all my reliance on him—the atonement of his blood. He is my only dependence—my Redeemer, my Sanctifier, my God, my Judge." Such was the tenor of much of his conversation; and it is most earnestly wished that the writer had the ability as well as time to record in the glowing language of the departed prelate, the evidence he gave of deep humility, of living faith, of animating hope, of the joys of heaven.

On Sunday, the fifth, he requested the writer to perform in his room the office of visitation of the sick, in which, with his prayer book lying on his bed before him, he joined with that delightful fervour for which his manner has been so often admired. Frequently, through the day and the night, he would request either the writer or the reverend brother who was with him all the time from Tuesday P. M. till he died, to use some short prayer. This practice was continued till he became too much exhausted to be benefited by it. He often asked for some portions of Bishop Andrew's litany to be read. In his own repetition of them there was a thrilling effect upon those present.

On Saturday morning the indications were so wholly discouraging, that his physicians advised that he should be informed that they considered him in a very dangerous situation. Though the bishop had evidently regarded his case as very doubtful, he might not be aware that his time was so near out as it proved to have been.

The painful office of making the communication fell upon the writer, and it was suggested that if he had any thing to do or say, there should be no delay. An allusion was made to his wishes as to the Lord's Supper. "Oh yes," said he, "the sacrament—the sacrament, that is the last thing, that is all, let me have it." There was a firmness and composure in his manner as he uttered the words, "God's will be done," which moved every heart, and confirmed all present in the conviction that the pious affection of this venerated and beloved bishop could not be shaken by the approaches of death.

The sacrament was soon administered by the writer, and long will that solemn scene be remembered by all who beheld the transaction, as one of the most tender and moving character. When the person officiating came in the confession to the words "by thought, word, and deed," the bishop stopped him and said, "you know the church expects us to pause over those words—pause now, repeating one of the words at a time, till I request you to go on." This was done—and the pauses in each case were so long that a fear passed over our minds that he had lost his recollection or fallen asleep. This, however, proved not to be so, he repeated each word, and after the third pause, added, "proceed, I will interrupt you no more." At the proper place he requested to hear read the ninety-third hymn; as soon as the reading was ended he sung clearly the second and third verses.

From this time, which was about nine o'clock in the morning, there was no very important change. During the night he said very little, and for about four hours before he expired was nearly, if not quite insensible to what was passing around. He sunk into the arms of death without a struggle, and his face soon assumed that engaging expression which has in life so often delighted those who loved him.

The most expeditious preparations were made for his removal to the city for interment. A respectable body of the inhabitants of the village assembled at the parsonage house, where after a few remarks by the writer, he performed that service in the Clergyman's Companion, prepared by the bishop himself for similar occasions. The body being placed in a hearse, (Sunday, three o'clock P. M.) a procession was formed; the writer and some members of his family, with the wardens and vestrymen of St. Peter's church, with some other members of the congregation followed the corpse in carriages, (Dr. Hobart having previously taken his departure.) The bell of St. Peter's church was tolled till the procession reached the edge of the village, when the people on foot and some others returned, and several carriages proceeded with the body to Weedsport, eight miles, where a canal boat was in readiness—and it was committed to the care of the Rev. F. H. Cumming, who it should be stated had been the constant attendant of the bishop, night and day, from Tuesday P. M. The qualifications of this gentleman for a nurse, and his untiring assiduity made him a most important aid to the writer and his family during those trying days. He was so acceptable to the bishop, that he was unwilling to have him a moment from his room, except now and then he would command him to go and get some rest.

The foregoing has been written to meet the supposed expectation of the distant public, and the bishop's more immediate friends, that the writer would make them acquainted with the most prominent facts and incidents in the last days of that eminent man, whose death fills the church with mourning.

JOHN C. RUDD.

A FABLE.

Once there was a fairy that had more benevolent and enlarged views than most of her species. She said her people had done very wrong in confining all their gifts to mankind, who had long since ceased to be worthy of their glass slippers, magic rings, wonderful mirrors, and pretty little luck-pence; her heart burned to be of service to the brute creation. So she stepped up to a cow, which was grazing by the way side. "Cow," said she, "what do you wish for most in the whole world? If you will tell me, you shall have it?"

The fairy was not much bigger than a grasshopper, and the old cow thought it was very presumptuous in her to pretend to have so much power.

"However, there is no telling," thought the cow, "for those little mosquitoes that do me so much mischief are a great deal smaller than she is."

Then the cow said, "If I might have my wish, I would be a bird. I do not like to be tied up in the barn every night, and never to be allowed to go but into one pasture. The birds have no troubles; they are free and happy. They can fly away from danger, and in winter they can warm themselves by the sun. Then they are at liberty to go all round the world, and gather information from every country. I am weary of this life of servitude and sameness."

When the fairy heard these words she touched her with a little wand, and the cow changed to a bird, and flew merrily away. Soon after the fairy met a robin, and she said, "Pretty robin, what should you most like in the world?"

"I should like to be a whale," said the bird; "I think it is very degrading to be such a little mite of a creature as I am; I always look on every thing large with envy. Besides, I should like to live away down under the water, because I should be so safe there; hawks could not find me, or the guns of cruel men reach me."

The fairy thought he was a foolish bird, but she did as he wished her; and he plunged into the water with a mighty noise. As the fairy stood by the sea-shore she saw another great whale afar off, and she jumped into an argonaut shell, and went to the whale, to ask him if he were happy.

"No, I am not," replied the whale; "but I am sure I should be if I had been made a horse, instead of being a whale. Those beautiful creatures do not have to wait upon themselves; they are fed and tended, and their coats brushed to shine like the sun. No harpooners pursue them; no sword-fish and a thresher unite to torment them; they live in plenty, and die in peaceful old age."

"It is very strange," said the fairy, "that every one should be unhappy where God has placed them; how true it is that each one knows his own sorrows better than another."

She granted the whale his wish, and flew away, well contented that she had that day done three benevolent actions.

The next year the kind-hearted fairy sought out the creatures she had changed, and asked them if they were very happy?

"Oh, I was very silly," said the cow, "when I changed the petty troubles I had known and tried, for greater ones I had never heard of. I was a fool to think there was more freedom in the air than on the earth. I have lived in perpetual terror of the hawks and the guns. Oh, I wish I were a cow again."

The fairy changed her to a cow, and the grass tasted sweeter to her than it ever did. Upon inquiry it was found that the others were as unhappy as she had been. The whale, wounded by sword-fish, and pursued by harpooners, was dying to breathe the sweet air of heaven once more, and to build its nest among the green summer boughs; while the horse, whipped and goaded during the day, and tied up through the night, longed for the freedom of the waves again.

And thus it is with mortals. Every one wishes to be what he is not. The poor man thinks that poverty is peculiar for its trials and temptations; that if he were rich, in the midst of his possessions, he would never more be troubled with care; but notwithstanding, he is often weary of a world that has no new excitement to offer; fretted by ten thousand pretended claims on his generosity, embittered by ingratitude, and sickened with the heartless flattery of contending heirs. The uneducated man envies the idol of literary fame; every thing seems bright and golden in his path, and he does not know how often the darling of popular favour mourns for the peaceful spirit of the unambitious, and the untroubled faith of the ignorant; how often he despises the friendship, which he sees is but a selfish desire for temporary importance; and how, in very heart-sickness, he shrinks from the publicity which the world will heap upon him, and the rancorous animosity it is sure to bring in its train. Content is the whole of wisdom—the amount of all philosophy. Every class of mankind has an equal share of happiness; and if we do not believe it, it is because we have a more distinct knowledge of our own troubles than of any others. We may believe that if we could exchange places with the wealthy and the celebrated, we should have philosophy enough to avoid their restlessness and languor; but we deceive ourselves. Mortals cannot escape a mingled destiny. For wise purposes there is a drop of bitterness at the fountain; it mixes with all the waters of life; and whether we drink from an earthen or golden cup, we cannot escape our portion.

DUKE OF ORLEANS AT PHILADELPHIA.

The duke of Orleans, now king of France, spent several months in Philadelphia in the year 1796. His whole conduct here was devoid of pride or discontent. The times seemed to indicate a total loss of rank and fortune, yet he was cheerful and resigned; nothing, indeed, could be more unpresuming and gentlemanly than his demeanour here. My intercourse with him was frequent. He came to Philadelphia from Hamburg in the ship America, commanded by Captain Ewing. On landing, he was invited by David Coningham, now alive, to lodge at his house in Front-street, where he was visited by many gentlemen of the city, and entertained very hospitably for several weeks. Mr. Coningham, as one of the house of Coningham and Nesbitt, was consignee and owner of the ship.

Not long after his arrival in Philadelphia he was joined by his two brothers, the dukes de Montpensier and Beaujolais. These young princes had been confined by the authorities of France, in the chateau d'If, situate on an island in the Mediterranean, opposite to Marseilles, and obtained their liberty on condition of going to America. For want of a better conveyance, they took their passage in a brig that had on board upwards of a hundred of our countrymen, just released from slavery at Algiers. They bore their exile with becoming fortitude, appearing like their elder brother, submissive and cheerful. I saw them often in society. On one occasion, meeting the three brothers in the street, Mr. D'Orleans (for so the elder brother was always called) told me that he had just heard that his good friend Captain Ewing, of the ship America, was at the wharf, on his return from Hamburg, and that he wished to take him by the hand, and introduce his brothers to him. I accompanied them to Ross's wharf, where the America had that moment hauled in. Captain Ewing came on shore, and was received by Mr. D'Orleans with the warmest cordiality, and presented to the brothers. This evidence of kind feeling on the part of the princes, and total absence of all pride or notion of superiority, showed that in them exalted birth and royal education were no obstacles to the adoption of our own plain republican manners.

Shortly after they travelled all three on horseback to Pittsburgh. I saw them pass along Market-street, equipped as western traders then used to ride—having a blanket over the saddle, and their saddle-bags on each side. When they returned, Mr. D'Orleans hired a very humble apartment in Fourth, near Prune-street, where I visited him. He did me the favour to trace the route he had just taken, on a map that hung in his room, and told me that they managed very well along the road; taking care of themselves at the taverns, and leaving their horses to be groomed by the only servant they had with them. "We could have done very well," said he, "without any servant, had we not been anxious about our horses."

These distinguished exiles afterwards descended the Mississippi, and went to the Havana, and from thence to Cadiz; and subsequently having made their peace with the brothers of Louis the sixteenth, the present king Philip married a princess of the reigning Bourbons of Naples.

We had in Philadelphia at the time they were here Talleyrand, the duke de Liancourt, Volney, De Noailles, Talon, and many others; but of whom returned to France, and played a part in the past republican scenes of the revolutionary drama.

It is worthy of remark, that the king of England and the king of France have both been in Philadelphia. National Gaz.

LAFAYETTE.

The following is an extract of a letter from Paris, dated August tenth, to the editor of the Boston Sentinel.

"General Lafayette can now be ranked with Washington without exaggeration. His late conduct has capped the climax of his glory. Few people at present realize the degree to which he is entitled to our admiration. When, on the first days of the contest, I was told that he had come to Paris from La Grange to accept the dangerous post of leader of the armed people, I could hardly credit the news. Who could then have divined the issue? And had it not proved successful, think of the terrible consequence to the old veteran. To escape to America with his life, was the utmost he could have hoped in such an event. But he not only accepted the command, but did not fear to appear on horseback in military dress in various parts of Paris in the prosecution of his arduous undertaking. But his fearless devotion to the cause of liberty constitutes the smallest part of his claim to our admiration. It is his magnanimity, his wonderful disinterestedness, and the purity of his patriotism that rank him with Washington. It must be recollected that he is an avowed republican, that he has always desired a republic for France. And yet the new king, Philip I., is indebted to him personally for his crown. Yes! I am confident of this extraordinary fact. It is not generally known that a republic would certainly have been established, of which Lafayette might have been at the head, had it not been for his noble and disinterested preference of his country to himself. But he reflected that a republic, at this crisis, would be at the risk of foreign or civil war, or both. He was not afraid of either. He knew that he and the people could maintain a republic against both foreign and domestic foes. But he knew also that the duke of Orleans would make a "republican" king, and at the same time not endanger the public tranquillity. The magnanimous Lafayette, then, did not hesitate to give the duke his support, without which he never could have reigned. This I gather not from newspapers, but from the state of the public mind, expressed in innumerable ways, and particularly when the people came so near stopping the deliberations of the chamber of deputies the other day, and when no body could calm them but Lafayette. People now cry about the streets medals of "Lafayette, Pere des Français."

FRENCH MEDALS.

We have been favoured by an esteemed friend with two French medals, struck in commemoration of the late revolution in Paris. One is of gold, the other of silver. They bear the same inscription and devices. On the one side the tri-coloured flag waves from a staff which is fixed in and supported by the temporary barricades which were hastily thrown up in the great conflict. The fleur de lis also rears its head from the same foundation, and the whole is surmounted by the words "Aux intrepides citoyens de Paris." ["To the intrepid citizens of Paris."] In a line beneath the piles of granite blocks, trunks of trees, &c., is the word "barricades," and around the lower edge of the medal the words "Des 27, 28, 29, Juillet, 1830." On the banners are inscribed 1789—1830. On the reverse, Lafayette, veteran de la liberté, 1789—1830. Baltimore Gazette.

ANECDOTE OF CHARLES X.

The ex-king of France, when a child, was one day playing in an apartment of the palace while a peasant from Auvergne was busily employed in scrubbing the floor. The latter encouraged by the gaiety and playfulness of the young count, entered familiarly into conversation with him, and, to amuse him, told him a number of diverting stories and anecdotes of his province. The prince with all the ingenuousness of childhood, expressed his commiseration for the narrator's evident poverty, and for the labour which he was obliged to undergo in order to obtain a scanty livelihood. "Ay!" said the man; "my poor wife and five children often go supperless to bed." "Well then," replied the prince, with tears in his eyes, "you must let me manage for you. My governor every month gives me some pocket money, for which, after all, I have no occasion, since I want for nothing. You shall take this money and give it to your wife and children; but be sure not to mention a word of the matter to a living soul, or you will be finely scolded." On leaving the apartment, the honest dependant acquainted the governor of the young prince with the conversation that had taken place. The latter after praising the servant highly for his scrupulous integrity, desired him to accept the money, and to keep the affair a profound secret; adding, that he should have no cause to repent of his discretion. At the end of the month the young Count d'Artois received his allowance as usual, and watching the moment when he was unobserved, hastily slipped the whole sum into the hands of his protégé. On the same evening a child's lottery was proposed, for the amusement of the young princes, by the governor, who had purposely distributed among the prizes such objects as were most likely to tempt a boy of the count's age. Each of his brothers eagerly hazarded his little store, but the Count d'Artois kept aloof from his favourite amusement. The governor, feigning astonishment, at last demanded the reason of this unusual prudence?—still no answer from the count. One of the princes, his brothers, next testified his surprise, and at length pressed the young count so hard that in a moment of childish impatience he exclaimed, "This may be very well for you; but what would you do if, like me, you had a wife and five children to support?"

EXCERPTS.

In the struggle of contending interests, though peace is sometimes lost, intellectual energy is roused; and while the strife of emulation, and the restlessness of ambition disturb the quiet of society, they produce in their collision the genius that adorns it.

WITH A TRIFLING PRESENT.

Not want of heart, but want of art
Hath made my gift so small;
Then, loving heart, take hearty love
To make amends for all;
Take gift with heart, and heart with gift,
Let will supply my want;
For willing heart, not hearty will,
Nor is, nor shall be scant.

Such favours, so conferred, though unsought,
Deserve acknowledgment from noble minds.
Such thanks, as one hating to be obliged—
Yet hating more ingratitude, can pay,
I offer.

FAREWELL.

Oh Anna! do not say "farewell,"
Though we be doom'd to sever;
'Tis like the sullen passing bell,
Of pleasure gone for ever.
Ah! find a gentler language then,
The mournful truth to tell,
Say 'parted friends may meet again,'
But do not say farewell.
Oh! do not say farewell.
It tells of pleasure past away—
It tells of future sorrow;
That summer smiled on yesterday,
And winter comes to-morrow.
Around the heart it seems to throw
A melancholy spell
Of mingled memory and woe;
Oh! do not say farewell.
Oh! do not say farewell.

Be ignorance thy choice where knowledge leads to woe.

CHARLES THE TENTH'S JOURNEY.

The following are additional particulars to the already known description of Charles the tenth's journey:

The cortège was closed by seventeen carriages filled with the baggage of the royal family. There were several of them laden with gold.

The most singular and most curious part of the cortège were some pale-faced and bilious persons, who, in token of their distress, followed those who preceded them barefooted, with their hands on their backs, and their eyes fixed on the ground, moving mechanically, without taking the least notice of what passed around them, totally absorbed in the contemplation of their misfortunes. Notwithstanding the coarse clothing that covered them, and the workmen's dresses they had put on, there was no difficulty to recognise them. These were a few Jesuits who had figured at the court of Charles the tenth, and who undoubtedly could find no other asylum than that of his mournful cortège.

An immense crowd of peasants and bourgeois ran to the roads on his passage. Curiosity was depicted on all countenances, and pity on some. For the remainder not a single word escaped; neither acclamation nor reproach disturbed the mournful—the lugubrious silence. The cortège advanced in the midst of the waves of the multitude; and the steps of the horses and wheels of the cannon were distinctly heard. All the spectators contented themselves with beholding the fallen court; but no one expressed either astonishment, hatred, or sympathy. Wherever the cortège passed, the national flag was flying. The tri-coloured cockade decorated every button-hole, and the tri-coloured flag waved on every building and window. Some of the postillions even wore this emblem of our victory.

The dead body of a garde du corps was found extended on the road near Nonan Court. He died, no doubt, from fatigue. Both men and horses had been for several days deprived of food and rest.

At Tilleres, a small bridge between Nonan Court and Verneuil, the cortège halted. The royal family alighted at the inn, and dined at a postmaster's. Their repast consisted of eggs and fruit. The duchess of Angoulême scarce stopped a few minutes, but went immediately to the village church to pray.

The room where the royal family dined faced the street—the windows were open, and a crowd, eager to see the fallen monarch, besieged the doors of the inn to witness his departure.

During the whole time Charles the tenth did not pronounce a single word; he not even addressed his grand-children, whom he had ordered to be placed by the side of him.

LA DELAISSÉE.

BY CLIO.

Alas! une Delaisée, without a beau,
I'm doom'd to pass the autumn, and forego
The envy of my sex, the love of his,
And all because I said I liked blue better
Than crimson for mon chapeau; and a kiss
Denied him for his very silly letter,
Written from shady Weehawk, where his wine
Was more the cause of love than charms of mine.

Alas, that gentlemen, when un peu bleu,
Should think all other people of their hue;
Or fancy love that's vinous, suits as well
As the pure spring of deep unsullied feeling,
That quiet flows in the heart's shaded cell,
Its silver rippling stream of light revealing
With timid glow, when flowing o'er the eye—
Or o'er those dew drench'd flow'rs, the cheek's soft dye.

And then, alas, to think these thoughts how vain—
These sighs, that may not bring him back again—
That prey upon the heart's declining bliss.
Why suffer his congé, before a better
Had made his dévoir too. Ay, aught but this.
If he would only write another letter,
I think I could forgive him, though he were Constrain'd to kiss me thrice in my despair.

But no—I see it all, with Delphic eye—
The future and the past, the last "good-by."
Now at some soirée, flatter'd by some fair—
More favour'd, if not fairer—all his graces
Calling forth with soft obsequious air,
To choose the choicest comfits, coolest places—
And whisper tender nothings in her ear—
Nothings, which I would now delight to hear.

While I am doom'd to trudge, with pa and Clo,
The Battery's tedious round—or bid to go,
At ten, when out, and leave the coterie,
When wit the ice bands of form is breaking,
And the loud laugh and hyden revelrie,
Their home-bred maxims of restraint forsaking,
Make midnight vocal with their sweet fracas,
And stolen kisses punish with ha! ha!

The opera, and the concert, and the balls,
The promenades, the bright illumined halls;
Alas to me is lost their witchery,
And all their sights, and sounds, and sighs, and flutter;
And nods, and smiles, and love's light archery;
And thoughts and feelings ladies may not utter.
But cherish—ah, too oft as buds of flow'rs,
The canker that consumes as love does ours.

I'll rise no more at six a blush to wear,
Nor put in cannon curls my golden hair;
I will not smile, as all young ladies should,
To show their pretty teeth; and my Dunstable
I will resign for slouchy green silk hood;
And eat of every thing upon the table;
I'll take to reading mathematics, too,
And look as vile as Lady Montague.

I'll wash my pretty hands in Carter's soap,
And for a ribbon wear an abbess' rope;
Do any thing but please the gentlemen;
And if at length I do consent to marry,
'Twill only be to vex and worry them;
Unless, indeed, at length I should get Harry:
And then!—But, oh, till then my falling tears
Shall note the number of my lonely years.

FINE ARTS AND THE DRAMA.

MUSIC.

THE Marsellois Hymn, as it is usually termed, given on the last page of the present number, written by one Rouget, early in the French revolution, the music attributed to divers composers, among others to Méhul, but with no certainty, is a remarkable specimen of the prodigious effect which the union of poetry with melody is capable of producing on the passions. The maddening influence of this beautiful and energetic appeal in behalf of liberty, without doubt occasioned a more general recourse to the advice "Aux armes, citoyens," than the finest orations, or the best penmanship could have accomplished under any circumstances. There were various other revolutionary compositions, generally of a very mean cast, among which we point out the famed "Ca ira." This song, from the terrific and blood-thirsty sentiments it contained against "Les Aristocrates," whom it doomed "a la Lanterne," without mercy or reservation, has not remained in the same esteem as the Marsellois Hymn. Indeed it cannot but recall scenes acted in the reign of terror, for which all well disposed Frenchmen are compelled to blush, and which go very far to saddle them with the opinion which Voltaire has given of their nature and disposition; added to this, the music is not of a superior grade, nor is preferable to Yankee Doodle, which, except for its associations, we cannot compliment as a national anthem. The effect produced by the singing of the Marsellois Hymn lost none of its pristine vigour, when it heralded the return from Elba of Corporal Violet, as the French termed Buonaparte, and the second deposition of the Bourbons. The power it possesses has been equally proved in the third rejection of that besotted and bigotted family. On the restoration of Louis the eighteenth, Le desiré, as he was misnamed, the Marsellois Hymn and the tri-colour flag gave place to "Vive Henri quatre," and the drapeau blanc—all revolutionary airs of course being suppressed; and after the famed hundred days and the battle of Waterloo, when Louis re-ascended the throne, in addition to the suppression of all songs containing even an allusion to liberty, flowers of all kinds were precluded from being worn as nosegays, in sympathy for the misfortune which had occurred to the Bourbons through the type of a violet. So suspicious were the authorities in France of the conduct of the people, and so weak in manifesting their fears. At that time, in addition to the beautiful old air and chorus called "Vive Henri quatre," another national anthem was adopted, bearing the words as chorus, "Vive le Roi, Vive la France." This composition is decidedly very beautiful, but not comparable to the Marsellois Hymn, the modulation of which is superior to that of any similar piece of music which has fallen under our observation; and as it has now become, with every chance of remaining so, the recognised national air of France, an acquaintance with it cannot but be agreeable to our musical readers. We should observe, that several notes have been altered from quavers to crotchets, and vice versa, to suit the English version; but it is so obvious, that any person acquainted even slightly with music, can use the same copy for both the French and English poetry.

The effect produced by this inspiring air, as lately sung at the Park theatre in both French and English, is not easily to be forgotten. Richings' majestic and portly person seemed to dilate beyond its usual ample proportions while giving utterance to the martial strain; and a worthy French patriot, who volunteered for the first time to appear on the stage, gave the couplets with astonishing energy. The letter R rolled round his mouth like distant thunder, in the word marchons; and his little round person seemed inflated beyond its natural limits. As for the audience, they shouted and stamped and encored, in a most patriotic manner; and the number of persons who whistled the melody next day was alarming. B.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE attractions at this house are continued with uncommon splendour. Forrest is drawing crowds to witness the masterly and successful representations of his favourite characters. He has not performed any new part since our last notice. Mrs. Austin, the first female vocalist in the country, has re-appeared, and in that very popular drama of our C. Rokeby. Her estimation in public opinion daily increases, and will continue to do so as long as the charms of music fail not to effect their wonted influence upon the human heart. To these brilliant stars another is destined soon to succeed, which will, unless fate is peculiarly adverse, produce no ordinary impression in the dramatic world: it comes in no less imposing a person than that of Edmund Kean; and his name has magic in it, which requires no comment of ours.

THE REVELLER'S FESTIVAL.

BY GEORGE D. STRONG.

There was mirth in the brimming bowl,
And wit in each jovial call;
And the merry shout rang freely out
From the reveller's festive hall.

"Fill, fill the goblet high—
"Drink, drink the rosy wine!
"Bright liquid gem in love's diadem,
"Immortal joys are thine!"

Then they filled "to hoary time,"
Each echoed it forth with glee;
"For to him belong the laugh and song,
"And his votaries all are we."

"Let's mingle the joys of the glass
"With the witching strains of the lyre;
"For the cup of delight but sparkles at night,
"Its beams in the morning expire.

"Now fill 'to the present hour,'
"A bumper, a bumper to this!
"The future and past to the winds we'll cast,
"For here is our heaven of bliss!"

But hark! that awful crash!
Like the spheres when rent asunder!
While the scream and groan with death-like tone,
Are heard through the peals of thunder!

Alas for the reveller's joy!
For the angel of death hath passed;
And the funeral bell with its chimes can tell
How fearful hath been his blast!

Glory to him who falls
Where combat the free and the brave!
The trump of fame shall echo his name,
And beauty strew flowers o'er his grave.

Tears for the blooming maid,
Who sinks 'neath the blight of decay;
She has fled in her prime e'er the dark clouds of time,
Could shadow the light of her way!

Joy for the aged sire
Who falls like the leaf in its sere;
He has passed to that shore where bliss evermore
Shall reward him for faithfulness here.

But alas for the reveller's death,
Oh who shall his memory cherish?
The tear-drops that fall o'er the wine-bibber's fall
Are in anguish for him doomed to perish!

ORIENTAL MAXIMS.

ATTACHMENT to the world is the origin of all vice.
Old men have no need of any greater malady than old age.
The ignorant is not a man, and the learned without virtue is not learned.

Whatever perfections you have, do not boast of them, for you will not be believed upon your word.

However many friends you have, do not neglect yourself: though you have a thousand, not one of them loves you so much as you ought to love yourself.

Have no intercourse with an envious person, with one who has no regard for you, with a fool, an ungrateful man, with an ignorant man, with a miser, with a liar, with a vulgar man, or a calumniator.

Life is a dream, and death is the time of waking, and man fits between the one and the other like a phantom.

The only way of not being bored in good company, is to say witty things yourself, or sit still and listen to the witty things of other people.

The crow will become white before the man who seeks for knowledge without application will become learned.

The world is like an inn, in which the traveller sleeps to-day and leaves to-morrow.

A man without money is like a bird without wings, or a ship without sails.

Do not shut your gate against those who wish to enter, and do not refuse your bread to those who wish to eat.

Take warning from the misfortunes of others, that others may not take warning by your own.

Words are for women, actions for men.

Eat and drink with your friends, but neither sell to them nor buy of them.

Though your enemy may appear no more formidable than an ant, consider him as an elephant.

P. S.—The volume from which we have concocted the above is gray, very gray, with years and cobwebs. There are about an hundred or two more maxims remaining, which, if we live, (for we are already very aged,) we intend to do into English. They are most of them true, take an aged gentleman's word for it.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Letters from St. Petersburg.—We commence this week the publication of a series of interesting letters, written in the capital of Peter the Great. They have been politely furnished us by an attentive friend.

Family Library—History of Insects.—We have read the eighth number of this most valuable series, (just published by the untiring Harpers,) with unusual interest and satisfaction. Of all studies perhaps there is none more captivating than that of animated nature, and it is scarcely possible to write any thing upon this branch of knowledge that shall be entirely incapable of affording pleasure or advantage to the reader. From Pliny and Aldrovandus and Spallanzani down to Buffon and Goldsmith, and the still more accurate and curious investigations of modern naturalists, the subject has continued to afford matter for research; and every succeeding observer has brought to light new and interesting facts and materials for astonishment and delight to the inquiring student. The present volume is peculiarly useful and agreeable, as it presents only such details as are amusing and instructive, without descending to speculative inquiries or dry details of experiments which, however important to the cause of science, are not likely to prove attractive to the reader who has neither time or inclination to pursue the study of natural history in all its ramifications. The article upon bees in particular is remarkably interesting, comprising, as it does, almost all the discoveries of Huber, whose work upon these wonderful insects attracted a few years since so much attention. The ants are also treated of largely, and much to the pleasure and edification of the reader. We think this volume, and such as may succeed it in the same series, will be found invaluable for academies, as it certainly is worthy of a place in every library. The perusal of it has been to us like a green spot in the desert of dull and foolish books, through so many of which it is the unhappy destiny of editors to wade.

Crabbe's Dictionary of General Knowledge.—A new stereotype edition, greatly improved and enlarged, of this valuable manual is about being published by Mr. Sleight, of this city. We have examined specimens of the work, and are truly pleased with its typographical neatness, and with the beauty and spirit of the numerous engravings which illustrate the most important definitions.

The Barony.—This is an interesting romance, in the true vein of the author, who is no less popular and familiar a personage than Miss Anna Maria Porter. Although the school of Scott and Bulwer have somewhat dimmed the lustre of all former favourites with the public, there is still left a large class who will greedily devour the present work, and thus revive old and delightful impressions.

Miss Sterling.—This accomplished pianist is about treating the musical coteries with another concert. We feel bold to prophesy it will attract a full, fashionable, and delighted audience.

New Comedy.—One of our most popular writers, distinguished alike for the brilliancy of his wit, the caustic vein of his humour, and the vividness of his description, is engaged in the production of a dramatic sketch, in which the native features of the American character are to be prominently displayed. From the success of all the former attempts of the author in every department of literature which he has approached, and from his acute powers of observation and his intimate knowledge of men and manners, we are disposed to augur very favourably of the proposed undertaking. Mr. Hackett who has struck out, with singular boldness, a new line of original characters, will undoubtedly be offered a fine opportunity of signaling himself, and increasing his stock of well-earned reputation.

New Tragedy.—Of all the difficult undertakings in literature we consider the least easily surmounted to be that of composing a regular tragedy. In this country no attempt of the kind has yet bordered even on an approach to success. The field is, therefore, open, and the present times are peculiarly auspicious to any writer who will enter the lists. One native tragedian stands ready with his masterly powers to ensure success to even an ordinary production. We are glad, therefore, to learn that a writer in Philadelphia, who has already gained considerable credit, has finished a tragedy for the stage, in which Mr. Forrest is to fill the prominent character. We sincerely wish the author and actor success.

Sketches of China.—We have read Mr. Wood's Sketches of China, just published by Carey and Lea, and are much pleased with the work. It is embellished with several engravings from original designs.

Now, now, the dangerous storm is rolling,
 Which treacherous kings confederate raise;
 The dogs of war let loose are howling,
 And lo! our fields and cities blaze.
 And shall we basely view the ruin,
 And shall we lawless force, with guilty stride,
 Spread desolation far and wide,
 With crimes and blood his hands embruing?
 To arms! to arms! ye brave! &c.

With luxury and pride surrounded,
 The vile insatiate despots dare,
 Their thirst of power and gold unbounded,
 To mete and vend the light and air.
 Like beasts of burden would they load us,
 Like gods would bid their slaves adore;
 But man is man, and who is more?
 Then shall they longer lash and goad us?
 To arms! to arms! ye brave! &c.

Oh, Liberty, can man resign thee,
 Once having felt thy generous flame?
 Can dungeons, bolts and bars confine thee?
 Or whips thy noble spirit tame?
 Too long the world has wept, bewailing
 That falsehood's dagger tyrants wield;
 But Freedom is our sword and shield,
 And all their arts are unavailing.
 To arms! to arms! ye brave! &c.

Quo veut cette horde d'esclaves,
 De traîtres, de rois conjurés?
 Pour qui ces ignobles entraves,
 Ces fers dès longtemps préparés?
 Français, pour nous, ah! quel outrage!
 Quels transports il doit exciter!
 C'est nous qu'on ose menacer
 De rendre à l'antique esclavage!
 Aux armes, etc.

Quoi! des cohortes étrangères
 Feraient la loi dans nos foyers?
 Quoi! ces phalanges mercennaires
 Terrasseraient nos fiers guerriers?
 Grand Dieu! par des mains enchaînées
 Nos fronts sous le joug se ploieraient!
 De vils despotes deviendraient
 Les maîtres de nos destinées!
 Aux armes, etc.

Tremblez, tyrans; et vous, perfides,
 L'opprobre de tous les partis;
 Tremblez—vos projets parricides
 Vont enfin recevoir leur prix.—
 Tout est soldat pour vous combattre:
 S'ils tombent, nos jeunes héros,
 La France en produit de nouveaux
 Contre vous tous prêts à se battre.
 Aux armes, etc.

Français, en guerriers magnanimes,
 Portez ou retenez vos coups;
 Epargnez ces tristes victimes
 A regret s'armant contre vous;—
 Mais ces despotes sanguinaires,
 Mais ces complices de Bouillé—
 Tous ces tigres qui, sans pitié,
 Déchirent le sein de leur mère.
 Aux armes, etc.

Amour sacré de la patrie,
 Conduis, soutiens nos bras vengeurs.
 Liberté, Liberté chérie,
 Combats avec tes défenseurs:—
 Sous nos drapeaux que la victoire
 Accoure à tes mâles accents;
 Dans tes ennemis expirans,
 Vois ton triomphe et notre gloire.
 Aux armes, etc.

A DEATH SCENE.

Written in memory of Mrs. Eliza Beck.

BY MISS ELIZABETH BOGART.

SHE died! We could not save her—mourners stood Around her bed, and tears flowed thick and fast
From many an unsealed fountain; and there came Physicians in, and ministered, and spoke
Of hope while life remained. It was in vain.
All human power was powerless before death.
All felt it—and the words of comfort, breathed
By each in turn to each, fell on the heart
Like drops of water on the unyielding stone,
Producing no impression. None mistook
The tokens the destroying angel sent
Of his approach; and none deceived themselves—
Although they strove with a false kindness still Awhile to blind each other.

Grief grew loud
And louder, as the fearful consciousness
Came rushing o'er the mind, that earthly things
Were passing from her ear. The voice of prayer
Was offered up to heaven; and that one voice
She knew, and blessed, e'en with her parting breath.
Then all around grew dim. The objects loved,
Best loved in life, became like distant things
On which she had no hold. The fleeting soul
Could not be stayed, when it was called by Him
To whom it owed its being—and she died!
Died once to live through all eternity.

The spark of life went out just as the sun
Was setting in his glory; and the light
Lingered in softened shadows round the room,
As if it were intended for a type
Of light beyond the grave. Her eyes were closed
For ever on it here—and yet she looked
As if she had but gone to sleep, to take
Her natural rest after the toilsome day,
So placid and so tranquil was her brow—
So calm and undisturbed each feature lay
In its unbroken stillness. There was peace
Stamped on that quiet face. And oh, I thought
While watching the departing spirit there,
'Twas not so very hard a thing to die!
No struggle told of pain or agony—
No sigh escaped, as gently from the lips
The last breath passed—and the heart's throbbings ceased
So easily, the nearest scarce could know
When first its pulse was still.

It must be thus
The christian dies! The world but little knew
Of her, or hers. Fame had not heard of her.
She dwelt amidst the quiet scenes of life,
Unenvying and unenvied—but her heart
Was full of warm affections, and the earth
Had been to her a pleasant place. She loved
Its varied gifts—its fruits, and plants, and flowers,
All, all were blessings—sun-light, clouds, and rain,
Alike were good to her well-balanced mind.
But most she loved her husband, children, home—
They were her idols; and it was not meet
That the heart's worship should be given long
To aught of human mould. 'Twas thus decreed,
And it is done.

A little spot is all
She now requires for her last resting-place.
There the green turf may grow, and flowers may bloom,
And sun and rain may come; but she will ne'er
Have thought or care for them again. A stone,
A simple stone, will tell her humble name
To passers by—but her best monument
Will ever be engraven on the hearts
Of those who knew, nor yet knew half her worth,
Till she was gone.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

"His was the way to rise, and he was blest."

JOHN *, the son of a respectable butcher, in Westminster, London, was, at the age of ten years, employed to serve his father's customers with beef, &c. at their houses. Among the most noble and liberal of his patrons, was the lady of Lord Dartmouth, who soon became so much pleased with the punctuality and fidelity of the butcher's boy, that she often condescended to treat him with such cakes and other dainties as were considered suitable to his age and condition.

After having served the family daily, for about two years, he called one morning, as usual, mounted on his little pony, with a large tray of meat before him, and was informed that his patroness had gone out in the coach with her lord for the benefit of the air. At this moment, while in the act of delivering his tray of provisions to the servant at the gate, his attention was arrested by a female voice from one of the windows of the palace, which exclaimed in startling accents, "Robbery! robbery! Stop the thief! He that runs yonder! The villain has stolen my lady's jewels! The casket is under his arm!"

The quick-eyed butcher-boy caught sight of the fugitive in a moment—dropped his tray—put spurs to his pony, and darted off with great swiftness in pursuit of the robber. Fear added wings to the felon's speed, for with him the race was for life or death. Through three different streets was he closely followed by his intrepid pursuer on his panting pony, when he suddenly turned to the left, into a small ally, which led to the little gate that opened into "the bird-cage walk," on the west side of St. James's Park. As he passed the gate the butcher's boy was close at his heels; but the straitness of the entrance compelled the latter to dismount, which gave the fugitive some advantage. The pony soon succeeded, however, in squeezing through the passage, when his young master again vaulted on his back and resumed the pursuit with a speed that soon brought him within hearing of the sentinel on duty at the corner of the park near the horse-guards, to whom John cried, "Stop the robber! stop the robber! He has stolen a casket of jewels from Lady Dartmouth!" &c. The soldier ordered the man to stand, but was only answered with a blow, which was instantly repaid by a death-wound from the bayonet of the sentinel.

John now came up, and after the proper explanations secured the casket of jewels, which were of great value, and bore them off in triumph to the palace of Lord Dartmouth, (who had just returned home with his lady from their morning ride,) where he found the whole family in a terrible consternation at so bold and daring a felony; for the stolen casket not only contained all the rich jewels of her ladyship, but also the diamond star of the earl, which was of immense value. Lady Dartmouth had fainted, and the earl, between the loss of his jewels and the situation of his wife, was nearly distracted.

The appearance of the butcher's boy, however, with the casket in his hand, soon restored order and happiness to all concerned. Words were inadequate to express the feelings which glowed in the bosoms of Lord and Lady Dartmouth; for the chivalry of John had completely won their hearts. On the following day the earl sent for the boy's father, and requested permission to take the lad, and educate him at his own expense. With this proposal the father instantly complied, and was ever grateful to the earl for his kindness. The boy immediately became an inmate of the palace, and was in due time placed in one of the best public schools, where he made such rapid progress in the Latin and Greek languages, that he was soon fitted for the university. At college the development of his intellectual powers was still more successful, and he became one of its brightest scholars. Always at the head of his class, he was rewarded with two of the first premiums, received the honours of the university, and had the credit of being the most learned of its members—being equally acquainted with the elegant as with the profound branches of science and literature.

Let us here leave him for a moment in the successful pursuits of his brilliant career, and return to the palace of his noble patrons.

Twenty days after the incident which placed our youthful hero under the earl's protection, Lady Dartmouth's confidential chambermaid was found lifeless, suspended by the neck from a bed-post. In her bosom was a paper developing the particulars of the robbery, which was perpetrated by her lover at her own suggestion, while she was preparing to elope with him to the United States. The temporary absence of the earl and his lady, on their morning ride, was the moment fixed on for the perpetration of their project. She seized the casket of jewels, placed them in his hands, and bid him fly to a place of rendezvous already agreed upon. In descending the great stair-case, however, Smith (for that was the felon's name) was met by a female, who recognised the casket and gave the alarm, as before stated. Grief for the death of her lover, remorse for her crime, and shame for an anticipated exposure of her frailty, prompted this wretched girl to perpetrate this last and irreparable act of rashness. Her confession concluded in the following terms: "It was I who stole the casket—I gave it to him—I urged him to fly—I have been the cause of his death—I am the guilty one; guilty of all! Oh! the horrors of a guilty conscience! Alas! alas! there is no hope! All on this side the grave to me is darkness, black as the regions of despair! Endless misery on the other closes my prospect."

In the meantime the fortunate agent of this disclosure was pursuing his studies with the success before mentioned. On completing his course at the university, where he graduated with the most flattering honours, he became a private tutor to the young earl of F, through the recommendation of the whole faculty of his alma mater. At the palace of the young nobleman he continued for two years, devoting all his time and attention to the intellectual advancement of his noble pupil, who not only made great improvement under his judicious instructions, but gradually conceived the most ardent friendship for his excellent tutor, who, in return, loved the pupil as a father loves a son.

But this course of instruction was fated to be interrupted by an incident as singular as unexpected. The young earl's widowed mother unfortunately conceived an affection for the amiable tutor, and had the imprudence to confess her passion to the astonished object! This confession was met by a prompt but respectful repulse, which threw the lady into a violent rage. On retiring from the library, where she had sought and held this mortifying interview, she met her son, who had just returned from a short excursion on horseback. An éclaircissement took place, which resulted in exculpating the tutor from all blame, although the young earl was at first disposed to think differently. Though mortified and grieved for the weakness of his mother, he was immediately reconciled to his friend, but told him that he must that very night leave the palace, and never enter it again while her ladyship lived. At the same time his lordship assured him of his undiminished esteem, and promised him that on the vacancy at Lambeth, which was shortly expected, he would exert all his influence to have him created an archbishop. Within twelve months from that date the butcher's boy became "His grace of Canterbury," and was seated in his princely palace at Lambeth, dressed in his pontifical robes, with the key of St. Peter suspended at his bosom; a man full of wisdom, piety, and benevolence.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER TWO.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

The sovereignty of Denmark over the waters leading to and from the Baltic, has been considered absolute from the earliest ages, and the origin of Sound-dues is unquestionably owing to the protection and assistance extended by the Vikings, or armed cruisers, to foreigners trading in those seas, or coming to share the rich fishery that formerly abounded here. These dues, at first arbitrary, have now for nearly two centuries been established and fixed by treaty; and, as ten or twelve thousand vessels annually pass the Sound, and hundreds are not unfrequently detained at anchor in the roads by head winds, they seem no more than a fair equivalent to the Danish government for the maintenance of a strict maritime police among them, the taking surveys, and the expense of erecting and furnishing light-houses along the coast.

We had scarcely brought to when a sail-boat came alongside; the captain and myself jumped in, and as we only lay about two miles distant from the shore, we were soon landed at the health-office. Here we underwent a short impatient examination, the officer asking a thousand questions, keeping us without an iron railing, and handling each successive paper that we passed through to him with long slender iron pincers. At length our certificates were pronounced in "order," the bill of health "clean," the gate was thrown open, and we once more found ourselves on terra firma. We had been joined by one of the firm of our attentive correspondents, and immediately proceeded to the counting-room, for the transaction of our business. Sound-dues were soon settled, the order of supplies made out, when, there being no prospect of a wind, we concluded on a stroll through the town, and a visit to Hamlet's garden. What a contrast did Elsinour present to any thing American! There all is new and fresh and young, and here it looked so remarkable, so quaint, and so antique. A momentary awe came over me as I gazed on the relics of time, and my thoughts turned back with the charm of song to the deeds of other days. More than a thousand years ago this was the capital of the kingdom; now it is the mere stopping-place to pay Sound-dues, obtain supplies, and take a pilot! The limits of the town, however, do not seem to have been curtailed. It possesses a population of about six thousand, has several churches, and a theatre. The streets are narrow, without side-walks, leaving the pedestrian to seek his way through them as he best may; the houses are of brick and stone, with tiled roofs, and mirrors attached outside to the windows of many of the principal houses, that reflect the figures of all who pass to those within. I caught several pretty girls obtaining these furtive glances, and would recommend the arrangement to our Broadway belles, as preferable to sit gazing boldly in front of their open Venetians.

We found the garden at the extreme end of the town, and entered it through a dirty yard. A smooth lawn, checkered by trees, and shrubbery, and statues of plaster, spread out from a steep ascent to a high plain; groups of children were at play, and a few ladies promenading along the gravel walks. We took a turn or two, and then ascended by a zig-zag path to the summit of the hill. This was separated from another of equal height by a narrow dell, through which gurgled a clear rivulet, and walks ran along the brow, and were shaded by high forest trees. The prospect from hence was varied and beautiful. Far to the left lay the deep Cattegat, the town of Helsingborg, a train of villages, and a long line of Swedish coast was in front; to the right stretched out the Sound, whitened by the sails of a numerous fleet from every clime; and before rose Elsinour, and strong Cronberg castle, flanked with towers, and dear to the English reader as the ghost scene of "Denmark's buried majesty." Half up the eminence stands a white stone building, with a flat roof and surrounding parapet, once the residence of the noble Hamlet, and now that of the governor of the town and castle. Here, along the brow of the hill, was his favourite walk, and here where we stood tradition points out his grave, and the scene of his untimely end; and who can tell but in the purling brook beneath the fair Ophelia was "pulled down to muddy death," and lies buried on its grassy bank! In looking down the narrow dell it were certainly no hard matter for imagination to conjure up the funeral train, the "bringing home of bell and burial;" and hear the loved and loving, yet guilty queen, scattering her gathered flowers, and in low and plaintive accents sigh,

"Sweets to the sweet, farewell!
"I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
"I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid,
"And not have strew'd thy grave!"

History is not positive of even the name of Hamlet, and tradition is obscure and contradictory of his life and death; but what care we—he lived and breathed in the imagination of the prince of poets; and when the spot that is consecrated by his birth and burial shall have lost its charm of natural scene and prospect, it will still be dear in association to the lovers of the noblest reasoner, and the most singular and incomprehensible being that the wild genius of Shakspeare ever drew. ***

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

LINGTON, WITH OTHER FUGITIVE POEMS.

8vo. pp. 87. G. & C. & H. Carrill. 1830.

"You shall seldom find a dull fellow of good education," remarks Sir Richard Steele, "but if he happens to have any leisure upon his hands, will turn his head to one of those two amusements for all fools of eminence, politics and poetry." Had the composition of novels been included, the observation would be equally applicable to the present day. So far as numbers are concerned, we have an abundance of politicians, novelists, and poets. The shelves of the booksellers are loaded with effusions of writers in these several departments—with impracticable theories, inflated narratives, and maudlin verse; with suggestions and schemes of government that can never be acted on; scenes, characters, and events that never had existence; and "namby-pamby madrigals of love," that never should be read. He whose duty requires him to take some note of current literature, cannot but be surprised, if he turn his thoughts back for a single year, and reflect what a host of books, in the three departments we have named, have, in that brief space, passed in review before him. He will indeed be apt, like Cassio, to remember a mass of things, but nothing distinctly; for it must be confessed, that a very small portion of the books that are every day issuing from the press, are of a kind to make a permanent impression on the mind. Of poetry, this is true in a particular manner. Within a few years, a great number of poets have sprung up in this country, some of them exhibiting evidences of a very considerable degree of genius; yet among them all, how few are there that have written what will be remembered when themselves are passed away? A recent Boston work contained, we believe, the names of something like a hundred living American poets, (heaven save the mark!) but we much doubt if a candid critic would not be sadly puzzled to single out from these, a dozen who stand the least chance of being read and admired in another generation. When we have named Bryant and Halleck, Percival and Hillhouse, Dana and Sprague, with perhaps one or two others, we have named all whose works really do their country honour. There is a wide, we had almost said, immeasurable distance, between these and the younger crop of poets. The productions of some of the latter are well enough in their way, but it is a bad way. They do not sufficiently bear in mind that

"Verse is the mellow fruit of toil intense,
Inspired by genius, and informed by sense."

They too easily satisfy themselves, and seem not to know that the outpourings of an excited mind are not necessarily poetry. Their "random gleams of wit" show the possession of genius, but genius not properly cultured and restrained. Mere genius, unaided by study and labour, never produced any thing truly great. Eloquent passages, happy expressions, irresistible touches, may proceed from unassisted genius; but poetry does not consist in casual warmth of language, brightness of thought, or felicity of expression. He who would have his page glow with steady lustre, instead of being lighted with occasional glimmerings, must not trust entirely to the first promptings of a heated mind, but must consent to labour in various moods; he must revise his productions when the ardour of composition is passed; must strengthen what is weak, prune what is redundant, clear the obscure, repress the exuberant, weigh every word, and condense every thought. Poetry is an art, and a very difficult art. Sensibility, a nice perception of the beautiful, an ear for harmony, and a soul easily thrilled, are the gifts of nature: and, in so far, poets may be said to be born. But it is one thing to appreciate the beautiful, and another to describe it: it is one thing to be moved, and another to move the reader. Dexterity in the use of language, skill in the arrangement of parts, aptness in the choice and application of images and illustrations, are the result of study and practice.

"True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
As they move easiest who have learned to dance."

This does not seem, however, to be the opinion of the younger poets of this country. They pour forth their effusions as if there were a well-spring of song within them, which must have vent. They write every thing that occurs to them, and publish every thing they write. Hence it is that they never rise above that middle flight, that aurea mediocritas, which however desirable an elevation in fortune, is an unenviable height in poetry. It is a just remark of Horace,

"Ego nec stultum, sine divite vena,
Nec rude quid possit video ingenium: alterius sic
Altera poscit opem res, et conjurat amice."

The author of the work which we have named at the head of these remarks, is in some degree amenable to their censure. There is scarcely a page of the beautiful octavo lying before us, which does not exhibit evidences both of genius and carelessness. Several of the pieces seem to have been poured forth at the impulse of some burning thought, and not to have been touched again after the ardour of the moment had passed away. Others, which we remember to have met with before in the periodicals of the day, and a good number of which our own paper was the medium of originally conveying to the public, show marks of having since undergone revision; but it appears to have been exercised merely in the substitution of one word for another, without the motive of preference being always very obvious; and not in any attempt at condensation of language, or impregnation of additional meaning. The use of the painful file, recommended by the Latin satirist, is a task not easily performed by a young poet.

One cannot well bear to see his production dwindle away under the exercise of a severe taste—to see whole stanzas blotted out, or compressed into single lines; yet let him who admires the informed harmony of the Æneid remember, that its beauties are almost as much the result of labour, as of inspiration; that Virgil spent whole days in revising and correcting the effusions of an hour; in smoothing the numbers, retrenching the language, improving the imagery, and adding new grace or vigour to the thoughts.

The volume before us is made up of about twenty short poems, exclusive of some ten or a dozen sonnets, and the longest piece in the book does not contain more than a hundred and sixty or a hundred and seventy lines. Yet in this small quantity of matter, the writer has managed to crowd more beauties and blemishes than we remember to have met with before within the same compass in any recent collection of poems. With the exception of one short piece, the one beginning "Breathe no more the notes of sadness," which is truly about as unmeaning an affair as was ever set to music, there is not a single production in the book that is not characterised in a greater or less degree by beauties, many of them of no common order. With equal truth it may be observed, that there is not a single poem which is not stained with obvious faults. These seem to us to consist, for the most part, in affectations of language, in ambitious prettinesses, or sweet words used to eke out the line, or make it harmonious, without adding any thing to the idea. In the thoughts themselves, our author never subjects himself to criticism. The moral of his pieces, as far as they have any moral, is always excellent. There is not an impure allusion or morbid sentiment in the volume. His melancholy is tender and graceful, and he sorrows not as those who are without hope. His patriotism is that of one who loves his country; not only because it is his country, but because he understands her institutions and appreciates their value. His love is a refined and delicate passion, not mixed with any of the trite nonsense about lava-blood and hearts of flame, which the imitators of Lord Byron have rung the changes on till one is almost sick of Lord Byron's own exquisite pieces to Thyrza. He writes like a man of strong sense, a warm heart, kindly affections, generous impulses, and keen sensibility. He does not seem to have teased and worried himself into an artificial excitement for the purpose of perpetrating poetry—to have screwed his courage to the sticking place; but his page appears to present a true transcript of feelings naturally awakened. Though not addicted to betting, that argument of fools, we would not hesitate to lay a wager that the tender and touching little poem, entitled the "Return," was really written in absence, and at the inspiration of the commendable feelings which it expresses. So also the blank-verse effusion, entitled "A Sketch," seems to have flowed spontaneous and warm from a father's heart, swelling with love, and fluttering with a thousand half-formed hopes and fears concerning his child. It was Waller, we believe, who declared he would blot from his works any line that did not contain some motive to virtue. This, in its literal acceptation, is praise which no poet has ever yet deserved; but the book before us, in the moral purity of all its contents, and in the ennobling end and tendency of some, is not surpassed by any similar collection of occasional pieces with which we are acquainted. In these respects, the author may truly say, that he has written "no line which, dying, he could wish to blot."

The author seems to entertain great fondness for sonnets, and, as is generally the case with men of genius, he shows much excellence in that which he is fond of. For our own part, we cannot own much admiration for this species of poetry. We have no great pleasure in seeing the muse fettered with unnecessary restrictions. It may show a good deal of ingenuity and patience to work upon a thought until it is dilated or compressed into exactly fourteen lines; and so it does to poise an egg upon its end, or solve a riddle, or devise a conundrum. But these are not proper avocations of inspired minds. There is no reason why fourteen lines are not as good a length for a poem as forty; and so, on the other hand, there is no reason why a writer should not extend his effusion to forty, particularly if he cannot crowd it into the former compass without a violence to the thoughts which he wishes to express. The absurdity is in forcing the poet into shackles which answer no good purpose. If one in writing naturally comes to the conclusion of his subject in fourteen lines, it is well; but if not, let him add other lines, until that which is within him is fully embodied and unboomed. It seldom happens, we believe, to sonnetteers, that fourteen lines are the exact measure of their minds. Either the thought falls short, and they have to crowd in unnecessary words to eke it out, or it is too large for the narrow limits, and has to be half told.

The author of Lexington has surmounted this difficulty by an ingenious device. When the proper limits were too contracted for his purpose, he has extended his idea, or his train of ideas, into another fourteen lines, and we see no reason why the series might not be continued to any length; thus making a sort of poetical chain, each link of which should be a perfect sonnet. But our main objection to this species of poem, the un-called for restraint which it imposes on the mind of a writer, is not removed by this artifice. So great an obstacle to excellence is the limitation of the sonnet, that we doubt if the English language affords a perfect example of that sort of poem; an example in which there is no diffuseness in the expression for the purpose of dilating it to the proper dimensions, no introduction of irrelevant ideas, or no obscurity from too great condensation to bring it within the required limits. The famous sonnet of Gray, which is put forward by his biographer as perfect, is stained both by tautology and plagiarism. The frequent tinkling recurrence of rhymes necessary to the legitimate sonnet is another objection; it suits not an English ear, and is not in accordance with the spirit of the English language. The majesty and sonorousness of the Spanish, or the soft melody of the Italian, may render this iteration pleasing; but in our more nervous and more various language it has quite a contrary effect.

The sonnet has one recommendation—its brevity. This, indeed, we have no doubt is the characteristic which renders it popular with both writers and readers. The argument in its favour is the same that Goldsmith urges in favour of his "Elegy on the death of a mad dog."

"And if you find it wondrous short,
It cannot hold you long."

Of the sonnets in the volume before us, it is but just to say that they are remarkably free from the most common fault—fatiguing expansion of a single idea. Several of them are crowded with meaning, which is yet clearly and fully expressed; and they bear the appearance of poems brought to a conclusion, not because they were fourteen lines long, but because the writer had fully delivered himself of the ideas which he undertook to convey. If this is the result of art, the author of Lexington has succeeded well in what is said to be the perfection of art—its concealment. We quote one specimen, but are almost afraid that the reader will find in it a refutation of a part of the objections which we have urged against this species of poem.

TIME.

I speak to time.—Byron.

What voice may speak to thee, tomb-builder, Time?
Thou wast, and art—and shalt be when the breath
That holds communion now is hushed in death.
Upon thy tablet, Earth—a page sublime—
Are chronicled the wrecks of buried years!
The cities of the lava-sepulchre—
The relics of God's wrathful minister,
Yield up their hoarded history of tears.
The pyramid, and mausoleum proud,
Attest of thee, and tell of those that were;
Of sounding names now heard as empty air,
That once were as the voice of nations loud;
The Persian and the Greek are kindred there—
Feuds are forgot when foes the narrow dwelling crowd.

The principal poem in this work, and the one from which it derives its title, is truly a fine and spirited lyric. It is not free from errors of carelessness; but its beauties are both great and numerous, and compensate for the trifling faults which a critical perusal may detect. The author begins by a happy description of the evening previous to the battle which was the commencement of the glorious war of our revolution. He pictures it as beautiful and still—as calm

"as childhood's sleep,
The seraph rest that knows not care;
Still as the slumbering summer deep
When the blue heaven lies dream-like there;"

and then, by a sudden and thrilling transition, brings the reader at once in view of the "fearful gathering" which took place on the following morning. The entire portion of the poem in which those hardy fathers of our independence are shadowed forth, is highly graphic and spirited.

There was a fearful gathering seen
On that eventful day,
And men were there who ne'er had been
The movers in a fray;
The peaceful and the silent came
With darkling brow, and flashing eyes;
And breasts, that knew not glory's flame,
Burned for the patriot-sacrifice;
No pomp of march—no proud array—
There spake no trumpet sound—
But they pressed, when the morn broke dim and gray,
Dauntless, that conflict-ground;
Sadly, as if some tie were broken—
Firmly, with eye and lip severe—
Dark glances passed, and words were spoken,
As men will look and speak in fear:
Yet coursed no coward blood
Where that lone phalanx stood
Rock-like, but spirit-wrought—
A strange unwanted feeling crept
Through every breast—all memories slept,
While passion there a vigil kept

O'er one consuming thought—
To live a fettered slave,
Or fill a freeman's grave!

In this passage the critical reader will not fail to perceive some of those errors of haste or inattention to which we object. In the line, "Rock-like, but spirit-wrought," we confess we do not exactly understand the import of the word which we have italicised. In the next line, strange and unwanted seem to us near of kin to tautology; and a little further on, the epithet consuming is erroneously applied. It was that thought or that determination which sustained the "peaceful and the silent"—it was an animating, inspiring thought, not a "consuming" one. But these are specks too minute to require comment; and yet, to own a truth, these specks, small as they are, are all that the most critical can find to complain of in this uncommonly animated and thrilling poem.

The whole management of the poem of Lexington is very fine. The contrast between the two hosts, the shock of the encounter, the apostrophe to war, (bating only that such personifications as "fiend of war" and "red havoc" are cold things) the contrasted description of the result, and the closing stanzas, are all finely conceived and finely executed. In this energetic poem there is much of the spirit of Halleck's admirable lyric, Marco Bozzaris; and it is somewhat singular that a similar blemish weakens the concluding lines of both these noble effusions. Marco Bozzaris ends with tautology and an imperfect figure, and Lexington with an error of grammar. Halleck says,

"One of the few, the immortal names
That were not born to die."

What is immortal is, of course, not born to die, and it is scarcely correct to say of names that they are born. The concluding lines of Lexington are as follows:

"Plataea's splendour is not thine,
Leuctra nor Marathon;
Yet look where lives in glory's line,
The day of Lexington!"

Leuctra and Marathon, as well as Plataea, should be in the possessive case; and we cannot with strict propriety speak of a day as living in glory's line. It may be said that these blemishes are trivial; they are nevertheless blemishes, and the reader has a right to complain of them, since the author has sufficiently shown that it is to carelessness, and not to inability to remove them, that their existence must be attributed.

"The Appeal," which follows next to Lexington, and the merits of which entitle it to "its pride of place," is another poem of which it would be injustice not to say a word in praise. With the exception of an imperfect figure in the first stanza, (Launch names upon a flood) there is scarcely a faulty line in it.

We shall proceed now to the pleasant task of copying one or two of the smaller poems of this collection as samples of their general merit. The first one which we give place to, and which we remember to have seen a year or two ago, "The son of Napoleon," recent events had well nigh rendered prophecy. "The banner of his race" does indeed "float once more," and it is not by any means certain that young Bonaparte will not yet be called to act a conspicuous part under that standard which so often waved his father to victory.

THE SON OF NAPOLEON.

Son of the mighty conqueror!
Thy course is well begun;
Thy home should be the field of war,
Where noble deeds are done:
Thou hast a heritage of fame—
Then bear thy crest on high;
And be the lustre of His name
The light that fires thine eye.

Ay, smile! thy heart may well rejoice
To mingle with the throng,
That heard red battle's earthquake voice,
And peal the victor's song:
Then lead thy sweeping squadrons forth,
The van of carnage dare;
More than thy dukedom's wealth, is worth
One hour of danger there.

The imperial bird again shall soar
Its flight near glory's sun;
The banner of thy race once more
Shall float where fields are won:
Then be thy flashing sabre drawn—
The sword thy grasp befits;
Another Jena yet shall dawn,
Another Austerlitz!

Speed, warrior-boy, in honour's race,
Nor shun the conflict's rage—
When history gives thy name a place,
Let glory light the page.
Still be that leaf of life unread,
Which tells thy destiny;
The muse may gather from the dead
Enough for prophecy!

The following are the opening lines of a poem descriptive of the achievements of the pencil. The topic is selected with taste, and treated gracefully. The whole effusion is a succession of well delineated and admirable pictures.

PAINTING.

'Tis to the pencil's magic skill
Life owes the power, almost divine,

To call back vanished forms at will,
And bid the grave its prey resign:
Affection's eye again may trace
The lineaments beloved so well;
The speaking look, the form of grace,
All on the living canvass dwell:
'Tis there the childless mother pays
Her sorrowing soul's idolatry;
There love can find, in after days,
A talisman to memory!
'Tis thine, o'er history's storied page,
To shed the halo-light of truth;
And bid the scenes of by-gone age
Still flourish in immortal youth—
The long forgotten battle-field,
With mailed men to people forth;
In bannered pride, with spear and shield,
To show the mighty ones of earth—
To shadow, from the holy book,
The images of sacred lore;
On Calvary, the dying look
That told life's agony was o'er—
The joyous hearts, and glistening eyes,
When little ones were suffered near—
The lips that bade the dead arise
To dry the widowed mother's tear:
These are the triumphs of the art,
Conceptions of the master-mind;
Time-shrouded forms to bring to start,
And wondering rapture fills mankind!

We should willingly give place to other extracts from the volume before us, but must not devote too much of our space to one subject. The reader will have seen from the passages we have quoted, that the author of Lexington makes a liberal use of compound words, sometimes with exceeding felicity, and sometimes when the expression has nothing but sound to recommend it. In turning over a few pages we have patriot-sacrifice, spirit-wrought, rust-encumbered, lightning-gleam, warrior-land, carnage-field, ocean-wave, and many others. Among the verbal inaccuracies we notice a frequent use of ye instead of you in the objective case. The word flowers is sometimes employed, contrary to the example of good writers, as a dis-syllable, as in a little poem called "A Thought," at page 57.

"Yet we find midst the gloom that our pathway o'er-shaded,
A few spots of sunshine, a few flowers unfaded."

By the way, the comparison used in the lines from which we make the foregoing quotation has a great deal of beauty:

"Memory still hoards as her richest of treasures
Some moments of rapture—some exquisite pleasures;
One hour of such bliss is a life ere it closes—
'Tis one drop of fragrance from thousands of roses."

We remember a passage in the Gour of Lord Byron, in which the opposite of this thought is dwelt on with much power, but at much greater length. It may not be out of place to cite the lines:

"'Twas but a moment that he stood,
Then fled as if by death pursued;
But in that instant o'er his soul
Winters of memory seemed to roll,
And gather in that drop of time
A life of pain, an age of crime:
O'er him who loves, or hates, or fears,
Such moments pour the grief of years."

One of the poems in this fascinating volume is addressed to Mrs. Felicia Hemans, to whom it pays a deserved and delicate compliment. In some respects there is considerable resemblance between these two writers. They are both characterised by tenderness, grace, and purity, and they both love to dwell on similar themes, and draw from them similar lessons. The author of Lexington has more spirit and fire. Mrs. Hemans shows more extensive reading and greater abundance of imagery. In this particular the writer whose work is under consideration is somewhat deficient. His classical allusions are the same that have been used a hundred and a hundred times, till they are as familiar to the reader who never looked into an ancient author, as to the ripest scholar. His natural imagery and illustrations seem rather to have been gleaned from books than from a close observation of "nature's infallible volume." But with all his faults and deficiencies—and he has many—we know not when we have risen from the perusal of a poetical work with greater pleasure. It is no disparagement to its accomplished writer to say, that we were first attracted to his production by the uncommon neatness of its exterior. We commenced our review in no very amiable mood, and designed to speak some severe and wholesome truths to the young poetsasters of this 'happy soil, where bards like mushrooms grow.' For a little while, in running over the pages, our pencil was employed only in making references to faulty passages; but we soon became attracted, in spite of ourselves, by the beauties of thought and expression, which are to be met with in every page; and we now close the volume, and our notice of it, with thanks to the author for the agreeable treat he has afforded to us. We may truly say, applying to himself his language to Mrs. Hemans:

"Not with familiar images alone,
Pictured upon the heart, thou wak'st thy chords;
Soul-stirring thoughts, and themes of lofty tone,
Like Sibyl-gleams, flash from thy burning words!
Sing on—sing on! that choir indeed is best,
Whence strains like thine come thrilling to the breast!"

THE SONGS IN ROKEBY.

Having been frequently requested to insert in this journal the words of some of the beautiful melodies in the opera of Rokeby, we have obtained permission to comply in part, and enrich the present number with the exquisite effusion called the "Sicilian Knight," which was sung by Mrs. Austin in a most bewitching manner. This shall be followed by others from the same drama, as soon as our limits will permit. The music, which is perfectly delightful, will shortly be published by Bourne.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

THE SICILIAN KNIGHT.

Gentle zephyrs of morning were stealing
Mid the dew-spangled leaves of the grove,
Where a knight, to his lady love kneeling,
Breathed anew his professions of love.
While his war-steed, impatiently neighing,
Chid the gallant young hero's delay,
And the loud bugle's clamorous braying
Called the soldier to battle away.

Though she listens in silence, her blushes
Are confessing an answering flame,
And the sparkling tear tenderly gushes,
As he whispers of danger and fame.
One embrace—a farewell—and 'tis over,
For his gallant steed bears him afar,
And she prays to the saints for her lover,
As he hies to the Palestine war.

Many months sighed the maid in seclusion,
And in dreams saw the chivalrous youth
Plunge the Saracen host in confusion,
In supporting the banner of truth.
And that banner was gilded with glory,
As it gleamed like a comet afar,
And the deeds are recorded in story,
He achieved at the Palestine war.

Yet, amid the rough battle's commotion,
Would his fancy retreat to the grove,
Where he last breathed the vows of devotion
To the fair one who sanctioned his love.
But the rude din of war is now over,
And her champion returns from afar,
While she blesses the day that her lover
Boldly hied to the Palestine war.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE EFFECTS OF A DULL SERMON,
OR THREE HOURS WITH TIME.

It was a sultry afternoon in the month of August. Clara was not, as I had hoped she would be, in her seat at church. My disappointment and a hearty dinner made me wish myself back at home; and I beheld with dismay the Rev. Dr. Spintext, so celebrated for his acuteness in drawing distinctions, and for his ability in expounding mysteries, wipe away the perspiration with his blue cotton handkerchief, as he repeated, for the third time, in a climacteric of emphasis, a text from the Apocrypha. A wicked, heathenish languor came over me; my head was dropping upon the desk in front of me, when I felt my elbow slightly touched by some person in the aisle. I turned around, and observed a significant, queer-looking old gentleman, in whose face was combined a singular appearance of youth and age. His face was wrinkled all over; yet the wrinkles were not the furrows of decay; each one was full of elasticity and life; and his eye, which was protected by long gray lashes, exhibited the buoyancy and good humour of youth. His person was enwrapped in a loose gray cloak, which effectually prevented a close scrutiny into the figure of the wearer. I had, however, no time for observation, for the old man, leaning over the pew door, immediately addressed me in a low voice, and asked,

"Will you step out with me one moment?"

I was heartily glad to get an excuse for leaving the theopolemic arena; and hoping that the congregation would think I was suddenly sent for on important business, I immediately unbuttoned the door, and followed the old man out of church. As we proceeded down the aisle, I observed that the doctor stopped, and the people stared, as if astounded at my irreverence; and all eyes were turned upon me. To my surprise not a creature looked at, or seemed even to observe the old man, who moved along as noiselessly and swiftly as a cloud. When we had at last fairly got out into the church-yard, and were alone, my new friend turned to me,

"You have no disposition, I perceive," said he, with a humorous yet courteous glance of his eye, "to stay and see that old screwdriver boring into non-essentials, and destroying bad instruments in trying to prove worse theories? Come, I have invited some friends of mine to a symposium with me to-day. You will be pleased with their acquaintance. You will go with me? Get on my back?"

This was all said sooner than I can repeat it, and the deed followed the invitation with infinite rapidity. Quicker than thought I found myself astride of the old gentleman's shoulders, and before I could recover breath, we were above the steeple of the church. As we began to ascend, my future host stretched out from underneath me a pair of huge black wings, with which he made the air to scream, as if severely wounded by the rapid strokes of their pinions. His old gray cloak floated off behind us, in the shape of a dark vapour, and was soon lost in ether. The rushing wind struck off a very genteel wig, with which his bald head had been protected; and my new friend, now stripped of his different masks and coverings, flew, confessed and proven to my astonished eyes, old father Time. There could be no illusion. There was his horrid scythe in one hand, and his hour-glass in the other, and his single gray forelock, floating in the wind; and certainly no genius nor devil could fly half so fast. Up, up we flew. What a situation for a poor sinner like me!

My health was not very good; and my friends had lately been telling me that my days were short, and that my time was passing fast away; but this was rather faster work than either my friends or myself expected to see going on. My whole life, and all the thoughts and feelings of my life, seemed centered in a single point. I thought of my many insults, neglects, and abuses of the old gentleman; and horror stupified me when I remembered that I had, several times, tried even to kill him. "It is all over with me, now!" thought I; "this autocrat of the world, this ruiner of empires, this humbler of proud and wicked hearts, is about to take his swift revenge." My limbs relaxed, my muscles seemed to melt, when the old gentleman, turning his head partly round, spoke in a sharp tone, (as if to chide me for my want of confidence,) and bade me hold on tighter. I felt re-assured by his manner.

"You much mistake my character," said he; "you have nothing to fear from me. I have read your thoughts and pity your feelings. I am not revengeful; no man ever suffered ill from acquaintance with me, unless he abused my gifts. But I can't talk and fly well at the same time. I will converse with you more at freedom when we get to our journey's end. In the mean time carry my hour-glass, for I have got more than my usual load, and can scarce grasp all."

So saying, he reached me his glass, and I felt not more comforted by his words than by the view of sundry black bottles, nicely wired and waxed, which disclosed themselves to my eyes in his act of turning. I took courage and a firm seat at once. If I had been singing the third verse of "Away with melancholy" in mine own parlour, I could not have felt more easy and comfortable. Our conversation was momentary and monosyllabic, until I observed that we were descending over a sharp ledge of the Rocky Mountains. Here we laid on our wings, and soared along more leisurely, while old Time looked about, as if uncertain where to land. Occasionally he struck with his scythe at some projecting point or eminence, when instantly the face and surface of the mountain became changed. A single touch of that magic weapon wrought wonders as we passed along. A fertile plain would in a moment occupy the place of a barren ledge of rocks; or a lake reflect back the clouds and the neighbouring scenery, where just before some bleak Atlas had reared his head. While hovering about this region we had a very unembarrassed conversation upon the subject of the future destinies of this part of the world. The prospects of the Indians—the growth of the western states—the dissolution of the Union—these, and other topics of the same character, seemed to be familiar matters with my companion; and I must say, that upon this occasion I gained some knowledge of Time's intentions, which certain great men would give all their present prospects to possess. But I need not say, perhaps, that as to my prospective information thus obtained, my mouth is sealed. At length we alighted upon a romantic lawn, which nature had made a garden after her own sweet simple fashion, where wild roses gave their sweets, and the honeysuckle encircled the untrimmed althea, receiving and breathing perfume. We directed our footsteps to a grove of venerable oaks, which spread their magnificent branches hard by.

"These oaks," said Time, "mortals would say have defied my power. But I feel pride in stating that they have been planted and nurtured and preserved by myself. Here is my favourite retreat. When sick of the abuses and unkindness of mankind, here I have often found the wished-for retreat of the philosopher of nature. How sweet retirement is, Mr. Cypress."

I was glad to find that the old gentleman was getting to be sentimental; for the seclusion and sweetness of the spot had already made me rather lack-a-daisical. But suddenly check-

"Here," said he, "I have invited my friends to meet me, I must apprise you who they are. You must not expect to find my equals; I, of course, have none. They are my dependent family connexions. Spirits, like me; all alike, and yet all different; parts of me, yet distinct, and to a certain extent independent sovereigns; not so old as I am, yet born at the same time. These are mysteries, I grant you, and you need not ask to understand them. My friends are the Hours. Not the sickly nymphs whom the mawkish fancy of the Grecian poet conjured up. No, my young friend, I know that it has been abusively said of me, more than once, that I occasionally am lazy, and borrow speed and swiftness from the smiles of woman; but I pledge you my word that these reports are only the base slanders of my enemies."

Here the old gentleman spoke with emphatic indignation, and unconsciously striking his scythe against a huge rock, upon which we were casually treading, there sprang up where the blow was given a pure, bubbling spring of water. I smothered an ill-restrained exclamation. The old gentleman took no notice of the matter.

"Pardon my feelings," he continued, "I am getting old, and perhaps peevish. My friends are twelve young gentlemen, (I say young, according to our mode of computation,) hearty, hard-working, industrious, good fellows, who have been fellow-labourers with me since I first followed my present business. You will find them agreeable if you choose to have them so, or they will be cross and ill-natured, as you see fit. They partake a great deal of the fashion of the times, and are not unfrequently a little irregular; but this, I assure you, arises from nothing but their accommodating disposition. Within that grotto, which you see upon your right, we sometimes meet, and talk over matters, leaving some one or more of the twelve on the watch; and if any thing goes wrong in our absence, we rectify the error at the next leap year, or (if that won't answer) we have a new calendar, or new style, manufactured, to set things right again. But come, let us go in."

So saying, we entered a spacious grotto, where I perceived the company had already begun to assemble. I have read of the cave in Antipharos; of the heaped up treasures, and kingly glories of the chambers of the east. I have seen in my dreams the gorgeous magnificence of the palaces of Arabian magi, but what, O Time, can compare with the spectacle which now burst upon me! Here was indeed the mnemonic of ages. Antiquity, modern years, the four quarters of the world, might here have each claimed some precious curiosity. The crowns and sceptres of monarchs, the robes and stoles of orators, the gowns of philosophers, the cimeters of heroes, were here. The riches of the world, spiritual as well as physical, here met, and were apparent to the eye of sense; and I found that my heart was affected by their contemplation, with the same emotion (though to an intenser degree) which I have felt when reading what history has said of them. Here were embalmed and encased in ethereal adamant the faith and constancy of suffering martyrs, the tears of oppressed virtue, the fame of the conqueror, the pangs of the vanquished, the pride of the usurper, the aspirations of the poet. In fine, (for I cannot attempt even the heads of a catalogue of the collection,) here were the essences of all the virtues and vices, passions and emotions, glories and disgraces, which ever entered into the hearts of men, or marked their career, embodied and rendered palpable to vision. I had no opportunity for a close examination, although my curiosity drew me very powerfully towards an immense collection of books and manuscripts, over which was written in golden characters, "Alexandrian Library." I could barely make a few reflections, when my host, taking me by the arm, whispered in my ear, "Here are treasures which the world accuses me of having destroyed; bear witness how I am belied." We had entered so noiselessly that the Hours did not at first perceive our approach. They had all arrived except Twelve O'clock, and also except Four, Five, and Six O'clock, whom Time said he had directed to stay behind, and wait upon Dr. Spintext and his congregation. We concealed ourselves behind an ancient statue, while Time hastily sketched the characters of some of the guests. There was a strong family likeness between all of them, and all wore sharp, short wings. Each had a small sickle hanging at his back, under his wings, yet all were dressed differently, and were dissimilar in their conduct.

"That tall, lean, straight young man, standing by himself," said Time, "is One O'clock. He is the most unsocial of the whole family, and feels vain of his being number one. He has to work in the heat of the day, however, and you observe his retiring shirt collar and moistened kerchief give proof of his exertions. I often attribute his apparent melancholy to fatigue and exposure to the sun. He possesses some singular and unique qualities, and we are always happy to own him for one of us. Two O'clock stands a little on his right, with his back half turned towards us. He is as fat again as One O'clock, but I assure you not the less active. He eats a great deal, and yet is always hungry and full of business. He has lately got into the brokerage profession, and has almost as much to do with exchanging money and taking up notes as Three O'clock, whom you see approaching him. I have expostulated with both of them against pursuing a profession for which they are certainly not so well qualified as Five, Six, or even Seven O'clock; but young men now-a-days, you know, will choose their professions for themselves. Seven O'clock is taking a seat there at the tomb of Therites. I'll lay you a wager now that fellow's got his hour-glass filled with an infusion of tea, instead of sand. I am afraid, sir, that young man has acquired an affection for some old maid. He's become scandalous, and makes remarks upon his absent companions; but what is most suspicious, he will not drink wine. It will do your heart good presently to see him fill his glass half full, and when his health is proposed, sip it with a simper, like nothing temporal, I assure you. That fine looking fellow, combing his whiskers, and who looks as though he had just escaped from a friseur's show-window, is Master Eight. He has many good qualities, sir, and possesses infinite versatility of talent. He has chosen, it seems, to-night to be tricked out for a ball, or an opera; and to carry his operations among the fair sex; not that he cares two-pence for them. By no means; the girls have laid a great many traps for him, particularly in the country; but they have found out, at last, that he was born too early in the evening for them. He is a literary and political character besides, and many a public meeting for charitable purposes has been held under his auspices. What I say of him now, Mr. Cypress, I may say of all of us. Though each has his own business to attend to, yet we all attend to each other's; we have to be like lawyers, 'omni laudē cumulate', a sort of jack-of-all-trades people, learned in 'omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis.' We have all manner of people to deal with. You will perceive, sir, by examining closely, that Master Eight has a pack of cards sticking out of one pocket, and a camp-meeting hymn book out of the other. Whether piety or picking pockets employs his next moment, depends mainly upon the character of the mortal he meets. Nine O'clock, whom you observe figuring about those mirrors, is nothing more nor less than Master Eight set in motion. He has not so much starch but more fire and vivacity; but when he chooses, he is insipid enough.

Here old Time gave a tremendous yawn.

"By my hour-glass," said he, "I never can look at that cross fellow with two heavy eyes, without getting sleepy."

I directed my gaze to the person who gave cause to this exclamation, and perceived a sleepy looking old fellow with a book in his hand, whom I took to be Ten O'clock. But that yawn had closed the lecture on heads. The whole company simultaneously started and rushed towards our covert. In the same breath we advanced upon the Hours, and answered all inquiries by timely congratulations and welcomes.

"My dearest friends," said the old gentleman, bowing with the grace and elegance of his most polished manner, "I am quite delighted to meet you all again. I trust I have not kept you long in suspense. At least, I hope you have made yourselves happy. Allow me to introduce to your acquaintance my friend, Mr. Cypress. He is a very respectable mortal of good family—can get tick wherever he goes, and never suffers his clock to strike the hours. He has a friendship for us, gentlemen, and wishes to make the most of us."

Here I was almost crushed by the embraces of half-a-dozen of my new associates.

"But come, my friends, to business. 'Tempus fugit', is my motto, you know. Be seated. I promised you last new-year's eve, you remember, to give you a taste of the new importation of Burgundy. I have secured the boys, and have them here."

As he said this we seated ourselves at a long table, and our host drew forth twelve veritable bottles of rich red Burgundy—burning red.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I will give you my certificate that these are the true, genuine boys; 'insignes pietate viros', as Virgil has it. But where did I get them? you ask. Why in a very good place. The same spot where I picked up my friend Ascanius here. To make a long story short, the sexton's back was turned, I caught hold of my forelock, the bottles were under my arm, I touched Mr. Cypress's elbow, and we were here in no time—fill, gentlemen, fill—bumpers—your health—I am happy to see you all, at this hour."

"My dear Tempus," said Nine O'clock, "your spirits are as ethereal as your wine. That 'iron tongue' of yours, as Will Shakespeare used to call it, is as quick and voluble as the piston of the North America."

"Like causes produce like effects," said Seven O'clock, in a low tone. "They both are set a going by steam."

"Not of the tea-kettle," said Nine.

"Nay, now, my friends, this is ill-timed for gentlemanly hours," interposed Time. "I hold that it is quite enough for us to be abused by our enemies; let us not suffer our keen wits to wage war either upon each other's spiritualities or temporalities. I, for my part, am sober and pious as the world goes, yet, although I have kept pace with the improvements of different ages, and have accommodated myself to the different fashions of the day, yet I find that my enemies are universal. In attempting to please all, I have pleased none. Mankind, I find, have been determined to find fault with me ever since I had any thing to do with them. In every age I have been accused of being worse than ever I had been before, and of getting worse and worse every day. Is there a term of obloquy with which I have not been visited? Am I not reproached by all manner of cunningly devised phrases of the poets, and by down-right Billingsgate of the mob? Yes, gentlemen, and it is so with us all. We are, in the same breath, accounted swift and tedious, long and short, certain and unknown. 'Tempora mutantur', says the classic; 'the times are out of joint,' cries the poet; 'hard times, bad times, poor times, miserable times,' ejaculate the canaille. What are we not in the esteem and on the foul tongues of our malicious slanderers? Yet, we bring them daily good gifts, and many of them, particularly the political part of the world, are content to live and be waiters upon us. I sometimes seriously think of getting rid of the connexion; but the moment that I hint of an intention to move into another country, all the world weeps, and goes distracted at the thought. However, we must 'grin and bear it,' my friends, and in the mean time, here's to better times."

Here I ventured to remark, on the behalf of some of my earthly friends, that I thought the judgment of Time, although in general impartial and controlling, to be in this instance prejudiced and too indiscriminate. I insisted that many mortals loved Time, and the things of Time, above all things; and that for this very affection they suffered martyrdom every day. I referred to the cases of newly married lovers, and people about to be hanged; and was proceeding in my vindication with some zeal, when I was rather abruptly called to order by two or three of the company for "making a speech against time," as they called it, and was reminded that I was not in congress. As I was attempting an explanation, we were interrupted by the approaching sound of some bacchanalian ditty outside the grotto.

"Twelve O'clock has not been at his studies to-night, I opine," said Seven O'clock. "When he arrives it is generally time for decent people to go home."

By these characteristic remarks I was prepared to see Master Twelve, who now staggered into the room, bowing and bending with the most ludicrous affectation of dignified politeness, and after divers circumgyrations, took his seat by One O'clock. The appearance and conduct of this personage were rather disordered. His face was pale and haggard—his eye dead-drunk. His clothes were cut after the newest pattern of modern grace, but exhibited unequivocal symptoms of having been in a recent fray. A watchman's broken lantern supplied the place of his hour-glass, and the bladeless handle of his sickle, suspended from his neck, performed in its wearer's hand the function of a quizzing-glass. These shocking evidences of dissipation drew down upon the new comer the sharp rebukes of old Time. His reproofs, however, were 'more in sorrow than in anger,' and the old gentleman turning to me, assured me that these aberrations from the right road were only seldom, and always the unfortunate result of unavoidable circumstances.

"I will show you that young man," said he, "night after night dying his locks gray in the smoky fumes of his lamp, and wasting his pale cheek over his midnight studies to benefit the world. But hark what he has to say for himself."

I turned my head towards the culprit guest, and observed that he was trying to steady himself by leaning upon One and Two O'clock, who to my surprise now began to put on entirely different characters.

"Gentlemen," he at last stammered out, "I ask to be forgiven—I have been in bad company, and have had no Burgundy to drink. But you know it's my nature to be always late—but better late than never. Shall I tell you what glorious mortals have been with me to night? Well, they were—they were good fellows—they said I was 'the very witching time of night,' and when I was going, they told me if I couldn't stay I must send my little brother One. Father Chronos, your blessing—gentlemen, my love to you. I drink the hours, all the hours, and nothing but the hours."

Here the crazy spirit, observing me, broke through all restraint, and pitching his body in a straight direction towards me, extended both arms for an embrace. I hastily sought to avoid him by getting under the table, but in the attempt I struck my head with a cruel violence against its sharp corner. The blow for a moment stunned me. At last I recovered, and raising my head, found that I was back in church. The gloom of evening was gathering about me; the pulpit and pews were vacant, and the sexton coming up, told me he wanted to close the doors.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE LATIN AND THE GREEK LANGUAGES.

So sensible were the Romans of the influence of language over national manners, that it was their most serious care to extend, with the progress of their arms, the use of the Latin tongue. The French, for nearly two centuries past, have adopted and carried into practice the same principle. The French is now the general language of diplomacy, and of the several courts of Europe.

The ancient dialects of Italy, the Sabine, the Etruscan, and the Venetian, sunk into oblivion; but in the provinces, the east was less docile than the west to the voice of its victorious preceptors.

This obvious difference marked the two portions of the Roman empire, with a distinction of colours, which, though it was in some degree concealed during the meridian splendour of prosperity, became gradually more visible as the shades of night descended upon the Roman world.

The western countries were civilized by the same hands which subdued them. As soon as the Barbarians were reconciled to obedience, their minds were opened to any new impressions of knowledge and politeness.

The language of Virgil and Cicero, though with some inevitable mixture of corruption, was so universally adopted in Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Pannonia, that the faint traces of the Punic or Celtic idioms were preserved only in the mountains, or among the peasants. Apulcius and Augustin will answer for Africa; Strabo for Spain and Gaul; Tacitus, in the life of Agricola, for Britain; and Vellius Paterculus, for Pannonia. To them may be added the language of the Inscriptions.

The Celtic was preserved in the mountains of Wales, Cornwall, and Armorica. It may be observed that Apulcius reproaches an African youth, who lived among the populace, with the use of the Punic; whilst he had almost forgotten Greek, and neither could nor would speak Latin. The greater part of St. Austin's congregations were strangers to the Punic.

Education and study insensibly inspired the natives of those countries conquered by the Romans with the sentiments of that people; Italy gave fashions, as well as laws, to her Latin provincials. They solicited with more ardour, and obtained with more facility, the freedom and honours of the state; supported the national dignity in letters and in arms; and, at length, in the person of Trajan, produced an emperor whom the Scipios would not have disowned for their countryman. Spain alone produced Columella, the Senecas, Lucan, Martial, and Quintilian.

The situation of the Greeks was very different from that of the Barbarians. The former had been long since civilized and corrupted. They had too much taste to relinquish their language, and too much vanity to adopt any foreign institutions. Still preserving the prejudices after they had lost the virtues of their ancestors, they affected to despise the unpolished manners of their Roman conquerors, whilst they were compelled to respect their superior wisdom and power.

There is not, it is believed, from Dionysius to Lihanius, a single Greek critic who mentions Virgil or Horace. They seem ignorant that the Romans had any good writers.

The influence of the Grecian language and sentiments was not confined to the narrow limits of that once celebrated country. Their empire, by the progress of colonies and conquests, had been diffused from the Adriatic to the Euphrates and the Nile.

Asia was covered with Greek cities, and the long reign of the Macedonian kings had introduced a silent revolution into Syria and Egypt. In their pompous courts those princes united the elegance of Athens with the luxury of the East; and the example of the court was imitated, at an humble distance, by the higher ranks of their subjects. Such was the general division of the Roman empire into the Latin and Greek languages.

To these may be added a third distinction for the body of the natives in Syria, and especially in Egypt. The use of their ancient dialects, by secluding them from the commerce of mankind, checked the improvements of those barbarians. The glothful effeminacy of the former, exposed them to the contempt—the sullen ferociousness of the latter, excited the aversion of the conquerors. Those nations had submitted to the Roman power, but they seldom desired or deserved the freedom of the city; and it was remarked, that more than two hundred and thirty years elapsed after the ruin of the Ptolemies, before an Egyptian was admitted into the senate.

It is a just though trite observation, that victorious Rome was herself subdued by the arts of Greece. Those immortal writers, who still command the admiration of modern Europe, soon became the favourite objects of study and imitation in the western provinces.

The elegant amusements of the Romans were not, however, suffered to interfere with their sound maxims of policy. Whilst they acknowledged the charms of the Greeks, they asserted the dignity of the Latin tongue, and the exclusive use of the latter was inflexibly maintained in the administration of civil as well as military government. The emperor Claudius disfranchised an eminent Grecian for not understanding Latin.

The two languages exercised at the same time their separate jurisdiction throughout the empire; the former, as the natural idiom of science; the latter, as the dialect of public transactions. Those who united letters with business were equally conversant with both; and it was almost impossible, in any province, to find a Roman subject, of a liberal education, who was at once a stranger to Greek and Latin. Times.

MISS M'CREA.

All our readers are familiar with the melancholy story of this young lady, as related in the history of our revolution. To this day her untimely and cruel fate is the subject of universal sympathy. Travellers visit the scene of her sufferings, and drop upon her grave the memorials of their tears. Her unhappy history has not, however, been fully and truly recorded. It is related of her, if our memory serves us, that she was betrothed to a British officer, at the time when Burgoyne's force, to which he was attached, had reached, in their daring expedition, the neighbourhood of Saratoga. The country was full of armed men, both of the British and American armies, and every day witnessed scenes of carnage and combat between their advanced posts and skirmishers. The lover of the lady was stationed at Fort Edward, and becoming apprehensive of her safety, sent a party of Indians to her residence, Sandy-hill, only four miles distant, to convey her safely to the fort, promising to them a reward on their return. Some hours having elapsed, he became impatient and alarmed at the delay, and dispatched another party of Indians, on the same errand, with a similar promise of reward. The former had succeeded in escorting her and her companion safely to a spring, under a pine tree, midway between Sandy-hill and the fort, where they met the second party. A contention, according to the story, arose between the two parties, for the honour and reward of conducting her to the fort, and the dispute becoming angry, was settled by putting her to death, each party throwing their tomahawks at her head, as she stood near the pine tree. It has even been pretended that the marks of the tomahawks were still to be seen in the tree. This account, as we learn from a friend, who recently visited the spot, is chiefly fabulous, and to the Indians is extremely unjust. But one party of Indians was sent for the lady, and they had conducted her on horseback to the spring under the pine, where they halted. At this moment a skirmish was going on in the neighbourhood, and Miss M'Crea received a rifle ball in her side, fired at the party by some one of the American troops. She was mortally wounded, and the Indians, being obliged to retreat hastily, and finding her an impediment to their progress, tomahawked her, and placed her under the tree. The Americans came up in a few minutes, and among them was Mr. Baker, who is still living at Sandy-hill, and who formerly knew Miss M'Crea. He states that Miss M'Crea was breathing when he came up, and the gun-shot wound in her side was mortal. She was buried under the tree, together with a young American lieutenant, who was shot in the skirmish. The female attendant of Miss M'Crea is also still living at Sandy-hill, and her statements accord with this. Miss Janet M'Crea is represented as having been very beautiful. According to Mr. Baker and the attendant referred to, she was about nineteen years of age, tall, and well formed, with auburn hair, blue eyes, and a fresh complexion, slightly freckled. About three years ago her remains were disinterred, and carried in funeral procession by the maidens of the neighbouring country to Fort Edward, where they were buried, and a monument erected over the spot. The pine tree is still a striking object, from its age and immense size, but the spring, which it formerly designated, is dried up.

A CUNNING SCOTCHMAN.

Mr. Gordon, the author of Personal Memoirs, came to London in a Scotch smack. The following is highly dramatic, and almost reminds us of the graphic sketches in the Waverley novels. "The crowded population of the environs of London, and the approach to it by Westminster, struck me with astonishment; though fifty years ago, there were but few houses in St. George's fields, and the number of stage coaches and private coaches was not a tenth of what it is now. I had a letter to a Scotch grocer in Piccadilly, from a relation at Aberdeen, and I thought it would be a prudent measure to deliver my credentials to the vender of figs. On my presenting my letter, he gave me a great many bows, and when he had perused it, he begged me to walk into a small dark room behind his shop. 'Weel,' said my friend, in a most perfect Buchan accent, 'what can I do for ye, captain?—(this was speedy promotion.) My cousin tells me he kens your family—I have several of your name my customers.' 'I want,' I replied, 'a lodging for a day or two, before I go to visit a relation at Enfield.'—'An' what may his name be, if you please? I serve twa families there.' When I satisfied him, and added that he was master of an academy, and had three-score of boarders, his eyes glistened, and he rejoined, 'I hae a relation by the mither's side o' the name of Morrison; may be ye are of the same kin? at any rate, I would be greatly obliged if you wud mention to your uncle that I sell tea and sugar, and a' kind o' groceries as cheap as ony man within the city of London or Westminster, and will be obliged to you to tak' a caird o' my shop—he'll find it to his advantage to deal wi' me. I'm sorry I canna gie ye a bed myself, for I ha' unluckily let my first stage, and am rather hampered for room, for I ha' a sick mither; but I will introduce you to an honest man, and vary ceeril; he lives in Suffolk street, near Charing-cross—but as ye dinna ken Lunnun, I'll send my shop-boy to show you the road; it's No. 6. The man's name is Mitchell, and he keeps a tailor's shop—you'll be wanting new claihs, and you canna do better than get fra him—he's an honest man.' I had tact enough to perceive that Mr. Mackey, from his discourse, seemed to have his own and his friend's interest at heart more than mine; nevertheless, I thanked him for his kindness, and would accept of his offer of giving me a few lines to the tailor, and I would get into a hackney-coach, and save him the trouble of sending his lad with me. 'Na, na,' replied he, 'that will cost ye a shilling—keep your siller in your pouch—ye'll ha' occasion for it, I see warrant. Suffolk-street is nae a quarter of a mile off.' I told him that I had left my baggage in the smack, and that I had nothing to carry but what was on my back. Mr. Ogilvie, a gentleman whose acquaintance I had formed on the passage, and had brought me to town, at this moment passed in his carriage and spoke to me. 'He seems a ceevil-like gentleman,' rejoined the grocer; 'what's his trade?' 'I be-jieve,' said I, 'he is a West-India merchant.' 'Gin ye hae ony interest with him,' continued Mr. Mackey, 'I wish ye would speak a guid word for me. I wud serve him wi' his ain commodities, and may be buy from him.' But on my saying that I had never seen or heard of him till yesterday, he gave up the chase as hopeless. The introductory not being written, my worthy friend presented me with a dozen of figs in a paper, saying, 'I dare say ye have a sweet tooth in your head—trie thae figs, they are very frash, and let your uncle taste ane or twa o' them—they are particularly guid for the bairns, and when you come back frae Enfield, call in and tak your breakfast—I ha' guid honey, and noo and then a yellow haddock that the skippers wha deal wi' me bring up.' On promising that I would see him again, we shook hands and parted, his last words being, 'See what ye can do with your uncle for me.'"

LOCAL ATTACHMENTS.

The thirty-fifth number of Silliman's Journal of Science, in an article under the head of "Architecture of the United States," has the following remarks:

"Place in a village a handsome public monument, or pillar, or church, and I do not hesitate to say that, all other things being equal, those villagers will be bound more to one another, and to their village, than those of another. Place by another a group of trees, with a fountain playing in the midst; have beneath them tasteful seats, and make it a place to which experienced age and prattling infancy will go for company or amusements; a spot where the villagers will assemble in the evening for cheerful conversation, and I venture to say that these people will love their homes more, and think less of changing; will improve them more; that they will be wiser, that their taverns will be less frequented, and that every good feeling will more prevail among them, than would have been the case without. Place in a town or city a spot with spreading trees, and pleasant walks between, a spot which would serve as an agreeable promenade, and the feelings of that people will flow in a kinder and smoother channel; there will be more happiness than there would have been. It is a delightful amusement to saunter along the French promenade about sunset, and observe the happy groups of all ages that throng them; to watch the rapid sale of bouquets, at the platforms which line the sides, (flowers only are admitted there.) As an American looks at the cheerful scene, he must think with pain of his own cities, where every thing seems calculated for dull labour, or lynx-eyed gain. It is doubtless owing, in some degree, to the provision of such places in foreign countries that their natives resort less to taverns for amusement than with us, and that intoxication consequently is less frequently seen.

"The French have their Boulevards, the Spaniards their Prado, the Italian their Corso; all of these have their public gardens, and we have our tipling shops, the bane and disgrace of our land, and shall have them, I fear, till we provide more innocent places of resort. All attempts to check this current of feeling are vain; the stream must flow, and if we give it a channel, will refresh and beautify the land it would otherwise have desolated and destroyed."

So much for the effect on the morals of a people. The reaction on the mind is also of very great consequence. A flourishing state of architecture, it is true, implies a good degree of previous mental culture; but no cause, perhaps, operates with more quickness, certainty, and power, in refining the mind, thus prepared, than this. It is placing objects of taste before the public, which they cannot help seeing, about which they must converse, whose beauties they must analyze; on which, in short, all will turn critics, and the sure consequence will be a refinement of taste, an elevation of mental character, which will carry itself into all the concerns of life. The principle of accommodation is one of the most powerful and useful in our nature. Place a civilized man among savages, and his thoughts, feelings, and habits will, before many years, be strongly assimilated to those of the savage; place a savage in refined society, and his character will in a short time undergo a change. Place a number of tasteful public edifices in a town, and the private buildings of that town will become classic and tasteful; build private edifices on the principles of good taste, and I do not hesitate to say, that their interior will correspond—that in cleanliness, good order, regularity of the system within, there will be a sure and rapid improvement, re-acting strongly on the mind, as well as on the moral character of the occupants.

MRS. DICKINSON.

Mrs. Eleanor Dickinson (a member of the society of friends) has just published "The Mameluke," a poem, with several miscellaneous pieces, which evince very considerable poetical talent. The following passage is from the first canto:

The moon has left her starry throne;
Her gay attendants, one by one,
Have faded from yon blue concave,
Or dipped their torches in the wave.
Dim night, wrapped in her sable vest,
Has rolled her chariot to the west.
The eastern glows; a rosy streak
The blushing tints of morn bespeak.
Bright floods of glory, soft unfold
Heaven's postern; rolling liquid gold
Before his radiant disk, the sun
Reclines on ocean as a throne;
And views around reflected rise,
The splendid radiance of the skies:
Now soars, with light refulgent crowned,
And spreads his golden sceptre round.

THE TRI-COLOUR.

Many inquiries have been made of late as to the true origin of the tri-coloured flag, and of what it is emblematical. We find the following explanation in a paper before us:—Before the revolution the city of Paris had colours of its own—red and blue—the white being the colour of the king and his army. After the taking of the Bastille, the armed bourgeois of the city having taken the name of the National Guard, added the white to the two previous colours of Paris, for the purpose of indicating that the king was no longer a separate estate, and that his power had passed into the hands of the people.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

LOCOMOTIVE CUTTING AND EXCAVATING MACHINE.—MR. G. Palmer of the city of Worcester, has been engaged upwards of ten years in bringing this extraordinary engine to its present state of perfection, and for which his late majesty was pleased to grant him letters patent on the eighth of June last. This engine operates by steam, and is particularly adapted for large national undertakings, such as ship canals, levelling hills, in forming new lines of roads, railways, &c. The construction of this engine is such that on the most trying soil it will cut at least a ton per minute, and on more favourable soil it will excavate up to three tons per minute, cutting at a single blow six feet wide and three feet deep, delivering the soil into carts, or on either side of the excavation to form a bank. When cutting gravel for road-making, it will separate the stones from the earth with like rapidity. Its operation might be still further extended, but the impossibility of vehicles succeeding each other in due time to move off the soil will ever prevent its being carried to the extent of its possible operations.

Previous to seeing this engine, most persons have conceived it to be a ponderous piece of machinery. It is not so; its power not being derived from great weight and dimensions, but from the peculiarity of its construction, which is, at once, simple, ingenious, and new; and from this combination is obtained its extraordinary powers of execution.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK AND BOWERY THEATRES.

We attended the Park theatre on the first evening of Mrs. Austin's engagement, and have been attracted there nightly on her ensuing performances. The band and chorus have both received considerable additions and changes. The orchestra has now an accession in number, and musters four first violins, all strong players and able musicians. Mr. Pons has been removed to the bassoon, on which he is an admirable artist. Chioffi's trombone is as prominent as usual. Mr. Kyle, jun. the son of the present director of music at West-point, is engaged as flute player, and is evidently a young man of promise. The clarionets are in the hands of Mr. Roca and a brother-in-law, we understand, of Mr. Schott, the well-known professor of that instrument. The horns are played by the same persons as last season, Messrs. Nida and Brown, and they cannot be exceeded in the United States for orchestral business. The band, consequently, is now perfectly efficient, and that department can do justice to all compositions of the most difficult description which may come before them. It may be objected by those who wish to cavil that a better trumpet player, or better horn, an equal bassoon, a better flute, and a better clarinet, may be found in America than the professors of those instruments at the Park; for playing concertos, perhaps, this may be the fact; but it by no means follows that concerto players are equal to orchestral business, nor does excellence on particular instruments command general effect; on the contrary, in some instances it proves detrimental to it. To cite a case to support our position, compare the band of the Italian opera at Paris with that in London; the professors of the latter individually stand unrivalled, and vastly superior to the French on their separate instruments; but there is a subdued union of sound and a simultaneous expression belonging to the Parisian band to which that in London must yield; and this quality is attributable to the Park band beyond any other American orchestra. We have omitted to add that Davis, who served his apprenticeship under the severe Garcia, and Deluce, the leader of the operas then and since, retain their relative situations of chef d'orchestre and contra basso. For the chorus among the women an alteration has taken place; and we are happy to notice the return of the stentorian tall-man, Pearson, to the head of the male department. For the principals in opera, Mrs. Austin is assisted by Mrs. Blake, vice Mrs. Sharpe; and the business hitherto allotted to Mrs. Hackett is divided between Mrs. Wallack and Mrs. Durie. Richings and Jones also share the singing business; the acting parts falling to the former, the difficult vocal parts to the latter. In making this arrangement we cannot but applaud the system of the worthy manager; he goes into the field, and throwing down his gauntlet, challenges competition. He is aware that a number of vocalists may be congregated, but a half operatic establishment is not the vehicle to display their talents. You may hear two or three songs sung, but an opera you do not witness except at the Park theatre, where the company are familiar with that species of the drama. He retains the best stock singer he can find, a musician who understands his business, and he engages a prima donna, consulting in her selection that which he conceives to be the taste of the town. For the buffo department he cannot be exceeded in Placide, assisted by Hilson and Barnes. Let any person witness the Tempest, and examine the cast; let him see John of Paris; let him be present at a representation of the Caliph of Bagdad, and then let him confess, that in addition to the first talent on this side of the Atlantic, that he has witnessed the most complete operatic establishment existing, and one which is justly the boast of the city. Let other theatres go to what expense they please, the cost which Mr. Simpson incurs in giving to the public an intrinsically good entertainment, supported by the most approved talent, not only tends to give character to the drama, but must eventually repay him as correct musical taste advances and quackery diminishes.

The opera of Cinderella has been announced as in preparation for a length of time. We are given to understand that it is to be got up with the greatest splendour. The music is from Rossini's Cenerentola, with selections from his other works. Cinderella will be acted by Mrs. Austin, and there is a very fine buffo character for Placide, and a comic part for Barnes. Hilson also is included in the cast as a lively valet. The story of Cinderella is well known to every body; many have seen Rossini's Cenerentola, and the French Cendrillon. The opera has the advantage of all the wonders of the original tale: pumpkins become coaches, rats footmen, &c. and nothing is left undone to please both eye and ear. We have no doubt that it will prove very attractive, and repay the manager for labour and expense.

Since writing the above we attended the Bowery theatre, for the first time this season, and are sorry to commence our strictures on that establishment with finding fault. If the performances had been of the first order, we should have suppressed part of the foregoing; but such was not the case. Madame Feron and Mrs. Knight, in the "Marriage of Figaro," were the magnets which attracted us thither. We found Mr. Segura, the first violin player in America, at the head of a very meagre band; Mr. Cuddy, whose talents are undoubted, it is true, assisted; and Mr. Knight sat at a piano-forte, for what purpose we do not exactly understand; but Mr. Segura and Mr. Cuddy cannot make a weak band "do the work" of a strong one; and the clarionets, horns, bassoon, and trombone positively were of the worst description; drums and trumpets there were none. The effective music of "Even as the sun," was cut up in a wretched manner by numerous mistakes. Madame Feron gave her song, called the "Arab Steed," with much spirit; her execution of rapid divisions is very brilliant. Our friend C. termed the passages in which she excels "tours de force;" and we think her beauties of style are comprised in that term. We would rather see Mrs. Knight in female attire than in the very ungraceful costume which she selected for the page, although she sang well and acted prettily. By the by, why did she not play the Countess, which is considered the part of a prima donna, and by some selected in preference to that of Susanna? Mrs. Dickons and Miss Stephens performed the two characters, as did Miss Stephens and Miss Tree. Mr. Plumer, an improving singer, should have acted Fiorello, and Mr. Hamblin the Count.

The chorus of the first act was very deficient, although Madame Feron exerted herself to the utmost to lead it. The finale to the second act was extremely imperfect; and the Antonio of Holland, and the Figaro of Roberts, were not beyond mediocrity. A very odd man came on as Fiorello, and Basil resolutely persisted in singing his solo a bar behind the band, which had a curious effect. Most of the audience seemed to feel that opera at the Bowery is out of its element; and we sincerely believe, that it would be equally conducive to the interests of the manager of that establishment and the two ladies, if their services were transferred to the Park.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The North American Review for October, 1830.—The punctuality with which this quarterly journal is issued, furnishes strong and indisputable evidence of its popularity.—Unless value were attached to the appearance of a critical publication, there would be little eagerness or curiosity manifested by the public for the possession of its opinions, and less readiness or industry on the part of its publishers and proprietors. The North American Review does not, however, require, at the present day, any eulogium upon its merits; they are too well known and appreciated. The last number furnishes a variety of interesting articles to the scholar, the student, and the mere man of letters. The remarks on Bishop Doane's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry is replete with lofty sentiment and chaste diction, and will bear comparison, both for learned research and masterly expression, with the prime articles in the best foreign reviews. A comprehensive view of the magnificent wealth stored up in the ample domains of scriptural classics, is presented to the reader in the most captivating forms, calculated to awaken literary investigation and diffuse liberal feelings. The notice of the American Annual Register is by no means happy. It gives little or no insight into the contents of the volume professed to be reviewed—is evidently imbued with some sympathetic party feelings for the author, yet lectures him indirectly and unintelligibly as to certain defects in his work. The style in which it is drawn up is altogether unworthy of the character of the oldest periodical in the United States. It would have reflected little credit on some of our better conducted newspapers. How came it to be made a leading article? The ideas thrown out on painting, and on the best specimens of the art, both at home and abroad, strike us as peculiarly worthy the attention of students of the fine arts. The long political treatises and analyses will attract considerable notice—they are characterized by sound doctrine and correct principle. Yet do we fear that our northern trimesterian may render itself as obnoxious to the charge of local jealousy as the southern is acknowledged to be, despite its talent and boasted liberality, by some of its warmest yet not over-zealous admirers.

Tales and Sketches, by a Cosmopolite.—This work, announced by us some time since as being in preparation, and from which an extract was made in our columns, has just issued from the press of Mr. E. Bliss, of this city. It comprises ten distinct articles. There is much variety of character and incident in the parts we have read, and many of the scenes are exceedingly well described. One of the sketches, in blank verse, is of a dramatic character, and offers a favourable specimen of the writer's powers in that difficult branch of composition. New books, and re-publications from the English press, throng upon us so fast that we have scarcely time to give each a perusal as it appears. In the present instance, we have little more than glanced at the contents of the work under notice, but shall at some future day recur to it, for the purpose of affording our readers a further "taste of its quality."

Sandford and Merton.—It is truly asserted in the preface to the new edition of this tale, just published, that "the history of Sandford and Merton, written fifty years ago, is at this moment the most interesting and edifying of children's books; highly entertaining, exhibiting the best examples, inculcating a virtuous conduct, the high use of reason, just moral principles, and useful truth in regard to physical nature, all in the most intelligible and attractive style." The American editor places a just confidence in himself when he asserts that he serves the true interests of education by giving this book its most possible cheap form. This object he has effected by omitting a great deal of unnecessary matter, and much also that was above the comprehension of the juvenile understanding. How far he has succeeded, the voice of the public long since decided. The first edition has been for some time out of print, and the demand for the present is universal.

Woodworth's Melodies.—These poems will be published about the beginning of November. Since the appearance of the first edition, in 1827, the author has produced many new pieces of superior beauty, which are now added to the former selection. Independent of the original frontispiece and vignette title-page, the present volume will be embellished with three copperplate engravings, illustrative of the same number of songs. We trust that the public in general, and the readers of this journal in particular, will not be backward in patronizing a writer who has so frequently contributed to their entertainment. Subscriptions received at this office.

The Denounced.—Whoever has read the "Tales by the O'Hara Family," will, at the very mention of the name, recall the thrilling incidents, the picturesque scenery, and the harrowing, yet faithful representations of human life and character, which awaken with singular and irresistible power the most lively emotions of interest and curiosity. It is impossible that the author of such a production can put forth any thing that shall fail of effect, and foreign criticism has already pronounced a favourable judgment upon the present attempt. Our own opinion is as yet unformed respecting its merits—but our anticipations are highly excited, and, we will venture for once to prophecy, will not be disappointed.

Mr. C. Kean.—This distinguished actor and amiable young gentleman, has just completed a brilliant engagement at Philadelphia. He will return to this city about the tenth of next month. We promise him a most enthusiastic reception.

SHE NEVER BLAMED HIM, NEVER!

ANDANTINO.

She ne-ver blamed him, ne-ver, But re-ceived him when he came, With a wel-come kind as e-ver, And she tried to look the same: But vain-ly

she dis-sem-bled, For when-e'er she tried to smile, A tear un-bid-den trem-bled In her blue eye all the while.

2d Verse—She knew that she was dying,
And she dreaded not her doom,
She never thought of sighing,
O'er her beauty's blighted bloom;
She knew her cheek was alter'd,
And she knew her eye was dim.

But her sweet voice only falter'd,
When she spoke of losing him.
3d Verse—'Tis true that he had lured her
From the isle where she was born;
'Tis true he had inur'd her
To the cold world's bitter scorn;

But yet she never blamed him,
For the anguish she had known,
And tho' she seldom named him,
She thought of him alone.
4th Verse—She sigh'd when he caress'd her,
For she knew that they must part,

She spoke not when he press'd her
To his young and panting heart;
The banners waved around her,
And she heard the bugle's sound,
They pass'd—and strangers found her
Cold and lifeless on the ground.

Varieties.

FEMALE HEROISM.—A great many women took an active part in the combats in Paris, and several distinguished themselves by feats of extraordinary courage. A young and pretty girl, nineteen years of age, who, during the three days, appeared in front of the combatants armed with a musket, acquired such an ascendancy over the citizens, that they regarded her almost as their captain. Intrepid on the field of battle, she lavished her kind attentions on the wounded when the firing had ceased. So much heroism, devotion, and humanity, excited the enthusiasm of all who witnessed it. On the evening of the third day this young girl was borne in triumph through the streets of Paris. A great crowd accompanied her, shouting cries of joy. In one hand she held a sword, and in the other the tri-coloured flag. Lighted torches shed a brilliancy on this gay cortège.

MILITARY DUTY.—A Yankee being warned to do military duty, requested the captain to excuse him. The officer told him that he might state the case to the company, and if they would vote in the affirmative, he should be excused. He accordingly made the following address:—"Fellow-soldiers, I am rather hard of hearing, and don't always understand the word of command. Besides, at the age of sixteen I was drafted to go into the army; but my father went in my room, and was killed, and never got home. Now, if I had gone myself, and got killed, I should have got clear of military duty to all eternity." He was excused by acclamation.

THE VISCOUNT D'ARLINCOURT.—The Viscount d'Arlincourt is scarcely forty years of age. He is accustomed to receive those who visit him with that dignified affability which characterizes one who prides himself on his talents more than his rank. His address is fascinating, and he is considered as one of the most finished gentlemen in France. The ladies in particular admire his tall and elegant figure, and his fine black eyes, the expression of which is full of talent, mingled with a degree of melancholy sensibility. There are few such happy families as that of the Viscount d'Arlincourt: his home is a perfect clysium. The viscountess is revered by all who know her; her society is delightful to all who are permitted to partake of it; and her two daughters are brought up in the most careful manner, and are highly accomplished; their talents and personal charms are heightened by the religious instructions they have received.

MADAME DE GENLIS.—Madame de Genlis died recently in France at the advanced age of eighty. This lady was probably possessed of as great talent for the correct education of youth as any of her contemporaries of either sex. Her "Theatre of Education" has long been a model for dramatic didactic composition, being within the comprehension of the most youthful intellect, and stored with precepts of the purest morality and usefulness. It is no small tribute to her merit to state, that she was governess over the early years both of the ex-king of France, Charles X, and of the present king of the French, Louis Philippe; she may be termed the female Warwick of her time—"the setter up and puller down of kings."

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.—These societies are virtually supported by law in Peru. Its president, General Gamara, has published a decree in accordance with an act of the constituent congress, prohibiting the importation of liquors after the present year. All naval and merchant vessels attached to the country are forbidden to consume them, and even their sale is prohibited under the penalty of confiscation. This step is rather more ultra, (as politicians would say) but we hope may be as efficacious as the milder means used in our own country.

Guard yourself against your enemies: guard yourself doubly against your friends.

LINES ON AN OLD PICTURE

OF A MONKISH STUDENT OF THE MIDDLE AGES,
BY IANTRE.

GRAVE old student, oft ere now
I've gazed upon thy placid brow,
And little thought thou wouldst have power
To cheer full many a languid hour;
Yet now, while on my couch I rest,
With pain and weariness oppress,
Thy calm still brow above me bends,
And seems like some familiar friend's.

Grave old student, time has laid
A gentle hand upon thy head;
That brow and form still wear the trace
Of manly beauty, early grace:
Thy hand is mark'd by time's dark stain,
And swollen is each blue, starting vein,
Yet still a trace of beauty lingers
Amid those well turn'd slender fingers;
That face, just lifted from the page,
Though mark'd by the deep lines of age,
And furrow'd, it may be with cares,
Still intellect's high beauty wears.

Grave old student, has thy mind
New and precious truths divined?
Or art thou still pondering o'er
Knowledge oft-times conn'd before?
Pure and hallow'd thought lies hid
Neath thy dark eye's downcast lid;
Thou art one whom time has found
No mere cumberer of the ground.

Grave old student, while I gaze
Fancy brings back early days,
When learning, hid in cloister'd nook,
Beneath the stole conceal'd her book;
But in thy time, although she wore
The trappings still of monkish lore,
She dared to throw the cowl aside,
And show unveil'd her brow of pride.

Grave old student, when the trace
Of years is left upon my face,
When round my furrow'd temples wave
The snowy blossoms of the grave,
Fain would I hope my changeful brow
May then be calm as thine is now;
But vain such hope—life's wintry years
Seal not the source of woman's tears.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE IMPORTANCE OF A MOMENT.

"THE moments are precious, Isabella," urged Deringcourt, to the beautiful and timid girl, whose ingenuous countenance wore the mingled expression of tenderness and doubt—when, after a long and agitating interview, he rose to leave her. "The moments are precious! let me have your decision now. You cannot recall the sweet confession you have just made; why then sacrifice to idle ceremony the happiness of both our lives?"

"It will seem so like an elopement," murmured Isabella, deeply agitated.

"Impossible," replied her lover. "We will hasten to your father immediately after our marriage. You are certain of his forgiveness; and who will dare to censure or question what he approves?"

"I wish for his presence," said Isabella, more firmly.

"But circumstances are imperious. We must separate, unless you consent to accompany me. The period of my absence is uncertain; and without I am assured of your love, I shall have no wish to return. Any delay will be highly ruinous to my prospects. One word then: are you mine, or must we part?"

"Give me one moment for reflection," faltered Isabella.

Deringcourt bit his lip in vexation; for he, in common with many others, believed, that when a woman loves, she never reflects.

"I believed her too young and too fond to reflect," thought he, as he gazed on the lovely form before him, and tried to read in her beautiful downcast eyes the decision he began to fear. "Your moments are long ones," he said, in a tone of reproachful tenderness.

That tone went to the heart of Isabella, and the promise trembled on her lip, when her eye fell on a letter which had been handed to her just as her lover entered, and which she had forgotten in the mingled emotions to which their interview had given rise.

"Another moment," she said, "till I read my father's letter."

Deringcourt could scarcely conceal his vexation: he bowed rather coldly, and withdrew to a window, and with his face half shaded by his hand, he watched her countenance, as her eager eye dwelt on the characters. In a minute she was by his side, her eyes beaming with pleasure, and her cheeks suffused with blushes.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, "to-morrow my father will be here: he returns sooner than he expected."

Deringcourt endeavoured to conceal his vexation, and to appear satisfied; but in vain: he tried to resume his tone of tenderness; but the words died on his lips. Isabella looked at him in wonder: she could think of no reason why he should not be as happy as herself. But she was scarcely seventeen, and not much skilled in the study of the human heart. She loved deeply, devotedly, and in the mirror of her own pure soul she looked to trace the feelings of others. What girl of seventeen can be expected to study deeper? Deringcourt rallied his spirits, imputed his agitation to surprise, and left her, the happiest of the happy, with a promise to meet her father on his arrival. It was a promise he never meant to keep. Not that he willingly resigned the beautiful heiress, whose innocent tenderness had made an impression upon him; but he knew that from her parent he should never obtain her. He had hoped to secure his prize so firmly, that any interference could be of no avail; and the wealth and fondness of Mr. Hamden was too well known to leave a fear for the future.

"That moment for reflection," he muttered, as he turned his horse from the gate, "has ruined all."

The whole evening Isabella went about the house carolling like a bird, in the gaiety of her heart. In the morning, she rose with the sun, and as she gathered flowers to decorate her apartment, she kept saying to herself, "Who knows but we may induce him to relinquish the journey of which he has spoken? He says, business calls him away. My father can, perhaps, prevent the necessity; and, at the worst, we shall only be absent for a short time." And then the thought of her father's loneliness, during her journey, filled her eyes with tears, and her face resembled an April day, half showers, half sunshine.

As the hours sped away, she began to grow impatient for her parent's arrival. Every thing was in order for his reception; the position of his favourite arm-chair had been changed a dozen times; the fairest fruits of autumn placed on a table near it, and she had descended for the third time from her station at the highest window, from whence she could discern him at a distance, when she recollected that the letter might perhaps inform her at what hour he might be expected. She now remembered that she had read only the first sentence; and in her haste to communicate its import, and in the joyful bustle into which the intimation of his immediate return had thrown her, she had neglected to proceed further. She sought for the letter, and recommenced its perusal. Mr. Hamden, after announcing his intention of being at home at the period specified, wrote thus:—

"I am the more anxious to return to you, my child, because I hear, from yourself, that your female visitors have been obliged to leave you; and because I also learn, not from yourself, that you have another frequent visitor, whom their presence would have, probably, kept more at a distance."

Here Isabella's colour changed from red to pale, and with an indefinite sensation of dread, she went on:

"In short, I understand that you are frequently called upon by the person who made himself so agreeable to us both, during our jaunt to the springs last summer, and whom, with incautious frankness, I invited to visit us. He is a proof, that pleasing behaviour and a graceful exterior may sometimes dazzle the imagination and mislead the judgment. Yet who could without positive proof believe, that, with all that suavity of manner, that easy flow of conversation, and apparently honourable and benevolent feelings, this man has been capable of conduct the most base and cruel; that he is a gamester, and is now on the point of quitting this part of the Union, to avoid the just consequences of his conduct? That such a person should invade the sanctuary of my dwelling, to impose on the unsuspecting innocence of my child, in the absence of her guardian, is, perhaps, less surprising than distressing to my heart, especially when I reflect that my own easy credulity, by encouraging his advances towards intimacy, gave him a sort of right to your regard. The particulars, at which I have hinted, did not come to my knowledge till within three days, and immediately after I was informed, that you received this insinuating stranger as a frequent guest. I blame not you, my child. I can only hope that the mischief is not irremediable. This letter will be a caution to you, till I can in person, resume that care of you which the urgent call of professional duty obliged me to forego for a season."

Isabella read thus far in a sort of stupified wonder. That Deringcourt was meant, she could not doubt; but that he merited such accusations, seemed to her utterly impossible.

"And yet," thought she, "my father would accuse no one except on conviction. But he may have been deceived."

This thought restored her wonted energy: the agitating fever of hope succeeded to the chilling torpor which had benumbed her faculties, and though her tears flowed wildly, the illusive flatterer in her bosom would at intervals suppress them; but she neither ascended to the window, or traversed the lawn, to look out upon the road, as in the earlier part of the day: she shut herself in her own room, and endeavoured to quiet her fears. This was a new and difficult lesson to learn. Hitherto she had never concealed her feelings from her indulgent parent, whose eye she now trembled to meet; and for the first time, fully conscious of the importance of the step she had meditated without his concurrence, she felt as if an act of disobedience had already been committed: dreading lest Deringcourt might arrive before her father, her efforts to acquire composure were wholly unavailing, and when at last Mr. Hamden received his daughter in his arms, her agitation quite overcame her, and she fainted.

Mr. Hamden watched her recovery in the deepest alarm, tortured by indefinite fears, yet not venturing to hint an inquiry. On her return to consciousness, he confined his attentions solely to endeavour to soothe her feelings, without adverting to the subject which they both dreaded. But Isabella's eyes were perpetually wandering towards the road. Still he came not. As night drew on, her apprehensions arose to certainty; and, at length, unable to endure their conflicts, her agonized heart sought relief, by confiding its weakness, doubts, and regrets, to that safest of earthly sanctuaries, the bosom of a parent.

As Mr. Hamden listened to her ingenuous, though agitated confession, his bosom swelled, by turns, with indignation against Deringcourt, and gratitude for her preservation: the latter feeling predominated.

"I will leave him," he said, "to the punishment which the disappointment of his schemes, and the reproaches of his conscience will inflict."

Mr. Hamden, too, had a tale to tell, and in the hope of eradicating from the heart of Isabella every vestige of tenderness for the specious deceiver, he communicated its particulars to her. Those details are not necessary to our story. But Mr. Hamden knew enough of the female character to be aware, that to convince his daughter she had been sought more for her fortune than her affection, and that others had shared the worthless homage of her pretended lover, would, by arousing her pride, be the first step towards her recovery. In this he was not mistaken. Yet Isabella's heart had received a severe blow, and time was necessary to complete the cure. We shall not however conceal, that time, the universal conqueror, received no insignificant aid from a powerful auxiliary; for, about three months after her last interview with Deringcourt, she read the announcement of his marriage with a southern beauty of large possessions.

Time stole on, and brought to the young heart of Isabella the balm of "healing on his wing," and found her gradually changing from the blooming and artless girl, to the lovely and finished woman. She was not without admirers. All were charmed by her refined and elevated mind, the grace and sweetness of her manners, and the beauty of her person. There were many who offered their devotions at the shrines of wealth and beauty, and some who paid a more grateful reverence to superior intellect and virtue: but a talisman seemed to protect the heart of Isabella alike from open adulation and silent homage, and she imagined that friendship had to her supplied the place of love. The lingering traces of her ill-placed tenderness, and regrets that such tenderness had ever been felt or acknowledged, had early imparted a shade of seriousness to the natural vivacity of her disposition, which, while it lent an additional charm to her character, rather added to, than diminished, the depth and fervour of her feelings.

There was one being whom, next to her father, Isabella regarded with the most intense interest; an interest inspired by sympathy, and strengthened by admiration and esteem. In him she found a similarity of tastes and opinions, a sympathy of feeling, an intellect as elevated as her own, a mind improved by study and reflection, and a heart replete with sentiments of virtue and honour, and thrillingly alive to the charm of excellence in another. With such a being, so rarely met with, yet when found so certain of being cherished, Isabella spent the greater portion of that time not necessarily devoted to the claims of general society; and, strange as it may seem, though this companion was one of the other sex, one whose lips pronounced the accents of refined friendship, and whose beaming eyes were always telling a tale which woman's heart is seldom slow to understand, Isabella scarcely admitted even to herself that love might possibly lurk beneath the garb of simple friendship. Yet she felt, that for such friendship she would willingly resign the homage of every other heart: perhaps she secretly suspected, that it was their relative situations alone, which precluded, on his part, the indulgence of a warmer sentiment; and that suspicion, while it increased her esteem for him, acted as a check upon her own tender feelings; for if his lips were sealed in silence, she, as a woman, was bound to equal reserve; and while she lamented the waywardness of fortune, and the early and accumulated sorrows which had thrown Horace Linval, a friendless orphan, on the protection and bounty of her father, she rejoiced in the power which wealth gave the latter, of rescuing him from the evils of penury and obscurity.

Horace Linval was an orphan boy, left at an early age to the protection of Mr. Hamden, who had sent him to a sister state to prosecute his studies. Horace left Isabella a playful girl of thirteen; he returned, and found her all that his fancy could portray, or his heart worship, in woman. Though the charm of her society was irresistible, he carefully concealed his real sentiments, lest by aspiring to the love of Isabella, he should lose the friendship of her father, which formed the only charm of his existence.

"I shall betray my feelings," he began to say mournfully to himself, while lost in a painful reverie, he brooded over his hopeless attachment, and dwelt with morbid sensibility on the vast debt of gratitude he owed his benefactor. Yet jealousy, inseparable from passionate love, that torturer of great as well as little minds, stole into his heart, to add one more pang to those he already suffered. While his mind was a prey to these feelings, his manner towards Isabella became variable, and he sought and avoided her society by turns; became wretched when absent from her; yet fitfully abstracted or wildly gay when near her. Isabella perceived this change, and her own heart explained its cause. She deeply sympathized in the silent unhappiness she saw him suffer, and resolved that if a sense of honour kept him silent, he should never endure the misery of seeing her regard bestowed upon another: had it depended on herself, she would with frankness, have dispelled the cloud of doubt which hung over his mind, and by a candid avowal of her affection, rewarded his attachment.

While the lovers were thus coining present misery for themselves, the father was not blind to their mutual attachment, and felt that by bestowing his child on his beloved and admired protégé, he exalted instead of debased her; and he was most happy in having an opportunity of proving the superiority of talent and merit over the distinctions of wealth and station: yet with a father's natural pride, he hesitated, unwilling that his daughter should "unsought be won."

One day, during a walk with Isabella, Horace was betrayed into a momentary forgetfulness of his wanted caution. He read in her downcast eye and blushing cheek, what he had before scarcely ventured to hope; yet he left her without an explanation, and retiring to his own room, indulged the delightful thoughts which their interview had inspired. While thus employed, he had sketched the features of Isabella; the eyes were so like hers, the lips so resembling those which ever smiled so kindly on him, that enraptured with his own performance, he raised the little image to his lips—as he did so, he felt a hand upon his shoulder. Horace raised his eyes, and Mr. Hamden was at his side! Overwhelmed with confusion, he left the room without uttering a word.

Isabella was in the garden, and thither he unconsciously went. The moment he saw her, the tide of his feelings became too strong, and he gave way to a burst of uncontrollable emotion. Isabella was soon made acquainted with the cause of his embarrassment—his fear of her father's refusal, and his resolution to leave her, and for ever! His real feelings were for the first time laid open to her view. Horace held out his hand to take hers, in a farewell clasp. One womanish struggle agitated her mind; one moment's hesitation, and her resolution was taken. She deeply felt the importance of that moment, for Horace had turned to leave her.

"Stay! Horace, stay!" burst from her lips: "you will not scorn the gift because it is offered. This hand is yours!"

Scarcely believing the reality of what he heard, and dreading lest his hopes misconstrued the purport of her words, Horace stood rivetted to the spot. But the blushes and tears of Isabella confirmed his happiness.

After a brief interval, Mr. Hamden sought them. Well acquainted with their wishes, he avoided any explanation; but placing the hand of his daughter in that of Linval's, he bestowed a heartfelt benediction upon his children.

"Horace," said Isabella, after she had been some time a wife, "if I had not caught you at that very moment, you would have escaped me!" And her heart swelled with gratitude as she concluded the sportive sentence; for she remembered, that twice in her life she had reason to acknowledge the importance of a moment.

A SONNET ON SONNETS.

When memory takes a retrospective gaze
Upon the bright effusions of my brain,
She cannot find—I note the fact with pain—
Mid all that heterogeneous mass of lays,
A single SONNET! This might blight a fame
Greater—if greater can be—than the one
Which now rewards the muses' favourite son—
I mean myself—and gilds his deathless name.
This must not be, and so I'll write one now.
Let's see—it must comprise just fourteen lines,
Dull, flat, and heavy—this at least combines
The requisites alluded to, I trow;
Two more complete it—now the hard entwines
The ne plus ultra garland round his laurelled brow!

THE FINE ARTS.

IF O'ER THE CRUEL TYRANT, LOVE.

THE music of Artaxerxes is so generally known, that the delightful melody designated as above will be familiar to many of our readers; but we are not aware that it has ever before been published in America. Thomas Augustine Arne, who wrote the fine opera of Artaxerxes, and afterwards married his prima donna, Miss Brent, is perhaps, after Purcell, the first dramatic composer of whom we have reason to be proud. (In speaking of literature or the fine arts, of course we never can separate America from England, and consequently claim the right of speaking in the plural number.) The melodies of Arne are as beautiful as those of any known author, subject to a charge of sameness and mannerism in the cadences which vocalists at present take the liberty of correcting according to their own ideas. His fame at the period when he flourished was great, and the most certain criterion of judging of the esteem in which he was held, is by a comparison of his music with that of contemporary authors, all of whom will be found imitating his style and purloining his ideas, as Messrs. Bishop and Lee do and have purloined the ideas of Weber, and as Außer and Caraffa do and have purloined the ideas of Rossini. But Dr. Arne has not only the merit of giving fashion to the music of his day—his fame rests on a much firmer basis—his unique and splendid Artaxerxes at the present moment is invariably chosen to usher to the public any débütante of extraordinary power; and the divisions of his bravuras are so difficult, and require so much flexibility, that it is dangerous for any person not gifted highly by nature to attempt them. Braham, on his return from Italy, selected this opera for a re-appearance; Mrs. Billington did the same thing; Miss Stephens made her débüt in Artaxerxes, and Miss Wilson established her fame by it. We have seen it played with an admirable cast at the Park, including Horn, Pearman, and Mrs. Austin—and perhaps the Mandane of Mrs. Austin, and the Artaban of Horn, have given those respective vocalists the best claims to that share of public favour which they possess.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT WOMEN.

It has been well said that "history is philosophy teaching by examples." The same remark is applicable to biography. History is, in truth, biography generalized: the one being the memoir of the individual, the other the record of collective bodies of the species. Both are intended for the instruction of posterity; and it is the duty both of the historian and the biographer to give their writings so attractive a form, by the brilliancy of their thoughts and the harmony of their periods, that the young may be interested and the aged amused, that the lessons of that sound philosophy which teaches by examples may be neither dry nor repulsive. The rude works of the early chroniclers, with all their simple, heart-stirring narratives, slumber undisturbed upon our dusty shelves. The curious antiquary, it is true, may sometimes intrude upon their repose, and unclasp the heavy volume that yawns and gapes wide as if untimely waked, and rustles its husky leaves like the wind among the dry and fallen foliage; but the antiquary alone, "with looks of cordial love," hangs over them enamoured. The young and enthusiastic, the aged and serious, treat them with more reverence, and seldom violate their sacred rest. The works of our more modern historians receive not the same unenviable respect. We unceremoniously invade the sanctuary of their minds, and feel conscious of our approach to the temple of wisdom. The splendid periods of Robertson and Hume and Gibbon and Johnson, satisfy at once the ear and the understanding; all classes of readers are equally charmed, and wisdom perchance may sometimes doubt whether it is to the sound or to the sense that she owes her disciples.

The lives of some individuals are inseparably interwoven with the history of their country. Among these may be numbered those who rule, and those who, by their birth, are entitled to rule. We have selected one of the latter for the subject of our present sketch.

JANE OF FRANCE.

Jane of France, the daughter of Louis the eleventh and Charlotte of Savoy, was born in the year 1464. Her illustrious birth proved no safeguard against injustice and wrong; and it is a melancholy reflection that her misfortunes may be ascribed chiefly to her want of beauty. Her person was deformed, and her features irregular; but the moral beauty of her character fully compensated for her unattractive exterior. Her gentleness, her sweetness of disposition, her inexhaustible goodness, her frankness, even in a court where dissimulation was accounted a virtue, rendered her an object of universal affection. She was married at the early age of twelve years to the duke of Orleans, her cousin, who was unfortunately incapable of appreciating her virtues. Upon the death of her father, Louis, his son and successor, Charles the eighth, was but thirteen years old. The duke of Orleans claimed the regency, as first prince of the blood. He found the duke of Bourbon a formidable competitor. The matter was referred to the states general, who were assembled at Tours. They declared a regency unnecessary, and thus confirmed the last will of Louis, which directed the person of the young king to be placed under the care of his sister, Anne of France, the lady of Beaujeu; a woman inheriting the energy and talents, the jealous caution and deep dissimulation of her father. The duke of Orleans, disappointed in his expectation of the regency, withdrew to Brittany, and persuaded the duke of that province to excite an insurrection; but the war was of short duration. The rebel forces were every where defeated. The duke of Orleans was taken prisoner at Saint Aubin, and confined in the tower of Bourges. According to Brantôme, his confinement was prolonged and rendered more rigorous, through the influence and resentment of the lady of Beaujeu, whose projects he had opposed, whose passion he had slighted, and whose feelings he had once publicly insulted. He was accused of treason. His situation was perilous. His amiable wife, who had long been treated by him with injury and neglect, forgot her own wrongs, and listened only to her affections. She besought Charles, with prayers and tears, to release her husband. He yielded reluctantly to her earnest entreaties, and the captive duke was liberated. Although he owed his liberty, perhaps his life, to the devoted Jane, yet his conduct to her was not softened. The claims of gratitude and his nuptial vows were equally disregarded. She murmured not; yet her patience, her resignation, her fervent affections, her tender solicitude for his safety, touched not the heart of the duke of Orleans. Upon the decease of Charles, he ascended the throne under the title of Louis the twelfth, and soon after solicited from the pope, Alexander the sixth, the dissolution of his marriage. His pretext was, that in uniting himself with Jane, he had not been allowed to consult his inclination; that he had been constrained to the match by her father Louis the eleventh, whose tyrannical will he had not dared to oppose. What weight this argument had with the infallible representative of Saint Peter, is not told even by the garrulous chronicles of that period. These irreverent writers had sometimes the hardihood to record their own wicked conjectures for truths; and in the present case, they have dared to publish that bribes and promises elicited from the holy tribunal the sentence which annulled the inauspicious marriage, and deprived the unhappy Jane of a husband and a throne. Three weeks afterwards she saw the man whom she had loved so long, so tenderly, and so devotedly, united to another. He married Anne of Brittany, the widow of Charles the eighth. He had loved her before her union with Charles, and his love had not been unrequited. Jane yielded to her adverse fortunes with her wonted resignation, and with a firmness becoming her rank; yet as the divorce rent asunder all the dearest ties of the female heart, and the marriage that followed it violated all the nicest sensibilities of her nature, her mental agony must have been extreme. The feelings of her desolated bosom have been described by one of our own countrywomen, in the following touching lines:

Pale, cold, and statue-like she sat, and her impeded breath
Came gaspingly, as if her heart was in the grasp of death,
While listening to the harsh decree that robbed her of a throne,
And left the gentle child of kings in the wide world alone.

And fearful was her look; in vain her trembling maidens moved
With all affection's tender care, round her whom well they loved;
Stirless she sat, as if enchained by some resistless spell,
Till with one wild, heart-piercing shriek, in their embrace she fell.

How bitter was the hour she woke from that long dreamless trance,
The bitter wretch might pity then the envied Jane of France;
But soon her o'erfraught heart gave way, tears came to her relief,
And thus in low and plaintive tones she breathed her hopeless grief:

"Oh! ever have I dreaded this since at the holy shrine
My trembling hand first felt the cold reluctant clasp of thine;
And yet I hoped.—My own beloved, how may I teach my heart
To gaze upon thy gentle face, and know that we must part?"

"Too well I know thou lovest me not, but ah! I fondly thought,
That years of such deep love as mine some change ere this had wrought;
I dreamed the hour might yet arrive when, sick of passion's strife,
Thy heart would turn with quiet joy to thy neglected wife.

"Vain, foolish hope! how could I look upon thy glorious form,
And think that e'er the time might come when thou wouldst cease to charm?

For ne'er till then wilt thou be freed from beauty's magic art,
Or cease to prize a sunny smile beyond a faithful heart.

"In vain from memory's darkened scroll would other thoughts erase
The loathing that was in thine eye, whenever it met my face;
Oh! I would give the fairest realm beneath the all-seeing sun,
To win but such a form as thou mightst love to look upon.

"Woe, woe for woman's weary lot if beauty be not hers,
Vainly within her gentle breast affection wildly stirs,
And bitterly will she deplore amid her sick heart's dearth,
The hour that fixed her fearful doom—a helot from her birth.

"I would thou hadst been cold and stern, the pride of my high race
Had taught me then from my young heart thine image to efface,
But surely even love's sweet tones could ne'er have power to bless
My bosom with such joy as did thy pitying tenderness.

"Alas! it is a heavy task to curb the haughty soul
And bid the unbending spirit bow that never knew control;
But harder still when thus the heart against itself must rise,
And struggle on while every hope that nerved the warfare dies.

"Yet all this have I borne for thee—ay, for thy sake I learned
The gentleness of thought and word which once my proud breast spurned;

The treasures of an untouched heart, the wealth of love's rich mine,
These are the offerings that I laid upon my idol's shrine.

"In vain I breathed my vows to heaven, 'twas mockery of prayer;
In vain I knelt before the cross, I saw but Louis there;
To him I gave the worship I should have paid my God,
But oh! should his have been the hand to wield the avenging rod?"

Jane did not allow her domestic afflictions to disturb the repose of her country. She neither protested against the sentence of divorce, nor did she appeal to her countrymen for redress. Had she done so, there is reason to believe that the daughter of Louis would not have appealed in vain; but she retired quietly to Bourges, which had been assigned to her for her dower. She there dedicated herself to the service of religion, and spent the remainder of her days in acts of charity and devotion. She renounced all the vanities of the world; she clothed herself in the coarsest garments; she practised the most rigid economy in the expenses of her establishment, and distributed her revenues to the poor. She instituted at Bourges in 1500 the order of the Annunciado; she assumed the dress of that order in 1504, and died on the fourth of February, 1506. Her remains were burnt in 1562, when Bourges was taken by the Calvinists.

The church of Rome has enrolled her among its saints, and pious men have ascribed to her the power of working miracles. We cheerfully assent to their faith, with this restriction, that the miracles she wrought were miracles of genuine piety, moderation, and purity, in an age of bigotry, violence, and universal depravity. Her exalted virtues more than her illustrious birth entitle her to a place among distinguished

I summon ye to tell
The mysteries of your bright abode.—Wetmore.

SPEAK to me, radiant ministers of night,
That wait for ever on her shadowy sway,
Who through all time at that approachless height,
Have marked earth's mortal myriads pass away—
Speak to my quest, ye blessed ones, and say,
Know ye the refuge of the spirit's flight?
Have ye no image in th' ethereal ray
That to this senseless dust gives life and light?
Shall it, unquenched by aught of charnel damp,
Shine brightly on beyond the shrouded tomb?
Or like the flickering of a wasted lamp,
At last expire in loneliness and gloom?
Speak to me, silent chroniclers, I crave;
Unfold the mysteries of the voiceless grave!

And from the breathless silence of the sky
Deep to my soul the thrilling answer came—
"How canst thou gaze around thee and on high,
Nor conscious feel what death can never tame?
The proud revelations of that inward flame
Should banish far thy being's dark distrust—
The stern resolve, high hope, and soaring aim,
Have nought of kindred fellowship with dust!
Look, trembling doubter, to the circling skies,
With our rich, burning brilliants freely strown,
As if unnumbered angels' blessed eyes,
Through the pure azure gloriously shone;
Yet when for aye our crystal urns are dim,
Spark of the all-radiant one, thou still shalt beam!"

FRENCH LITERATURE.

Translated from the French for the New-York Mirror.

THE TOMB OF RACHEL.

THE valley, or rather the dry plain of Rephidim, spreads for miles without offering any other shelter to the sun-burned traveller than a modest and simple Turkish coffee-house, where the Arabs of the desert sometimes assemble, but which the pilgrim takes care to avoid. A little farther on are the ruins of the village of Rama, whose site nothing but a few broken fragments of walls and heaps of stones, is left to indicate. In this plain, and near the deserted village is the tomb of Rachel. It is one of those spots where the inanimate objects around seem to attest most forcibly the truth of the traditions which hallow them. All around is solitude. There is not even a palm or a cypress to be seen, not a single tree covers with its shade the simple mausoleum where repose the ashes of the mother of Israel; and yet this spot awakens more associations, excites more interest than the most costly monuments on which all the luxury of the arts is squandered. The traveller passes carelessly by the tombs of Zachariah and Abaelom in the valley of Jehosaphat—he hardly glances at the sepulchre of the kings in the plain of Jeremiah—but at the sight of the tomb of Rachel, fancy carries him back to the cradle of the nations of the east, and recalls to him the power of the beauty which softened her lover's long term of servitude and exile, and he blesses the memory of that tender and faithful companion whose affections so often soothed the manifold cares and sorrows of the patriarch.

The Turks have decorated with much splendour the burial places of most of the personages of the old testament. A mosque rises over the tombs of David and Solomon. Another vast antique temple covers the grotto of Macphelah at Hebron, and the neighbourhood is holy inviolable ground. This grotto, whose gloomy entrance is alone perceptible, is in the centre of the building, into which none but true believers are admitted. Within the last hundred years, but two Europeans are known to have succeeded in obtaining entrance by corrupting the guards, and that not without running the greatest danger. The last was an Italian count, who, by means of large bribes, obtained permission to enter the mosque. The valley wherein is situated the Hebron of the ancients, is often traversed by pilgrims and travellers, but the penalty of death denounced against every christian who shall dare to enter the mosque, is sufficient to repress the curiosity the fame of the place excites. The grotto, we were told by the Turks, is spacious, cut out of solid rock, and the burial places of the ancient patriarchs are yet visible in it.

But the tribute of reverence paid by the followers of Mahomet to the tomb of Rachel produces a far deeper impression than the sight of marble pillars or costly ceilings. Their eager desire to be buried near her remains is especially remarkable. The environs of her humble mausoleum are covered with Mussulman tombs. It is not merely for her greatness, purity, or sanctity that the Turks honour Rachel, but rather for her domestic virtues. She was a devoted wife, a tender parent, the mother of a warlike people: such are her titles to the respect of the Mahometans.

Should a Jew appear while a funeral procession was slowly crossing the plain of Rephidim, moving towards the sepulchre, bearing the remains of some beloved object to rest in this hallowed place, he would be driven away with blows and curses by the very worshippers that are kneeling reverently by the tomb of one of his ancestors; so fallen is that unhappy people, which cannot even approach the places filled with the renown of their former greatness. Le Courrier des Etats Unis.

INDUSTRY OF THE ITALIAN IMPROVISATORI.

The secrets of the mysterious art of the extempore poetry of the Italians, were explained to me as follows, by an adept in it. "I have always," said he, "a certain number of pieces suitably elaborated on popular subjects, such as the death of Adonis, the loves of Psyche and Cupid, the sacrifice of Iphigenia, the chastity of Lucretia, the death of Cesar, the cruelty of Nero, &c. I have also in store a certain quantity of pompous declamations, brilliant descriptions, &c. which I easily manage to introduce into my compositions, and whose splendour relieves their feeble passages, as for instance, an eulogy on Rome, a vehement declamation against the passions, a description of a storm, the beauties of spring, or the like. But memory alone is not sufficient for an improvisatore, presence of mind and quickness of fancy are indispensable. One thing which is of great assistance, is the liberty allowed us of borrowing from the classics without being accused of plagiarism. I cannot tell how much I have profited by Virgil and Horace in my extempore effusions. Rhymes are easily found in a language as abundant and flexible as the Italian, and which has so little variety in its final sounds. Nothing seems at first sight more difficult than to improvise a tragedy, while, in fact, it is the easiest part of our profession. These extempore tragedies are formed on the model, or rather cast in the mould of the classic drama, all made up of tyrants, cruel parents, heroes, lovers, and confidants. I always keep love-scenes, farewells, blessings, and curses ready made for my characters, and a very slight change adapts them to any occasion. Sometimes I introduce chorusses, and as the chorusses always deal in generals, I can have them prepared before hand without difficulty; I am sure of finding some way to bring them in. The versi sciolti are the most difficult kind of extempore poetry; this is the rock against which most of us split." Such were the candid explanations I received from one of the ablest improvisatori of the age. He seemed to think there was no danger in telling the secrets of the trade to a stranger; to his own countrymen he probably was not so communicative. Ibid.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE IGNIS FATUUS.—The following has been communicated to the editor of the Salem Gazette, by a respectable shipmaster of the town: "After several days of stormy weather, one evening, about eight o'clock, during a light shower, which had been preceded by a hail squall, a jack-o-lantern was seen on the maintop-gallant mast-head, and an intelligent person was sent up to examine it. He found it formed by a circle of lights round the mast-head, eight or ten in number, and one or two inches apart. Each flame was about two inches long, was where it joined the mast-head about the size of a knitting-needle, and the extremity larger than the flame of a candle and nearly as bright, of a pale blue colour, each making a noise similar to steam out of green wood, while burning; no smell was perceptible. Upon striking it with the hand the lights were extinguished, and small sparks adhered to the hand for a moment, then disappeared. In a few seconds the lights again began to burn; after several blows they entirely disappeared. The above description was written at the time, and may be relied on as accurate."

NEW DIFFERENTIAL THERMOMETER.—The following interesting experiment was made by Dr. Howard, by means of a differential thermometer of his own invention:—Having blackened the upper ball of my differential thermometer, I placed it in the focus of a thirteen inch reflecting mirror, which was opposed to the light of a bright full moon. The liquid began immediately to sink, and in half a minute was depressed eight degrees, where it became stationary. On placing a screen between the mirror and the moon, it rose again to the same level, and was again depressed on removing the obstacle. This experiment was repeated several times in the presence of some of Dr. H.'s friends, and always with the same result.

STANZAS TO A FRIEND.

BY THYRA.

"Tis wretched solace, yet
 'Tis solace in the drear extreme of grief,
 To find one human heart whose deeper woe
 Makes weakness of our wailing."—Milman.

NAY, look not sad, my early friend, though o'er thy sunny sky
 Those transient clouds of gloom are thrown which pass so swiftly by:
 The clouds which shade a summer heaven have blessings in their gloom,

'Tis theirs to cheer the drooping plant and bid the floweret bloom.
 Still dost thou weep! ah, think, dear friend, how fair that lot of thine, How fraught with flowers, how free from thorns, thy path compared with mine!

For many are the spells that wait to soothe thy slightest grief,
 But to my heart's deep misery, oh! what can bring relief?

A phalanx firm of faithful friends have circled thee around,
 Who feel intensely every pang which doth thy spirit wound;
 Whose soothing tones, whose cheering looks and smiles are ever near,
 Who answer back each sigh of thine, and give thee tear for tear.

Thou find'st the balm of sympathy for e'en thy causeless woe—
 But for my spirit's cureless wounds no soothing tear-drops flow—
 Oh! for one draught of that fresh fount to quench my spirit's thirst,
 And nerve my fainting heart to meet its lot and brave the worst!

Have I not wept with those who weep and with the happy smiled,
 And other's griefs by every art of sympathy beguiled?
 Yet when the troubled hour had past, was not my aid forgot,
 And all affection's cordial warmth and care remembered not?

None pause to think how much my heart with secret wounds may bleed,

That sympathy's sustaining power I too may deeply need;
 No voice speaks comfort to my heart with kind and anxious tone,
 But I am left to bear each pang and searching grief alone.

The only eye in this cold world that ever wept for me,
 Is thine, my own unchanging friend—would that those orbs were free
 From aught but drops of sympathy—but other tears are there—
 And is thy once so happy heart now touch'd by grief and care?

Oh! look not thus! 'Tis not for thee that darkened brow to wear—
 For thee whose every look is watched by eyes of anxious care;
 For thee, the loved of many a heart, what woe on thee can fall
 Unsoftened by affection's power, thou cherishest one of all!

Thou friend, whose love hath cheered my heart and smoothed my rugged way!

Would that the spell were mine to soothe or charm thy grief away!
 For in my bitter cup of life a sweetness would there be,
 Did all I suffer from one pang, beloved one, save thee.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

ADDRESSED TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NUMBER TWO.

Liverpool.

August 2, 1830.

THE approach to this fine city from the sea, if the wind happens to be in your face, is certainly any thing but agreeable.
 Dense clouds of dark and unodoriferous smoke, offensive to the eyes and olfactory nerves, envelope you in their sable folds, bronzing the complexion and dimming the spotless purity of the clean cravat which adorns in, alas! transitory whiteness, the neck of the passenger about to quit the amphibious beings he has so long sojourned amongst, and mix once more with his fellow-mortals. On the present occasion the atmosphere looked as if it had obligingly complied with the orders of the court and gone into mourning for his late majesty—"hung be the heavens with black," &c.—which was very appropriate, but not pleasant, and contrasted disadvan-tageously with the patches of white fleecy vapour that, in place of smoke, float above the good city of New-York. Notwithstanding early predilections, I really felt a degree of respect for wood fires and anthracite coal till then unknown.
 On landing, however, on the docks, the comparison is all in favour of Liverpool; and the neatness and cleanliness of those stupendous works of art, which look as if formed to endure for ages, are very different from the state of the old, decayed wooden piers in the East river, which, independent of their appearance, on hot summer days send forth the "rankest compound of villanous smells" that ever engendered fever and pestilence. Oh! let no man that readeth Izaak Walton, and entertaineth romantic notions of the "pleasant art" of angling, view it as practised off the East river docks, or in the slips named Coenties and Burling; and let no man, to whose palate and stomach eels are grateful and nutritious food, look upon the inveigling of that fishy snake, by sable fishermen, out of Stygian pools darker than the darkest of their visages, and of a more unpleasant odour than themselves, even when the weather is warmest!

Liverpool docks have in their time elicited so many long descriptions, and so many common-place remarks concerning "commerce," "forest of masts," "products from the four quarters of the globe," and so forth, that I will resist being seduced into any florid account thereof or dissertation thereupon; merely mentioning that, whatever exaggerated accounts a stranger may have read of them, he will probably be surprised when he comes to view the reality. I inquired of our mate and captain what proportion of vessels they thought

New-York harbour contained compared with Liverpool? The one answered about a sixth, the other a tenth part (some difference;) how near correct either might be, I had no means of ascertaining.

The Mersey is covered with steam-boats starting for and arriving from the various ports in the Channel, but principally those of Ireland and Wales. Some of these vessels are beautiful models; but upon the whole, I was a good deal struck with the contrast between their rough, coarse, and dingy appearance, and that of the light, trim, and elegant boats which adorn the Hudson. What they lack in neatness and outward show, however, they make up in strength, answering well the purposes for which they are constructed, and the hard work they have to go through. It seems to me to blow a gale here five days out of seven; and the short, rugged seas which frequently run in the Channel are infinitely more trying to vessels than the long swell of the Atlantic. These boats plough their way with perfect ease and safety through waves that would strain and tear your graceful smooth-water boats to pieces. They are all painted black, which appears to be rather a work of supererogation, as the volumes of coal smoke which they vomit forth speedily dye all things with which they come in contact, of that hue; though, at the same time, I do not believe there is any truth in the story of a party of white ladies and gentlemen taken on board at Liverpool having been mistaken for an importation from the coast of Africa on their arrival at Dublin quay!

The streets of Liverpool, though there is not any one equal as a whole to Broadway, are, generally speaking, broader and cleaner than those of New-York; and the houses, inns, and public buildings greatly superior. The churches in both cities are equally insignificant looking affairs. Of squares, crescents, and other open spaces, though far inferior to London in this respect, there is a goodly quantity here. Such places in large towns serve as reservoirs for fresh air, and are as beneficial as they are ornamental. True, in an extensive country like England, where there is more land than people know what to do with, such things may be afforded; but in a small, confined place like the United States of America, where, consequently, every foot of ground is invaluable, it is exceedingly wise policy to squeeze the cities into the smallest possible compass, and have a fine, compact mass of brick and wood, of which the citizens and strangers perceive the manifest advantage in the dog-days. How that extravagant piece of verdure, St. John's Park, came to have existence, and still continues to be tolerated in your good city, is a mystery I have never heard any intelligent person able to explain.

Perhaps there are few places in England containing a smaller portion of poor inhabitants than Liverpool, and you may walk through street after street in succession denoting nothing but wealth and opulence. The haunts of commerce, however, in the lower parts of the town, are not relieved by the presence of fine trees—the tall poplar and drooping willow—as in New-York, which have such a peculiar novel and agreeable appearance, shooting forth their fresh green boughs into the speculating and money-making atmosphere, and throwing a shade of "rurality," (as a cockney might say), over merchants' counting-houses, brokers' dens, and lawyers' offices. The upper parts and suburbs of Liverpool, where the principal merchants reside, consist almost entirely of large, handsome, yet comfortable looking houses, with the invariable appendage of a neat, elegant garden. Here when a man erects a building, he seems to calculate that his son's sons shall have the benefit of it, and frequently has engraved on a large stone in front of the house, the year in which it was built, for the information of future generations; in New-York a man buys a lot, and knocks up something on it in two or three days, to be burnt, blown, or pulled down in three or four more. Neither are there here any of those fragile com-pilations so common in the upper wards of New-York, consisting of a few pieces of wood fastened slightly together, and covered with shingles, which are impudently termed houses, and for which I have heard it asserted, incredible as it may seem, that people do actually pay rent.

I betook myself to the theatre the night after my arrival.
 It is a neat, pretty building, tastefully fitted up, and between the size of the Park and Chatham. The boxes had rather a sombre appearance, in consequence of those sweet creatures of the feminine gender, which English people term "women," and Americans "ladies," being clad in fashionable weeds of woe, on account of the death of his late majesty. The play was Masaniello—not the melo-dramatic affair that you have been put off with—but Auber's opera, with the whole of the music.
 Sinclair, the celebrated London vocalist, personated Masaniello, in which he sang delightfully, and played execrably. I think he would be a much greater favourite in America, and deservedly so, than any vocalist that has preceded him: his voice is uncommonly rich and pleasing, though I do not think his taste, in some respects, over and above pure. After the play, our old acquaintances, Celeste and Constance, made their appearance, and spun round for fifteen or twenty minutes: they seemed to be coldly received, though not on the score of morality. The former lady's portrait is at the print-shop windows, in the character of the dumb girl in Masaniello,

 "as performed by her upwards of three hundred nights in America?" As Falstaff says, "Lord! how this world is given to lying." I have been twice or thrice at the theatre since, and find it, both as respects actors and scenery, decidedly inferior to the Park. There is not one low comedian any thing like a match for either Barnes, Hilson, or Placide; and no woman in Mrs. Wheatley's line fit to be compared with her.
 A Mr. Vandenhoff reigns supreme here: he has been long a favourite, having seemingly "won golden opinions from all sorts of people," and is in fact, on the strength, I suppose, of having failed in London in the character of Lear, a sort of equivocal star. I confess, I cannot see any thing very particular about the man, and merely mention him, in passing, because it is not unlikely that, spoiled by praise, he may some fine summer morning set his foot on board a New-York packet, and three weeks after that, make his "first appearance in America." He appears to be a cold, fat, formal, sensible actor, and speaks correctly, and thoroughly understands his business.
 He has a very insignificant nose, and a large stomach, and plays lovers in comedy, and heroes in tragedy. But I will trouble you no more about theatricals until I arrive in London.

Altogether, there is much worthy a stranger's attention in Liverpool, though the city is as yet but in the infancy of its greatness. Already her immense docks are found insufficient to contain the still more immense quantity of shipping that seeks admittance, and a new one is constructing, and will speedily be opened. The most difficult part of the new railroad is also completed. I walked through the two tunnels at the head of the town, each about a quarter of a mile long, and for a great portion of the way scooped in the solid rock. This, with her fine canal, will doubtless prove two rapid sources of wealth; while her numerous steam-boats and innumerable stage-coaches, passing and repassing to all parts of the kingdom, denote a spirit of activity and enterprise, that may in time render her a formidable rival even to the modern Babylon.

My dear sir, as the young ladies say in physiognomical romances.
 I am poor, but I am virtuous; and as my good name is all I have in the world, I hope and trust that in writing this or any other communication for the Mirror, I shall not incur the odium of being set down as one of the regular travelling journalists, who infest steam-boats and stage-coaches, in this and other parts of the world, and who are so furiously descriptive, and so bent on imparting minute and correct information, that they make a book out of what an ordinary person might suppose could be contained in a page. I shall use every precaution to escape the imputation, and take especial care not to commence any paragraph in the following approved book-of-travel style:—
 "We arrived in Canterbury precisely at twenty minutes past two, and changed post-horses at the sign of the White Swan.
 Canterbury is an ancient and pleasant town, but we observed that many entire streets, and portions of others, were very badly paved. (Ah! how unlike the smooth pavements of Broadway, in our own happy country!) The charges at the inn were extravagantly high, and the demands of the coachman," &c. &c. &c. &c. The besetting sin of the majority of travellers and journal-keepers seems to be, their supposing that petty trifling things, which were matters of interest to themselves at the moment, must necessarily be of equal interest to their readers. I will merely note down what appears to me striking, interesting, or amusing, and avoid as much as possible mixing it up with the unprofitable chit-chat, and every-day occurrences I may chance to fall in with. C.

To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER THREE.

EVERY thing being completed, our Road and Baltic pilots on board, we weighed anchor early the next morning, and proceeded up the Sound. I could not but be pleased with the little attentions that we received at Elsinour, even from the trades-people; to be sure, you may say that they sprung from a selfish motive, if you choose, but they did not in the least bear that appearance, and rather seemed to proceed from a kindlier source. They waited upon us, accompanied, in some instances by their families, to the shore, wished us a pleasant voyage, and remained watching our boat till we had safely reached the ship. Our market-woman added as a present, with the vegetables she furnished us, a large and beautiful bouquet of flowers, with which I adorned the cabin; and, to my surprise, they preserved their fragrance and bloom till we arrived at St. Petersburg.

The sailing was perfectly delightful. Throughout the day light summer flaps came over the waters, just ruffling their smooth surface; and although we had mustered a cloud of sail, we hardly averaged two knots an hour through the succeeding twelve. The Sound was covered with vessels of different nations; an undulating coast rose on either side; and Copenhagen, with its strong fortifications and numerous spires, appeared in the distance. About midway between this and Elsinour is the king's park; the grounds are extensive, and near their centre stands the Hermitage, a spacious four story building, and his Danish majesty's country residence. I was vexed at being obliged to pass Copenhagen without stopping; however, as I could but have paid it a flying visit, I shall take care to indemnify myself upon my return. It shows well from the water, and the most prominent objects are the water batteries, the king's palace, a hospital, and the churches; and outside the harbour still lie the hulks of the vessels that assisted in the gallant defence of the town during the unprovoked and flagitious attack upon it by Lords Gambier and Cathcart.

We were scarce a day without seeing land in the Baltic, and our pilot proved a most agreeable addition to our company. His naiveté and intelligence quite interested us; and although a mere boy at the time, he had served his country at the late attack of the British fleet upon it, and seemed by night or day quite as much at home among these seas as you would be in your neat sail-boat upon the bay of New-York. He amused us with some tales connected with the better half of the localities we passed, and the most thrilling were those of a Russian boyar, owning and residing on one of these islands, and who, on the nightly approach of a foreign vessel, would endeavour to allure it ashore by false lights. He was not unfrequently successful, murdering the crew if any escaped the shipwreck, and, with his dependants, plundering the cargo. Strange to say, this monster pursued this diabolical system for a number of years with impunity, but was at length informed against by the remnant of a brig's crew that had escaped him. He was immediately seized, taken to St. Petersburg, publicly knouted, his tongue cut out, and then sentenced to hard work for the remainder of his life in the mines of Siberia.

On the fifth day from Elsinour we made the island of Dago, lying at the mouth of the gulf of Finland; this was our first view of any part of his imperial majesty's dominions, and I must confess was rather a damper, for the side we passed was dreary and desolate enough. It is thirty or forty miles in extent, and I am told, the exclusive property of an exiled nobleman. I was content with wishing his lordship joy of his extensive domains, notwithstanding its having one considerable town upon it.

Among the vessels that we were constantly overhauling, the most attractive to my view were the Dutch galliots. Here they were, with their bright varnished deck and sides, broad prow, lee-boards, and low waist, after the exact model of those so gallantly fought by De Ruyter and Van Tromp, now near two hundred years ago. It seemed as if they actually stood still as we passed them, and we usually ran them hull down in three hours more with great ease. I had the curiosity to board one upon my arrival at St. Petersburg. Every thing was perfectly neat, and after examining the outer works, the skipper invited me into the cabin, which I found fitted up as comfortably, and somewhat in the style of a parlour, and graced by his little family. Here sat mine vrouw knitting, and in a cradle was a chubby boy, kicking up his heels with great delight, and evidently quite as happy as if on terra firma. I remarked to the captain how easily we had outsailed him in coming up the gulf, and asked if he thought his vessel might not be a little better for a remodelling, and her speed increased if her bow were somewhat sharper?

"His fader," he replied, "had built it so; and as for sailing, he didn't know, sometimes we peats de English, and sometimes de English peats us; he couldn't tell."

The galliot has its advantages, however, stowing with great convenience, and being a most excellent sea-boat in heavy weather.

It was now forty-one days since we left New-York, and I was highly gratified in coming up on deck this morning to find Cronstadt in plain view, and the guardships at anchor a mile or two outside; for, notwithstanding our favourable passage, (vessels more frequently being fifty or sixty days.) I was most heartily tired of the monotony of the sea, and delighted at the speedy prospect of an soon alongside the guardships, and were immediately boarded by a posse of officers. The captain met them at the gangway, conducted them to the cabin, where wine and crackers were ready, the ship's papers placed upon the table, and surmounted by a douzeur in the shape of a twenty-five rouble note. The senior visitor coolly pocketed the cash, gave a hasty glance at the papers, retained such as his duty required, asked a few indifferent questions, and, after sealing the hatches, a few boxes, &c. allowed us to proceed. In a couple of hours more we had hauled in to the merchant's mole, and added another to the several hundred vessels that annually visit this port. ***

HOPE AND MEMORY.

O cease, busy fancy, to conjure up pleasures
That flit like bright phantoms o'er memory's glass,
And teach us to yearn for the forfeited treasures,
Which rise but to mock us, so swiftly they pass;
Which fade and dissolve into air, like a dream,
Or bubbles that glitter and break on the stream.
And yet it is sweet, in our moments of sadness,
To gaze on the picture of former delights,
Till bounding again to the measure of gladness,
The heart has forgotten the sorrow that blights;
And revels a moment in joys that are past,
But wakes to a bitterer pang than the last.
Yet hope shall illumine the gloom of our sorrow,
The cherub whose smile is a life-giving ray;
Whose flattering promise of brightness to-morrow
With ruddiness tinges the clouds of to-day.
Though memory's visions may heighten our pain,
Yet hope's sunny smile can assuage it again.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A SKETCH.

I AWAKENED as the first ray of the morning sun brightened the little window of my attic, and I was immediately conscious of a material change in the atmosphere. It was no longer the hot, close, confined air to which I had unwillingly consigned myself the preceding night. An aromatic freshness was diffused around—I seemed to inhale the breath of flowers. As I unclosed my eyelids, the very apartment appeared different—not that any thing was altered or removed, but an indescribable charm was thrown over every familiar object. The little paper covered chest, in the west corner of the room, my old well-worn writing desk, the two wooden chairs, even the sand on the floor, all seemed to have been touched by a fairy wand, and to have acquired a grace and beauty very foreign to them.

But it was in my own mind that I perceived the greatest revolution. A joyous, ecstatic feeling pervaded my soul—my heart was elevated with gratitude—a spirit of peace and happiness was enkindled within me. The enmities which had rankled my heart, the jealousies, the discontents, all the mortal feelings which had possessed me the night before, were fled. I felt good will and kindness towards all my fellow-beings, towards all living creatures. Urged by some irresistible impulse, I broke my little wire mouse-trap and set free its trembling prisoner, and I emptied the tumbler of fly-poison out of the window. As I looked out upon the world all seemed to have been touched by the same magic. The sky was a brighter blue, the sun shone with greater splendour, the trees and herbage wore a richer green. Nature appeared to have renewed her youthfulness—all was happiness.

I walked forth, and at every step some new wonder arrested my attention. As I passed near a dry-good store I observed a starved, meagre-looking man in the act of appropriating a roll of flannel to himself. The merchant likewise noticed him; but instead of the usual surly cry of "stop thief—seize him," he took the unhappy man gently by the hand and tendered him another parcel—thus fulfilling the command, "if a man take thy coat, give him thy cloak also." The man, affected by his kindness, uttered a tearful blessing and departed to clothe his wretched wife and children. Whilst I was still marvelling at this unprecedented scene, I met the editor of the Protestant, his face glowing with charity and toleration, linked arm in arm with the burly catholic. They accosted me in the most kindly manner, inviting me to go with them and witness the bonfire of all religious controversies. I now paused in my walk opposite a celebrated restaurateur's, and as I looked in at the door I was struck with the singular appearance of the tables. They were not covered with fish and poultry—there were no oyster patés or lobster salads—the beef à la mode, the mutton and capers, the boeuf rôti, the blankettes were all lacking—and in their place the choicest fruits, vegetables, confitures, etc. were tastefully arranged. What was more surprising, the company seemed to partake of this light food with as great or greater relish than I have ever seen them when devouring the gross flesh. Their conversation, too, seemed influenced by their diet—the most sparkling wit enlivened their discourse, and those whom I had heretofore beheld the dullest, were really brilliant. As I looked up at the sign above the door, that was also changed; instead of the representation of a red faced man, with napkin tucked under chin, and elbows on table, exercising his gastronomic powers, and having beneath him the words "we live to eat," I beheld a snow-white board with this quotation inscribed upon it:

"No flocks that range the valley free,
To slaughter I condemn;
Taught by the power which plies me,
I learn to pity them."

I pursued my walk, inquiring of all I met the cause of this wondrous change—none could inform me, though all appeared to have participated in it. Suddenly I was again interrupted. I beheld advancing a funeral procession. A band of grave, sedate men, yet of placid, philosophical countenances walked on either side of a car loaded with addresses to the legislature, pamphlets to the people, memorandums of lawyers' fees, unpaid college bills, supplications for a charter, etc. etc. As I stood aside to let them pass, I knew them for the professors of the rival medical colleges, and my good friend, Dr. —, informed me that they were hastening to bury animosities.

I had now reached the park, and on entering it I beheld a great crowd of women and children around the prison doors, which were thrown wide open; and there stood high constable Hays, with the mildest and most benignant aspect, marshalling forth the prisoners, and exclaiming, "depart ye in peace." The scene was truly overpowering—wives embracing their husbands, parents their children, children their parents, and all calling down blessings on that most happy day. I saw the constables too and police officers breaking their staffs of office and destroying their warrants. I entered the court; it was crowded to excess, and our excellent recorder was about to pronounce the doom of a forger. I listened to hear the usual sentence to fourteen years to the state prison—but no—with the bland and gentle smile of mercy, which so well becomes him, he bade the guilty one "go, and sin no more." I entered the common council chamber, and here the different order of things was still more marked. I saw our worthy board of aldermen drinking with great grout water gruel, and contemplating with pleased and affectionate looks, three or four sportive green turtles that played their innocent gambols in careless and happy security at their feet. That member, too, who but yesterday so bitterly denounced those "Of the nation of civilization,

Of swate botheration, and shilelagh law,"

was now clasping the hand of warmest friendship with one from the emerald isle.

I left the hall and proceeded through the city. I saw the butcher throw down the murderous knife, and take the pastoral crook of the shepherd. I saw the experimenter making science conducive to acts of mercy and tenderness. I observed the brokers closing their shops—men would no longer put out their money to usury, and Jacob's ladder (according to its present acception) lay broken and destroyed upon the earth. I saw youth venerating the experience of age, and age looking with indulgence on the levities of youth. I saw that the sacred bond of marriage was no longer harshly strained, or rudely torn asunder. It was no longer a galling chain, but a link of brightest flowers. I beheld the loveliest portion of creation arrayed in simplest garbs. No petty passion darkened their fair countenances. Envy, malice, scandal, all foolish vanities were excluded from their hearts. Goodness, beauty's brightest ornament, sparkled in their eyes. I was now joined by a dear and aged friend, and as I conversed with him, I beheld his countenance gradually changing, his cheek glowing with the roseate hue of youth, his mighty mind beaming through his eyes with renewed vigour, his silvery locks recovering their golden hue. In short, I beheld my friend as in his best and youthful days. While I was yet gazing in new surprise, a low and sweet sound, as if from a very great distance, broke upon my ear. I heard the sweetest music. Never did mortal embody such æræphic sounds. Suddenly a bright and dazzling light overspread the heavens, and at that instant a full choir of grateful voices proclaimed the millennium. θ.

A good book is the best of friends. You may be agreeably entertained by it when you have not a friend in whom you may confide. It does not reveal your secrets, and it teaches you wisdom.

STANZAS TO A FRIEND,
After a long separation.

BY IOLANTE.

THEY tell me thou art cold and changed, they say thou hast forgot
The friendship that once bound our hearts ere sorrow crossed our lot;
But when on thy familiar face I fix my saddened gaze,
And listen to that well-known voice, the echo of past days,
The pleasant memories of youth come thronging round my heart,
I think but of the friend thou wert and heed not what thou art.

And yet I cannot deem thy heart from friendship quite estranged,
Not always are the feelings chilled when most the mien is changed;
There is a sadness in thine eye, a shadow on thy brow,
Which tells me that the hand of care has done its work ere now.
And who by common laws would judge the heart that deeply grieves?
What eye may penetrate the veil that silent sorrow weaves?

Oh! when in after-life the heart from hollow friendship turns,
How often o'er its early dreams in bitterness it yearns;
How oft it pines with vain regret o'er memories of the past,
When all the gloom that dimmed its sky by April clouds were cast;
And then, when all too late, it learns how much more holy truth,
Than e'er again can bless our lot, was in the love of youth.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

THE facts contained in the following brief narrative have been obtained from a gentleman of this city. A part of them came within his own observation, and the others he derived from the parties with whom they occurred. We assure the reader that we have drawn upon the imagination for no portion of the adventures here related, and we feel convinced that our informant is incapable of practising upon us any deception.

He states that in the year 1835, when returning from Vera Cruz to London, in his Britannic majesty's ship Phæton, commanded by Captain Sturt, of the royal navy, they touched at St. Michaels, one of the Azores, a little cluster of islands belonging to the Portuguese, situated in the Atlantic Ocean, about equi-distant from Portugal and Newfoundland. These islands have a fine salubrious atmosphere, and abound with a great variety of fruits. Vessels in passing between Europe and America, frequently touch at them for supplies of various kinds. The object of the captain in calling was to procure some water. Our informant, anxious to examine the town of Punta del Gada, the capital of St. Michaels, obtained leave to go on shore for a few hours, the period for which the vessel was likely to be delayed. Among other places he visited a convent, where he purchased, for the purpose of presenting to his wife and daughters upon his return to London, some beautiful feather flowers, for the manufacture of which the ladies of this convent have long been celebrated. Upon going on board the vessel he found the captain was likely to be detained longer than was anticipated, and the young officers being pleased with our informant's flowery purchase, became desirous also of procuring some of these beautiful productions of vestal taste and ingenuity.

Accordingly the next day the captain accompanied them, together with our informant and Dr. Mackay, envoy from the court of St. James to Mexico, to the convent. Upon reaching it, they were shown into a room connected with one which the noviciates occupied, many of whom came to the grated windows to look at their visitors, and exchanged salutations, which, however, they did principally by gestures, as they could not speak the English language. Dr. Mackay spoke the Portuguese, and occasionally acted as interpreter.

One of the elder sisters of the establishment entered the room, bearing in her hands a large basket of the feather flowers. The instant she beheld Captain Sturt she let it fall to the floor, exclaiming with great vehemence,

"Oh! there's the wretch who stole away one of our sisters, and then suffered her to perish from want, in the streets of London!"

When her indignation had a little abated, the captain replied,

"Not quite so bad as all that, my good lady. 'Tis true, I stole away one of your nuns, but I can assure you she did not perish in the streets. She is now my wife, and is living respected and comfortable in London."

This statement was corroborated by Dr. Mackay and some of the officers; but the assurance did not appear to carry either conviction or quietude to the good lady, who could not readily forgive so heinous an offence as the running off with one of her sisters. Upon the young noviciates, however, when informed of the comfortable situation of the lost nun, the effect was very different. They returned to their grated windows, from which they had partly withdrawn upon hearing the exclamation of their eldest sister, and in the language of our informant, were not backward in giving the young officers to understand, that they did not think it a very horrible affair to be run away with!

After the return of the party on board the Phæton, Captain Sturt gratified their curiosity by a relation of the circumstances of the event which had made so deep an impression upon the feelings of the good sister of the convent.

Some twenty years before that time, when a lieutenant in the service, and but eighteen years of age, the vessel to which he was attached—the name not recollected by our informant—touched at the same island. The surgeon and captain, then Lieutenant Sturt, visited this convent, and both being thoughtless young men, and fond of adventures, they contrived to propose to two of the young nuns an elopement. Having no interpreter, and being unable to speak each other's language, it was no easy matter to settle the preliminaries of the affair. It was, however, hastily agreed, that if the officers would return at a certain hour of the night, the young vestals would elope with them, and take shelter in the vessel. Full of their romantic enterprise, our two knights were under the walls of the convent at the appointed hour. The nuns were equally punctual. In jumping from the window of the building, the lady who was pledged to Lieutenant Sturt unfortunately fell and broke her arm. He, therefore, promptly and humanely bequeathed his interest in the wounded girl to the surgeon, and seizing upon the intended partner of his medical friend, hurried with her to the boat—being closely pursued by the watch of the town—and placed her in safety on board the vessel. No sooner was the captain apprised of this adventure with his lieutenant and surgeon than, prompted by that sense of propriety which constitutes the chivalry of military life, he summoned them into his presence.

"You have now, sir," said he to the lieutenant, "either to marry this young woman instantly, or she shall be returned to the convent without delay. I will not suffer so great an injury to be inflicted upon her character as would result from her remaining on board the vessel for a single day, unless in the capacity of your wife. I give you half an hour, in which to make up your mind."

After a very brief interview with his trembling black-eyed nun, the lieutenant announced to the captain his determination of marrying her, whereupon the chaplain was summoned to his post, and the ceremony forthwith performed in the presence of the captain and officers, to the great gratification of the truant sister, inasmuch as it relieved her from a very unpleasant and embarrassing situation.

Early next morning, the magistrates of Punta del Gada visited the vessel, and demanded, by her maiden name, the restoration of the lost nun. The captain gave them his word of honour that he had no female by that name on board his vessel. Surprised and disappointed at this declaration, they returned to the shore, and the captain unfurling his sails, the white walls of the convent were soon lost to the view of the bridal nun.

From the statement of our informant it appears that this young lady had been placed in the convent by her father, contrary to her wishes and earnest entreaties. Her determination to leave it was, therefore, not the freak of the moment. She had long before avowed her unalterable resolution of escaping on the first opportunity. She felt, nevertheless, upon reaching London, where she was at once introduced to a highly respectable circle, much uneasiness in regard to the vows which she had taken while in the convent. Her father, too, who was a resident of St. Michael's, when informed of her elopement and marriage, had his compunctious visitings, in consequence of the disagreeable situation in which his caprice had placed his daughter. He, therefore, made an urgent appeal to the pope, and at last succeeded in obtaining his daughter's absolution from her vows, and a confirmation of her marriage.

When the Phæton reached London, our informant was introduced by Captain Sturt to his wife and daughter, the latter a beautiful and highly accomplished girl of eighteen. They were much amused at the description of the recent scene in the convent of Punta del Gada, and during the conversation upon the subject, the mother tacitly corroborated the statements of her husband, in regard to her escape from the nunnery and romantic marriage.

NATIONAL GUARD.

The French National Guard was organised in 1789, and comprehended all the males between twenty and sixty years of age; but we believe the age has since been restricted. It is divided into the Urban and the Rural, or National Guard of the city and country districts. No balloting is employed, but all within the regulated age are enrolled, and it may therefore be considered as a militia, embracing the greater part of the active population, officered by the government. The corps do not serve beyond their own districts, and in this respect resemble our local militia during the late war. The National Guard was estimated at three millions of persons when it was instituted in 1793, but we suppose it does not exceed half that number at present. It is, from its very nature, a popular body, and we rather wonder that means have not been taken by the Bourbons to extinguish it. In the early period of the revolution it rendered great service in Paris and elsewhere, by saving the cities from being pillaged by the licentious mobs. The first troop was organised on the thirteenth of July, 1789, an insurrection of the populace being expected. On the day following the Bastille was taken. The National Guard find their own clothes and subsistence, taking nothing from government but arms and ammunition. The duty of defending the city was performed by its members in rotation. It fought in defence of Paris, under the traitor Marmont, in 1814, with little zeal, however, and did not much retard its surrender. Napoleon never could depend upon the citizens of his capital. Distrust existed upon both sides. The Parisians could not forget the thirteenth Vendémiaire; the emperor could not forgive their turbulence, united, as he believed it to be, with the utmost cowardice; he held them in the most supreme contempt. Shortly after the disturbance of St. Denis, the National Guard of Paris was disbanded by Charles the tenth, for shouting on parade, as he passed the ranks, "Down with the ministers! Down with the jesuits!" but the men were deprived of their arms, with which they lately rendered good service under the auspices of their first commander, General Lafayette. In all the other parts of the kingdom it still existed. Besides, being raised by conscription, and returning after six years' service to their families, they never cease to regard themselves as citizens.

The uniform of the cavalry of the National Guard is blue, the old uniform, except the white mark and the button with the cock; white trousers for summer, blue for winter; the aiguillette of silver, with the contre-epaulette also of silver; the head-dress of black stuff, with silver lace; the shoulder-belt black, and about two inches wide; the waist-belt black, about an inch and a half in width; the cartouche-box black, with a silver rim; falling plumes of the three colours; a dress at once handsome and manly. On one side of the flag of the National Guard are the words Liberty, Equality, Public Order—27, 28, 29 July, 1830. On the other side the number of the legion. The flag is ornamented with silver fringe, but nothing else. How the hearts of the French must have leaped within them, when they saw these words again on their banners.

THE TRI-COLOUR COCKADE AND BREAST-KNOT.

Every man in Paris wears a tri-coloured cockade or breast-knot, or both. You may conceive, therefore, that the trade of the mercer is brisk; but the stock of red, blue, and white was soon exhausted. This was obviated by cutting broad silk of those colours into stripes, and sewing them together. Indeed, the expedient rendered necessary by the consumption would make you smile. For example, the tri-coloured flag hoisted on the Tuilleries consists (for it still hangs there) of pocket handkerchiefs, subscribed by the captors, pinned together. That which occupies the places of "white" is what I believe is termed cross-barred, checkered with white and red. Women wear, in some cases, blue bonnets, white gowns, and red ceintures, or other combinations of those colours.

THE KING OF THE FRENCH.

The Paris Journal des Debats speaks of the favourable impression which has been made by the popular demeanour of the new king. He walks abroad alone, in his surtout, with a round drab hat, and his umbrella in his hand, and is met in the streets and on the quays, undistinguished from the plainest citizen. Before the monarch was only seen in his gilt coach, drawn by six or eight horses, escorted by guards, and so forth.

NATIONAL SONGS.

Rouget de Lisle, the author of the Marseillois Hymn, sold on the sixteenth of August, the copy-right of no less than sixty national songs. The writer in the Washington Intelligencer, who lately called for an American anthem, would do well to apply to Rouget, whose muse is so prolific. The spirit of a republican effusion in French could be transfused without material loss.

ELECTION OF BISHOP.

The convention of the Protestant Episcopal church for the diocese of New-York, opened on Wednesday the sixth instant, with divine service. A sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Dorr. The Rev. Dr. Lyell was chosen president, Rev. Dr. Benjamin T. Onderdonk, secretary, and Rev. L. S. Ives, assistant secretary. The subject of most importance before the convention was the election of a bishop. A resolution was adopted, providing that the bishop who might be elected should be exempt from parochial duties, as soon as arrangements should be adopted to provide adequate funds for his support. On Thursday evening, pursuant to resolution, the convention assembled for the purpose of going into the election. After the prayers appointed for the occasion the votes were taken. Ninety-one clerical delegates attended. The votes of lay delegates amounted to ninety-two. Of these the Rev. Dr. Benjamin T. Onderdonk received one hundred and eight, and was consequently duly elected bishop of New-York.

The clerical votes were as follows—Onderdonk, fifty-two; Wainwright, twenty-one; Anthon, six; Brownell, one; Reed, one; Delancey, of Philadelphia, eight; Creighton, one; blank, one—total ninety-one. Laity—Onderdonk, fifty-six; Wainwright, seventeen; Anthon, seven; Delancey, twelve; M'Ilvaine, one.

There was no formal opposition to the election of the reverend gentleman on whom the choice has fallen. The scattering votes were merely expressions of individual preferences for the reverend candidates mentioned. Com. Adver.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK AND BOWERY THEATRES.

OPERA versus tragedy has been the order of the day at the Park theatre; an arrangement on the part of the management and Mrs. Austin, which we imagine very impolitic and hostile to the interests of that lady. Our city, although it contains a play-going public, nevertheless musters but two hundred thousand inhabitants; and if we fill the house of a favourite three times a week, and come out on his or her benefit when it happens, we do much, and much more than our neighbours; but when two favourites, such as Clara Fisher and Charles Kean, or Mrs. Austin and Mr. Forrest, appear in the same week, one will rob the other; and in this instance, the gentlemen have most ungallantly robbed the ladies. Mr. C. Kean however made the amende honorable; and appeared for Miss Fisher's benefit. Mr. Forrest's engagements have carried him hence; but doubtless his gallant countrymen will take care, as they always have done, to guard the interests of the fair vocalist at her approaching benefit. The "Caliph of Bagdad" has been produced, and we have never witnessed it performed much better. Barnes was irresistibly droll in the Cadi, but somewhat erratic in his dialogue; his tongue wandered prodigiously from "flying camels" and "flying coffins" to "Bagdad" and "Mecca," which towns he metamorphosed into persons, and endowed one with a beard! Placide never sang the charming buffo song with more point; nor ever had a more deserved encore. Mrs. Austin was in excellent voice, and what more need we say? Her claims on public favour appear to increase nightly.

On Saturday, the accumulated rain of two months descended, and we were uncertain whether to send for a coach or a boat to carry us to the theatre. Being determined that we would make one among the ten persons whom we expected to find musical enough to brave the elements in such a cause, we buttoned our coat resolutely, took our umbrella sulkily, and by dint of a well soaked coachman, and a pair of half drowned rat-like looking animals, we got to the theatre, and there we found, to our great astonishment, a goodly assembly of amateurs! Who can remember the Noah-like deluge which fell on that Saturday, and doubt the power of music? We felt that we had a brother in each man of the audience, and for the ladies our sensations were infinitely more warm. "Rob Roy" gave Mrs. Austin an opportunity of singing a couple of Scotch melodies which were rapturously encored; but the part of Diana is a mere vehicle for music. Barnes perhaps is as little at home in the Baillie as in any character he plays; but he can make one laugh in any thing.

"John of Paris" followed. Hilson has made the part of Mr. Potts his own. Placide's Chamberlain is always good; but Jones cannot do justice to John of Paris. Mrs. Austin both looks and acts the part of the Princess; and we never wish to hear Boieldieu's glorious finale to the first act, better executed than it was on this occasion. This species of opera proves the vast superiority of the musical establishment of the Park theatre. As a drama "John of Paris" is excellent; the audience never for a moment tire; it is replete with bustle and fun; and they are kept in perpetual laughter. There is one circumstance however which we feel bound to mention. Invariably at the close of the piece, when John of Paris declares himself to be the hereditary prince of France, the dramatis personæ visibly enjoy some joke, which is withheld from the audience; this is not fair, and we must insist upon the practice being discontinued, or that we be made a party to it. Mrs. Blake has got into an unpleasant mode of drawing her words in singing, and lagging in the time of her music, which the least attention may get rid of; witness her verse of the "Troubadour."

At the Bowery theatre, Madame Feron and Mrs. Knight have appeared in the "Exile," "Guy Mannering," and for the second time, in the "Marriage of Figaro." The meagre way in which the latter piece was represented has, we presume, induced the management to forbear attempting operas which require a chorus and a well organized band. On Friday, Mr. Plumer was advertised to play Henry Bertram in "Guy Mannering," instead of which, he sat in the boxes, and distributed angry placards touching the manager's conduct, and containing a refusal to act the character. Mr. Hamblin in this dilemma was kindly assisted by Mr. Walton of the Arch-street theatre, Philadelphia, who by chance happened to arrive. On the announcement by Mr. Hamblin of the fact that Mr. Plumer had been superseded, that person arose and addressed the audience; but he was compelled to leave the theatre. Now we have no desire, nor shall we be induced to enter into the merits of the case between Messrs. Hamblin and Plumer, of which we know nothing—but one observation we must make on the part of the public. Persons who assemble in a theatre, having paid a fixed price to see a drama, have no right to be troubled with the quarrels of the green-room. If the manager fails in producing the entertainment complete which he advertises, the onus lies on his shoulders, and to him the public will look; but if any actor thinks that he has a right to make the box of a theatre the rostrum from whence he may harangue on disputed matters, which solely appertain to his own private arrangements, he forgets the respect due to the audience, and sets up a precedent subversive of all order and propriety, which ought to be discontinued.

Mr. Walton received strong marks of approbation on his appearance, and throughout the piece. He gave the old Scotch ballad, "John Anderson, my Jo," with a good deal of expression, and without accompaniment. Madame Feron introduced several of her favourite songs, and Mrs. Knight sang "I've been roaming," very prettily, and some other ballads.

Blake, as Dandie Dinmont, had the northern brogue very correctly, and acted well; and the person who appeared as Fiorello on the first night, sang Bishop's bass song, written for the character of a gipsy robber, in a way which astonished us, after the miserable effect he had produced in the foregoing character. The defects of the band in a ballad opera, such as "Guy Mannering," were not felt so much as in the "Marriage of Figaro;" notwithstanding, in some of Madame Feron's songs, the trumpet part was played by a violin.

In the bills we perceived again in large letters, "Mr. Knight will preside at the piano-forte." Now the true meaning of this expression, as used in the programme of a concert or opera, is that the person sitting at the piano-forte will preside over the band; in short, that he is il maestro di capella. In the opera of the "Marriage of Figaro," we noticed that Mr. Segura actually presided over the band, and marked the time both to band and chorus, and Mr. Knight sat in such a position that Mr. Segura could not conveniently look at him without turning his head. Mr. Knight, it is true, by a graceful undulation of his person, convinced us from time to time that he felt the effects of melodious strains, and by that only could we recognise him as an official part of the band. On the evening of "Guy Mannering," he gave more unequivocal signs of activity; he sat in the same conspicuous situation at the piano, played Kelvin Grove for Mr. Walton, and presided over a drum which he held between his legs, and in several ballads we were duly sensible of his tattoo.

VALMONDI, OR THE TOMBS OF TERRORS.—This is the title of a new melo-drama which was produced for the first time on Monday evening at the Park theatre.

For pageantry and scenery this piece is very complete, immense pains having been bestowed in getting it up, and it really has been produced with magnificence. To give our readers an idea of the plot is out of our power. Take Faustus, Der Freischütz, and the Vampyre, to which you may add the Bottle Imp, and mix up their ingredients with gunpowder and blue and red fire, stir them well together, add thereto a little insipid dialogue, and you will find that you have cooked up Valmondi. The incantation scene is half Der Freischütz, half Macbeth. The music has been selected; but we noticed neither "Mynheer Van Dunk," nor "Brother Sons of Jove," among the glees, many of which were very pretty, particularly the serenade, which a gentleman whom we sat next to, assured us belonged to the opera of Clari; but this we cannot vouch for.

The acting generally was excellent. Mr. Barry exerted himself greatly; but in the character of Valmondi there is no novelty, and no vigour of design. The only incident which can bear the name of novelty, is Valmondi presenting a rose to a lady, which by its fragrance inclines her to love him, contrary to nature; but this is to be found in the French opera "Le Petit Chaperon Rouge," only the symbol is different. Richings played Malec admirably; he is not so pleasant a fiend as Mephistophiles, because not so intellectual. The scene of a ruined abbey and moonlight, is a grand and striking affair; the whole of the tomb of terrors and devilry admirably managed, and forming a striking contrast to the incantation scene of Weber at this theatre, which consists of a few non-descripts and a squib of gunpowder, with a great deal of noise, but is nevertheless quite as susceptible of effect if well done.

Although it seems to be a part of the arcana of managers never to bestow great pains and expense upon a good piece, yet nevertheless the arrangements of this melo-drama would make any thing go down. The scenery, processions, and decorations, alone are worth the price of admission. E.

Steam-boat explosions.—The frequency with which these accidents have occurred of late, are calculated to awaken general and deep attention to the causes from which they originate. A momentary excitement, which subsides in a few hours after a striking narrative of the loss of lives and property has just been listened to with fearful interest, is not sufficient to awaken those feelings and incite those efforts, without which it is in vain to hope for an end to their grievous occurrence. Judgment must be called in to the aid of feeling—active benevolence must be roused—a benevolence which is not satisfied with shedding tears over a tale of distress, but which will be up and doing, and exerting every nerve, and continuing restless and sleepless until it has accomplished its object. The cause must be ascertained of these so frequent calamities—nor is it hidden in a fathomless depth, nor placed beyond control. It can and should be reached, and removed. It is identified with carelessness on the part of the public, and with misplaced, wretched, and almost criminal parsimony, on the part of proprietors of steam engines, and with injurious legislation on the part of government. The people should not countenance a foolish competition for speed of execution in steam-propelling power. Owners of boats and engines should have some consideration for the lives and property constantly entrusted to their charge, and not jeopardize both, as well as their own permanent interest, by an over-anxious desire to save a few dollars in the purchase of machinery, in the payment of wages, or in the number and character of their overseers and workmen. And lastly, the national legislature should not, by injudicious restrictions, virtually prohibit the employment of the most safe and enduring materials requisite to the proper construction of machinery. All these causes, combined, have been instrumental in producing the melancholy disasters which have so often lent a fearful interest to the catalogue of passing events. We made a suggestion, some two months since, that a supervisor should be appointed by the proper authorities, to make a constant and periodical examination of the different steam powers in operation in our city and on our rivers. Is it not worthy of attention?

Token of Regard.—This unassuming title is prefixed to a neat volume of instructive and intelligible prelections, delivered to his pupils by Mr. James M. Garnett, principal of the Elm-wood school. As a writer the author has long since recommended himself favourably to the public by his valuable strictures on female education. His humane principles, sound judgment, and captivating style, bespeak a mind possessed of qualities peculiarly fitted for discharging the duties of a teacher with ability and success. The present production will not detract from his well-earned reputation. We may safely recommend it to the attention of all interested in the education of youth.

Died suddenly, on Friday the eighth instant, at the residence of Mahlon M. Levis, near Philadelphia, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, James D. Hopkins, second son of George F. Hopkins, of this city.

THE MOTHER'S PARTING.

BY ISIDORA.

COME nearer, boy, for I have nerved my heart—
One fond, long, last embrace, and then we part,
My loved one! In that gay and happy home
To which they bear thee, will thy thoughts e'er roam
To this lone valley, where the blessed light
Of heaven first dawn'd upon thy infant sight;
To the low roof, bright stream, and woodland wild,
Where thou hast roved a free and happy child?
Yes, happy—for the cares, the penury
Which press'd thy mother, have not injured thee;
For I have shielded thee, my cherish'd child,
And thou hast bloomed a rose amidst the wild,
A green spot in the desert, a bright sun
Which gaily gilded all it shone upon.
And must I send thee forth in tender years,
To lack the fostering of a mother's cares?
Will strangers watch o'er thee, as I have done;
Cherish, and guard, and smile on thee, my son?
Ah! who will mark thy wayward gambols now,
And bear thy wild caprice with placid brow?
If sickness comes, ah! who will guard thy bed,
And smooth the pillow for thy aching head;
And lull thee with a song, and o'er thy sleep
With silent prayer a sleepless vigil keep?
Vain thoughts! the offspring of a mother's fears,
I know kind hands will guide thy opening years;
Kind hearts will cherish my beloved one—
But who can solace me when thou art gone?
Oh! I shall muse on that dark meaning eye,
Where worlds of latent thought and feeling lie,
In fancy gaze upon that noble brow—
And kiss thy rosy cheek and lip, as now.
How I shall miss thy voice at early dawn,
Calling on me to share the rising morn!
Thy ringing laugh, when hidden from my eye,
Its sound betrayed thy leafy ambush nigh.
But I shall miss thee most at twilight hour,
When the cool breeze of evening shuts the flower
Then, wearied with thy wandering and thy play,
It is thy wont to come, thy boon to lay
Upon thy mother's knee, and sink to rest,
Thy fair head pillowed on her anxious breast,
Thy drowsy accents lisping out thy prayer,
Sinless as seraph's, and thyself as fair.
When next I clasp thee on thy shaded cheek,
Mature hues the lapse of time will speak,
And lines of thought upon thy altered brow
May dim the sunshine that illumed it now;
And deeper tones and a more serious smile,
May meet my ear and eye, but not beguile
A mother's heart, the chord that vibrates there,
Would give the alarm in spite of eye or ear.
Thy very step, though altered, nay, thy breath
Would rouse it from the oblivious clasp of death.
Oh, boy! if e'er thou reachest manhood's years
Think of thy mother's sacrifice—her tears—
Her anxious hours—her love's unswerving power—
And oh! forget not this her trying hour!
None, save a mother's heart, would e'er forego
Her pride—her joy—the solace of her woe:
The unconscious prattler at a father's tomb—
Her sole companion in her hours of gloom—
Light of my eye and idol of my heart,
Nought save a mother's love could bid thee part.
Self-sacrificing love, that can resign
Its own delight, its welfare find in thine.
None, save a mother's energy, could part
The link that twines so closely round the heart
But to secure thy welfare, rescue thee
From the dark shadows that envelope me.
I thus have nerved my heart, and it is done,
And now, ye heavenly powers! protect my son.

POPULAR TALES.

THE EVE OF SAINT ANDREW.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

Among the most remarkable of the Indian nations inhabiting the continent of North America, was the tribe of the Natchez of the Mississippi, who occupied the site of the present town of that name, and the surrounding country. In appearance, manners, habits, and religion, they differed from all the other tribes, and had made far greater advances in civilization. Their chief, or Sun, as he was called, was entirely despotic; their complexions were different from those of the northern Indians; they worshipped the Sun, and in various other points so strongly resembled the natives of Mexico, that there appears little reason to doubt that the Natchez were the parent stock whence the Mexicans derived their descent. The traditions of the latter all point to an emigration from the north; and in tracing the origin of the peopling of the new world, every fact, historical, geographical, and traditional, seems to demonstrate that the progress must have been from the north to the south.

The situation of Natchez, high, healthy, and commanding, early attracted the attention of the French, who built a fort, called Rosalie, and formed a settlement under its protection. Fort Rosalie was situated on a hill, about two hundred feet above the Mississippi, at the foot of which was the landing place. It was surrounded only by a stockade. On the middle of the hill, near the houses of the inhabitants, stood the magazine, which commanded a view of the vast plains of the Mississippi, exhibiting a prospect full of grandeur and beauty; then a paradise of nature, now a garden rich in fruits and cultivated plantations. Of all the nations of Europe that have usurped the inheritance of the new world, it is due to truth, justice, and humanity to state that the French have the least to answer for in their intercourse with the natives. Wherever that gallant people go, they seem to carry with them the seeds of civilization and politeness; and it is not too much to say that, few as they are, the only instances of a cordial friendship and good understanding between the red men and the white are to be found in the intercourse of the natives of France with the aborigines of the new world. Courtesy wins its way every where; and even the rude barbarians of North America, the most wild, the most revengeful, and the most impracticable of the human race, were attracted into habits of some intimacy by the influence of example and kindness. On the Mississippi, at Detroit, Montreal, and Quebec, are still to be seen the few and solitary examples of white men and Indians having lived in near neighbourhood and constant intercourse with each other, without that sad and apparently mysterious result which, every where else on this great continent, has followed the association; I mean the sure and slow extinction of the latter. Much of this is owing to courtesy, much to the sober habits of the French, and much more perhaps to the influence of a religion, which, though often calumniated, exercises a dominion over the minds of untutored savages, at least far more powerful, and permit us to say, far more salutary, than has hitherto resulted from the influence of any other.

The French had settled at Natchez at an early period after their first arrival in Louisiana, without opposition from the natives, who received them in a friendly manner, and, on one occasion, saved the colony from starving, by assisting it with provisions during a period of great severity. In the year 1723, the imprudence or cowardice of a soldier in calling out murder, and causing the guard to fire upon and wound an old chief, occasioned for a while an interruption of this good understanding. The Natchez retaliated by killing one or two Frenchmen, and attacking Fort St. Catherine; but the war lasted only four days, and, from that time until the period in which our relation commences, there was no interruption of the friendship subsisting between the Indians and the strangers.

The Sieur de Choptart had been displaced from the command of the post at Natchez, on account of his having committed various acts of injustice towards his own people, as well as the savages. However he had made a voyage down to New-Orleans, where he boasted so much of his successful administration, and displayed such magnificent views of the future, that he completely imposed on the commandant general, M. Périer, who reinstated him in his command. The Sieur de Choptart was a rare compound of vanity, frivolity, and courage, such as is, perhaps, to be found no where else but among his countrymen. He had a vast opinion of himself, a thorough contempt for the Indians, and had determined in his own mind to immortalize his name, by becoming the founder of a great empire. The Sieur was, besides, a passionate, self-willed braggadocio, who never followed the advice of any person whatever; and if you wanted to be sure of his making a blunder, it was only necessary to point out to him the right way; it was then reduced to a certainty that he would go wrong. He was, moreover, excessively vain of his person and accomplishments; and it was his firm opinion, that not one of the copper-coloured ladies of the Natchez could view him with indifference. In short, nothing redeemed him from the penalty of being laughed at and despised, but his extraordinary contempt of danger. He was absolutely born without fear, and his courage was entirely distinct from the sentiment. It was neither the apprehension of shame, nor the love of glory; it was the total absence of a feeling common to all animals, except occasionally a lusus nature, like the Sieur de Choptart. A man may be hated, abhorred, and avoided; but if he has courage, it is impossible to despise him.

On taking possession of his honours a second time, the Sieur de Choptart determined to become the founder of a city, that should excel all others past, present, and future, and call it after himself. In pursuance of this lofty conception, he examined the grounds in the neighbourhood of Fort Rosalie, but found no spot suitable to the grandeur of his plans and the magnitude of his city. The Sieur then extended his views beyond the grounds occupied by the French settlers, and at length fixed upon the village of the White Apple, distant about two leagues, and occupying an area of nearly a square league. The moment this magnificent idea came across him, he looked in the glass with special complacency, cut two or three capers, and sent for the Sun of the village of the White Apple to come to the fort forthwith.

When the Sun arrived, the Sieur de Choptart began to talk about the future glories of the empire he was about to found, and to tell him how, in the course of so many moons, the white people would spread to the great ocean in the west, and drive the Indians head-foremost into the salt lake. It was, therefore, but just and proper that he and his people should jog off in time, and look out for some other place for their village, for he was going to found a great city on the very spot. A cloud passed over the face of the Sun, when he heard this consoling prophecy of the Sieur de Choptart, and deepened into a thunder storm, as the chief listened to the satisfactory conclusion of this eloquent harangue. The Natchez asserted that they were the descendants of the Sun, and in all North America there was not a tribe that held their heads higher than they. They preferred death to slavery in any other form than the despotic will of their chief.

The Sun of the White Apple being, like all savages, a reasonable person, concluded in his own mind that the Sieur was one also, and that if he was talked to in a reasonable manner, he would abandon this gigantic idea of founding a great city and driving all the red men into the great salt lake. He accordingly quelled his proud indignation, and answered, as he thought very much to the purpose, as follows:

"Brother, my ancestors have lived in the village of the Apple as many years as there are hairs in your long queue; it is good, therefore, that we continue there still."

The Sieur de Choptart waxed wrath at this non sequitur of the Sun, and especially at the allusion to his long queue, on which he most especially valued himself.

"Monsieur Sol," cried he, "if you don't remove from the village of the Apple in five days, you shall repent it, though you had lived there as many years as there are hairs in the tail of the great bear."

"But, my brother," answered the Sun with great gravity and decorum, "when the white men came here first, they told us there was land enough for us all; that the same sun would shine on the red men and them, and all would walk quietly in the same path. Will my brother cross his track and tell lies?"

Here the Sieur interrupted him, saying there was no use in talking, what he had to do was to obey, and that would be better than all the argument in the world. The commandant then absolutely snorted with self-importance, and went away without ceremony to see his pretty little Indian wife, and astonish her with his gigantic views. Tellatee was the daughter of one of the chiefs of the Tonicas, and was known in the tribe as the Little Rattle Snake, on account of the brightness of her eyes. The chief of the Apple village withdrew without any visible emotion, saying, with an appearance of great indifference, that he would go and consult his people, and hold a council.

He accordingly assembled a council of the wise men of the village, where, after a deal of long speeches, they agreed upon a representation to the commandant. Accordingly they sent him word that the corn which they had planted was but just coming up, that all the hens were laying their eggs; and that if they quitted their village now, all the chickens and corn would be lost both to the French and themselves, as the former were not sufficiently numerous to weed and take care of the corn. This seemed indeed a reasonable thing enough; but the Sieur was not a man to be deceived by reasons, let them be ever so good. His reply was, that if they did not obey and depart in the time prescribed, he would beat them into mummies.

Another council of the wise men of the Apple village was convened to consider of this alternative. One of the sages proposed that they should offer to pay the Sieur in a certain number of moons, as many baskets of corn and as many fowls as there were huts in the village, provided he would permit them to remain to gather in their corn. The proposition was approved, and the Sun of the Apple again made his appearance before the mighty and potent commandant of a mud fort mounting three swivels. That august little potentate was pleased to accede to this offer, he being exceedingly fond of chickens and corn.

"But listen, Monsieur Sol," said he, "I grant your request, not out of complaisance to the corn and chickens, both which I hold to be utterly beneath my regard, but from the affection I bear to my dear friends the people of the Apple, who have always been the very good friends of the French."

"Hugh!" quoth the Sun of the Apple, who, though he did not believe a word of this speech, received it with great gravity, and appeared to be highly satisfied with his noble sentiments.

He returned to his village, again assembled the council and communicated the result of his mission, which was received in silent indignation. After a silence of some minutes the Sun proceeded to open himself to his people. He told them it appeared necessary to withdraw themselves from the tyranny of the white men, who, in proportion as they increased in strength, increased in their violent exactions. He reminded them of the war lately made upon them in violation of the solemn peace which had subsisted ever since the first coming of the French, and that nothing was now left them but to take a bloody revenge, and, at the same time, release themselves from the payment of the unjust tribute which the commandant had obliged them to offer. This enterprise called for the utmost secrecy and the most consummate art, to cajole the French chief, and throw him entirely off his guard. He concluded by saying that the affair required some time to reflect upon before it was laid before the Grand Sun and his council, and dismissed them with an assurance that they would be called together again in a few days to determine finally what was to be done.

In about a week he summoned them again, during which time the old men had consulted together, and come to an unanimous conclusion to unite in the entire destruction of all the French in Louisiana. The Sun addressed them as follows:

"You have had full time to consider the proposal I made you some time ago. I therefore desire you to suggest the best means of getting rid of these bad neighbours."

The oldest man then rose and spoke to the following effect:

"We have long seen that the neighbourhood of the French does us more harm than good. We who are old men know this; but the young men are blind and see it not. The wares of the French yield great pleasure to the young people; but what do they do, but debauch the young women with the love of trinkets, and taint the blood of the nation, and make them vain and idle? It is the same with the young men; and the married men must work hard to maintain their families and enable the children to dress fine and do nothing. Before the French came we were men, we were content with what we had, we walked every path without fear. But now we go half bent, we cannot stand straight, we go groping along afraid of meeting with thorns and briars, we walk like slaves, and shall soon be so, because we are treated as such already. When they are strong enough they will be like wolves in packs; they will no longer walk in the night, they will attack men. When our young people commit the least fault they will tie them to a post and whip them as they do the negroes. Have they not already done this to one of our young men, and is not death better than whipping?"

He paused awhile to take breath, and then proceeded:

"What do we wait for? Shall we go to sleep, and when we wake find that the white people have multiplied like mosquitoes, so that we can no longer oppose them? What will the Choctaws, the Tonicas, the Chickasaws, and the Padoucas say of us Natchez, who pass for the wisest of all the red men? They will say we cannot see as far as the ground mole. Why then wait we any longer? Let us set about freeing ourselves, and show we are men, who are satisfied with what we are and what we have, without working like slaves. From this day let us set about it. Order our women to get ready our provisions without telling them the reason. Go and carry the pipe of peace to all the nations of this country. Tell them that though they are at a distance, they will take their turn when we are made slaves, and that the only way is to help us before it becomes necessary to help themselves. Let them know that if they join us we can cut off in one day, and one hour, all the French in the country to a man. The day shall be that on which we are to bring in to the commandant our corn and chickens; the hour shall be the quarter of the day. Let the warriors go armed, with their contributions, as if going to hunt, and so manage that to every Frenchman in a French house there shall be two or three Natchez. We will ask to borrow arms and ammunition for a great hunting match, to provide for a great feast, and promise to bring them plenty of meat. The firing at the commandant's house shall be the signal to fall at once upon the French, and kill every soul—man, woman, and child. Thus shall those who live in the great French village, on the great river down below, be for ever discouraged from coming to settle here."

The old man then proceeded to disclose the particulars of his plan. He proposed that a bundle of rods, containing precisely the same number with one reserved by themselves, should be sent to each of the nations which should unite in the destruction of the whites, indicating the number of days that were to elapse previous to striking the blow, that all might strike at one and the same time. To avoid mistakes and be exact in pulling out a rod every day, breaking it and throwing it away, it was necessary to give these messages and bundles in charge of a person of great prudence. He ceased and sat down.

This plan was approved by the council unanimously, and ratified by the Sun of the Apple. The next thing was to obtain the co-operation of the Grand Sun of all the Natchez, together with the petty Suns, in which case the nations to a man would implicitly obey. It was agreed to keep the whole a secret from the women, not excepting the female Suns or princesses, and to be careful not to give them the least hint or suspicion of their design. The Grand Sun, or principal chief of the tribe of the Natchez, was a youth of no experience in the world, and had very little intercourse with the French; but the Sun of the Apple was, on the contrary, a wise chief and of great authority. He easily gained over the Grand Sun to favour the project.

He told him of the necessity of taking this decisive step, in order to prevent the total ruin and extirpation of his people, who otherwise would in a little time be driven from their ancient inheritance. That the plan was so well arranged it was impossible to fail of success, and that the commandant of the fort was hated by his own people, almost as much as by themselves, and would in all probability fall an easy victim. As long, he added, as the Grand Sun, his father, and the Stung Serpent, his uncle, lived, the commandant of the fort durst not undertake any thing against them, because the great chief of the French was their friend; but he being young and unknown, would be despised; his only remedy was to assist them in getting rid of the French in the manner projected by the wise old men.

The Grand Sun being thus secured, the plan was agreed upon, that on the day following the petty Suns should come in the morning, as if to salute their chief, who would order them to repair to the Sun of the Apple, without explaining himself to any one. This was accordingly done, and the eloquence of the Sun of the Apple easily wrought them to his purpose. A council of Suns and aged persons of distinction, who could all be depended on, was formed; and aged warriors appointed on embassies to bear the bundles of rods to the different nations who were to join in the confederacy. They and the guard which accompanied them were bound by the most solemn oaths, guaranteed by the punishment of death, not to disclose to any one the object of these missions. The ambassadors then proceeded on their errand, without the notice or knowledge of the French commandant or any of his people.

But notwithstanding the profound art and secrecy with which these proceedings had been taken, they had excited the notice and awakened the curiosity of the female Suns or princesses, who, by the customs of the tribe, had a right to demand to be informed of all the public affairs.

The young Grand female Sun was a girl scarcely eighteen years of age; she therefore had little experience, and took no interest in the business. But the mother of the Grand Sun was a woman of great cunning and abilities, called the Strong Arm, who had a high opinion of herself, and was offended at being kept in the dark. She accordingly sought an interview with her son, and expressed her suspicions, as well as her displeasure, at being treated as a baby, and thought unworthy of the keeping of a secret. The young chief assured her that the deputation of chiefs and nobles was only to brighten the chain of friendship between the Natchez and some of the Indian nations who thought themselves neglected. The Strong Arm was not satisfied with this explanation, as she perceived no necessity for keeping such a measure a secret, and when, on the return of the embassies, a council was held privately, instead of in public, as was always the custom on such occasions, her indignation and curiosity became particularly troublesome. She would have broken out into reproaches had she not been restrained by the hope of gaining the information she coveted without coming to a direct quarrel with the chiefs, and thus perhaps losing all chance of getting at the secret which tormented her. But all her endeavours failed, one after another, until her vexation became extreme, and she was on the point of coming to a rupture with the chiefs, when, luckily for the French in Louisiana, she resolved on a plan for getting at the secret, which proved successful.

One day she prevailed upon her son to accompany her to a neighbouring Indian village to visit a sick relative, and, that she might not want opportunity, led him far about through the most retired paths. On her way she took occasion to reproach him bitterly with the insulting secrecy he and the other chiefs had observed towards her, whom they had hitherto consulted on all occasions, and whose advice had often saved the nation from great perils. She insisted on her right as a princess, and more especially as his mother, to know what plan was in operation; and she added, that though she had once been the wife of a Frenchman, her own blood and colour and kindred were far dearer to her than those strangers. He need not, therefore, apprehend that she would ever betray him to the French, if it was, as she believed it was, against them he was plotting.

Stung with the reproaches which accompanied this harangue, the young chief replied that it was not usual to reveal what the old men in council had once resolved upon, and that he, being the Grand Sun, the supreme chief of the nation, ought, least of all, to set a bad example in this respect. Neither his own wife nor his sisters knew what was going forward, and it was no insult to her to be kept ignorant of what none of the princesses knew.

"But since," added he evasively, "since you know the whole affair, I need not inform you any farther. You know as much as I do, and I have only to warn you to hold your tongue to the French."

The artful mother having gained the clue, then proceeded to unwind the web of secrecy, which the young man was too weak to hold fast. She was not curious, she said, to know against whom their plans were to operate; but as it was against the French, she was afraid they would not prove effectual. The French were brave and skilful and watchful; they could influence by their presents all the surrounding nations of Indians, and had resources which the red men were entirely without. She hoped that they were sufficiently guarded against all these contingencies.

The Grand Sun, being young and of little experience, and moreover anxious to prove that their plot must certainly succeed, now unwarily proceeded to detail the information she wanted for. He assured her that all the nations of Louisiana approved the design, and had promised to fall on the French in their vicinity on the very same day, and at length communicated to her the secret of the bundle of rods, which was deposited in the great temple, in a situation which he described. The Strong Arm being thus informed of the whole affair, which she affected highly to approve, said no more on the subject. But, from that time forward, she thought of nothing but the means of defeating this bloody conspiracy, without exposing herself, her son, and her tribe to certain destruction.

The Strong Arm had formerly been the wife of a young Frenchman, whom she loved with great ardour and constancy, and who was killed by the Natchez in revenge for the death of one of their chiefs, who was shot by a soldier of the garrison of fort Rosalie. The Strong Arm never forgave her tribe for this; yet still she was the mother of the Grand Sun of the Natchez. The possession of the secret she had wheedled out of the weak and inexperienced young man, proved a torment to her. She loved the French, for her husband was of that nation; she hated her tribe, for they had murdered that husband; but she was the mother of the Grand Sun, the supreme head of the nation, and it would be bringing herself and him to disgrace, if not to death, were she to disclose the scheme which was now approaching its consummation.

Hesitating between these conflicting duties and feelings, the Strong Arm, at length one day meeting a soldier of the garrison of fort Rosalie, desired him to go and tell the commandant that the Natchez had lost their senses, and that he must be on his guard and repair his fortifications, and by thus shewing his mistrust, discourage them from taking any measures against them. The soldier went and delivered the message, but, according to the request of the Strong Arm, not as from her but himself. The Sieur de Chopart had such a high opinion of himself, and such a low one of his neighbours, the Natchez, together with all the rest of the red men, that he treated this intimation with the most lofty contempt. He swore he would not show himself a fool and a coward, by either repairing his fort or taking any new precautions. He treated the whole affair as the idle panic of a blockhead, and concluded by putting the poor soldier in irons.

The Indian princess was exceedingly mortified, as well as provoked, at the foolhardiness of the fantastic commandant, and took the first opportunity of repeating the same caution by the mouths of some young women whom she sent for that purpose. The Sieur de Chopart was too gallant to put them in irons; but he snapped his fingers, cut two or three capers, and swore that he was a match for the Grand Sun, the Sun of the Apple, and all the other Suns in the universe. "There is nothing to fear from fellows who wear no whiskers," quoth he, as he contemplated his gallant mustaches in the glass. After this the Strong Arm contrived many other ways to put the commandant on his guard, but finding his folly insuperable, and that he resented all hints, cautions, and innuendoes, as insults, and clapped their authors in irons, she, as the best mode of preventing at least the entire destruction of the French in the province of Louisiana, determined on the following bold plan.

The bundle of sticks, which was to regulate the concerted movements of all the confederate nations, was carefully deposited in the great temple of the Sun, and it was the duty of one of the wisest of the old men to see every day that one of the sticks was withdrawn from the rest, broken, and cast away. Her design was to abstract some of the rods, and thus destroy the concert of action, by bringing on the catastrophe at Fort Rosalie so much sooner than elsewhere, that the other French settlements might hear of it, and take measures for their safety. The task was one of great difficulty and danger, for, beyond doubt, a discovery would lead to her utter ruin. Circumstances favoured her design. About this time happened a phenomenon that frightened the whole province, and drew the alarmed attention of the Natchez, who were even more superstitious than Indians usually are.

Every morning, for the space of eight days in succession, a loud rumbling noise was heard from the sea, as far as the Illinois. It arose in the west in the morning, and passed onward to the east; in the afternoon it was distinguished returning with incredible swiftness to the westward. It seemed equally on the land and on the water; yet there was no agitation visible on either, and a dead calm reigned all around in every direction. This mysterious noise appalled the Natchez, and there were among them more than one old man, who considered it an omen to dissuade them from any further prosecution of their design against the French. Others again insisted that it was a signal for the destruction of the white men, vouchsafed by the Great Sun as an encouragement for his people to persevere. The coincidence, accidental as it must be, of great or singular natural phenomena with great moral or political events, is one of the prime sources of superstition. The mysterious noise was, at the end of eight days, followed by the most furious storm ever known in Louisiana. It lasted three days, and having arisen from the south-west and north-east, it passed over all the settlements along the Mississippi, being felt in some places, however, more than in others. Within the sweep of the hurricane, nothing was left standing, either of the work of nature or of man. The trees were torn up by the roots, and shattered in pieces; the reeds, the grass, and the lowest products of the earth, were all laid flat to the ground, bruised and destroyed. Even the tremendous current of the mighty father of rivers was stayed, and his tide, turning as it were back upon itself, raised the waters upwards of fifteen feet above the ordinary flow of the sea.

The high land on which the fort of Rosalie and the surrounding villages of the Natchez were situated saved them from the fury of the hurricane, which, apparently being turned aside by the obstruction of the hills, passed just along the skirts of the settlements, and shook without overturning the houses. In the gloom and consternation occasioned by these awful visitations, while the fears of the Natchez occupied their whole attention and confined them to their houses, the Strong Arm sought and found an opportunity of putting her design into execution. In the dead of the night, when the torrent of air swept by at a little distance, mastering every thing in its course, and rocking the fragile tenements which the Natchez had erected for themselves and their gods, the Indian princess stole towards the temple where the bundle of rods was deposited. There were neither bolts nor locks, for it is only among civilized men that the abodes of the deity need such safeguards. She entered the temple, where all was dark and silent, save the distant roaring of the winds, and the creaking of the edifice. She groped her way to the spot where the Grand Sun had told her the bundle of rods was placed, and, after a considerable search, at length grasped them in her hand. Hesitating for a few moments, between the desire of taking away a sufficient number to give the necessary warning to the other settlements, and the fear of leaving so few as to make the diminution apparent, she contented herself with withdrawing twelve rods, and was hastening like the wind towards the door of the temple, when her hand, not however that which held the rods, was suddenly grasped with a hard, firm gripe. Not a shriek, not a word did she utter, and even the pulses of her heart were silent.

"Tis the hand of a woman," said a voice, which the Strong Arm recognised as that of the old chief appointed to watch the bundle of rods, and break one of them each day—"Who art thou, and what brought thee here?"

The Strong Arm had taken her resolution—"I came hither," said she, "to ask of the Great Sun, the protector of the Natchez, to preserve his people and their inheritance in this hour of peril." "Good," said the unsuspecting old man, "may the prayer of the Strong Arm be heard," and he loosed her hand, and suffered her to pass on.

The Indian princess flew like the wind to the house she inhabited alone, and threw the rods into the fire which she had kindled, where they were quickly consumed. The next day, when the old chief came to take away another rod from the bundle he thought for a moment that it had suddenly diminished; but it was a momentary suspicion; he neglected to count those that remained, and the deed of the Strong Arm was never discovered. After this she still continued to repeat her hints and warnings to the soldiers of the garrison, who, through apprehension of being put in irons by the governor of Fort Rosalie, never delivered her messages. She went so far as to assure the sub-lieutenant that the Natchez were mad, and snuffed blood; but the infatuated Sieur de Chopart paid no more attention to him than to the others. On the very night preceding the attempt of the Indians, the Sieur went on a party of pleasure with several of his officers to the grand village of the Natchez, which was at some distance from Fort Rosalie. Here he danced and sung, and played off the most gallant evolutions, insulting the Indian warriors by swearing he would one day or other drive them like a flock of wild turkeys into the reeds, and provoking the women by divers antics, and unseemly freedoms of speech as well as action. He did not return till daylight, when he received, through the agency of the Strong Arm, certain intimation of what was just about to happen.

Instead of taking the necessary precautions to avoid the catastrophe, this infatuated man, flustered with the night's debauch, committed another imprudence to consummate his list of follies. He ordered his interpreter to go forthwith to the Grand Sun, and demanded of him if it was true that he intended to come at the head of his warriors and kill all the French, as he had been informed. The Grand Sun swore by the Great Serpent he had no such intention.

"I knew it," said the Sieur de Chopart, when the interpreter returned with this satisfactory reply; "I knew it, and here I swear by St. Louis, and half a hundred other saints, if necessary, I will cut off the ears of any person that from this time forward repeats such nonsense."

At length the decisive moment arrived, when the old chief informed the council that he had broken the last rod. It was on the eve of St. Andrew, exactly one hundred years ago, that the chiefs, having gathered the stipulated tribute of corn and fowls, proceeded on their way to fort Rosalie, as if to deliver it according to their agreement with the commandant. They found the garrison without their arms, the officers absent from duty, carelessly strolling about, and every thing, as it were, prepared to their purpose. The Sieur de Chopart, to show his contempt for the Indians, as well as for the advice he had from time to time received, had encouraged a total relaxation of discipline, so that even if the plans of the Natchez had not been laid with such consummate art, and conducted with such secrecy, they could hardly have failed of complete success.

The Natchez were permitted to come into the fort and deposit their tribute, after which they begged the loan of arms and ammunition for the great hunt they were going upon, promising to share their meat with the French when they came back. The Sieur de Chopart was in such good humour at the sight of the corn and fowls, that he granted their request with the best grace in the world. The Indians received the guns and loaded them without exciting the least suspicion.

It is a curious historical fact, that among those who engaged in this conspiracy there was but one man that was not a chief. The whole scheme had been kept secret, not only from the women, but from the common people likewise; and the reason of this single exception was that the chiefs had such an utter contempt for the Sieur de Chopart, that not one of them would condescend to kill him. They therefore armed this man with a wooden hatchet, and took him with them for the sole purpose of knocking the commandant on the head. The town and fort were now filled with Indians, with arms in their hands, thirsting for revenge, and only waiting the signal for the bloody business. The arrival of the Grand Sun and his party was quickly followed by the firing of three guns. This was the signal, and the answering shots from different quarters first roused the Sieur de Chopart to a sense of his consummate folly. Arming himself with a pair of pistols and a sword, he sallied forth upon his enemies. The Indians stood aloof leaving him to the man with the wooden hatchet, whom the Sieur de Chopart kicked heels over head with his right foot in a twinkling. He then discharged his pistols in quick succession, bringing two of the chiefs to the ground; after which he threw them at the heads of two others, with so good an aim that they also bit the dust, and then rushed upon them sword in hand.

"He is worthy to die by the hand of a warrior," cried the Sun of the Apple, advancing upon him. A furious contest ensued, in which the Sieur de Chopart, being skilled in the management of the sword, would in all likelihood have come off victorious, had not the caittif with the wooden hatchet crept behind him, and revenged the kick he had received by planting his weapon full upon the head of the Sieur, who fell to the earth, and was instantly despatched. His death would have more than redeemed the follies of his life, had not they proved fatal to so many of his unfortunate people. Of seven hundred persons, a few only escaped to carry the news to the commandant-general at New-Orleans, who repented too late of his confidence in the boasts of the Sieur de Chopart.

The result of the affair, however, was fatal to the Natchez, who, after plundering Fort Rosalie and the houses, set them on fire, leaving not a single edifice standing. The other Indian nations to whom the bundle of rods had been sent, were extremely irritated at the Natchez, supposing they had forwarded them for the purpose of deceiving them and making them ridiculous. They determined, therefore, to revenge themselves the first opportunity. The Natchez, on the contrary, believed their allies had broken faith with them, and now merely pretended that their bundles of rods had not the same number as that of the Natchez. Thus a mutual ill will was generated; for it was never known to them how it came to pass that the confederacy failed. The Strong Arm, as may be supposed, kept her secret, and the old chief, who had encountered her in the temple during the hurricane, died in the massacre of Fort Rosalie, by the hand of the Sieur de Chopart. The truth, therefore, was never suspected, nor was the simple expedient which saved the lives, in all probability, of all the French inhabitants of Louisiana, except those of Rosalie, ever disclosed until the whole nation of the Natchez had paid the penalty of the massacre of the Eve of St. Andrew.

Monsieur P  rier, governor of Louisiana, determined to make a severe example of the Natchez, and taking advantage of the misunderstanding relating to the bundle of rods, engaged the Choctaws to co-operate with him in that object. A war commenced, which continued some time, until the Natchez, harassed and plundered by the Choctaws, at length retired to the other side of the Mississippi, to the neighbourhood of Silver Creek, about two hundred miles from Red river. Here they were at length found by Monsieur P  rier and his brother, at the head of a considerable force.

They shut themselves up in the fort they had constructed, and finding at length that the French were gradually gaining ground in their approaches, they determined upon the last effort of despair. They equipped themselves in their most splendid war dresses; painted their bodies with different colours; and made their final attempt in a sally, accompanied with howlings and horrible contortions, which at first struck terror into the French soldiers. They were, however, eventually driven back, and confined to their fort, while the French were finishing a battery for mortars. The third discharge threw a shell which fell into the middle of the fort, where it burst among the women and children, who set up a dismal outcry. The Indian warriors, seeing this, offered at length to capitulate. The offer was accepted, and after various attempts at delay, as well as to escape under cover of night, which succeeded with a few who joined the Chickasaws, the rest surrendered at discretion.

They were carried to New-Orleans, where they were kept prisoners for a time, and afterwards sent to the king's plantation. From there, after being detained some time, the governor, not knowing what else to do with them, and being unwilling either to put them to death, or let them loose again to murder his countrymen, shipped them to St. Domingo. Thus perished the Natchez, the most conspicuous and the most civilized tribe of all those found in the limits of North America. The Strong Arm was among those carried to New-Orleans, where she, for the first time, related the particulars of her various warnings to the Sieur de Chopart, and of her saving the lives of all the French colonists, but those whom the commandant would not suffer to be saved, by the simple expedient of withdrawing a few sticks from a bundle of rods. She was taken care of during the rest of her life by the governor general, and died many years after, lamenting that she could not save either her husband's kindred at Rosalie, nor the kindred of her fathers at the village of the Great Sun. A NIGHT-STORM ON THE ATLANTIC.

BY ALPHA.

Fair was the morn, and calm the noon, and cool the evening's breath,
And, save a bosom-heave, the sea was spiritless as death:
The evening beams, mid clouds of gold, went down before our way,
As though they'd lead our pilgrim-ship to lands as bright as they.

And some who loved the sunset-sea were gathered on the deck,
Some watched the evening star that rose a scarce distinguished speck;
Some praised the varying heaven that grew more gloomy and more
Far as itself from earth beyond the skill of painter's hand. (grand,

And some bewailed the absent wind, and some their absent feres,
And some who wail'd no wind nor world, laugh'd out at others' cares;
Some in that dewy time shed tears—the loveless and the lone,
And some fill'd deep the memory-cup to loves and pleasures flown.

In sooth, they were a varied group, in climate and in creed,
But braver hearts had never urg'd the battle's thundering speed;
And woman, young and fond, was there—oh! where is she not found;
By fever's bed—on ocean's surge—on war's volcanic ground!

But where's that star of silver gone, as bright as beauty's eye?

And see yon little cloud that climbs along the silent sky—

"This black, but yet 'tis beautiful beside the crimson blaze

That like a conflagration fills the wanderers' dazzled gaze.

More watchful now the chieftain's eye—more loud the growing gale,

Aloft—aloft the seamen fly and reef the baffling sail;

And, but too faithfully they tell how false this smiling scene—

The sullen brow—the thoughtful eye—and the abstracted mien.

Afar—afar the waters wake—the tempest shakes their track,

And o'er the sky-fields legion-clouds are moving big and black: [eye,

He comes—he comes with winged speed—a strong hand and lightning—

Lifts the huge ocean from its bed and blazes through the sky.

And now he scatters flash on flash—now thunders peal on peal—

Now with mad surges sweeps the decks, now lifts the naked keel;

"Call up the watch!"—no time for sleep—away the bulwarks go—

Thunders above, and flende around, and boiling gulfs below!

Danger and storm, and death and fear, and thou, undying night!

Nay, have ye charm'd from hell's deep frowns the workers of your might?

Fling ye your Titan rage to heaven to shroud it's holy blue,

With all your strength of darkness lest one star should silver through?

Oh for the morn—the sacred morn! 'twere hope to those who roam—

No beacon but the lightning's flash, no pathway but the foam.

Thou God of mercy! spare—oh, spare! till daylight be begun,

That we may, like the Parsee, die beneath the blessed sun!

Our pray'r is heard, the storm is hush'd! we breathe of hope and heav'n,

And from the rosy gates of morn the demon clouds are driven;

The light—the pure and living light, once more illumines the main,

The burning fever-hour is past—we live—we live again.

Thou wilt not let the sinner's death! Oh God! thy words are truth;

I feel in my maturer hours what I but learned in youth;

And while my future journey tends o'er life's uncertain sea,

However dark my fortune's frown, oh! turn my hopes to thee.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE,

ADDRESSED TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NUMBER THREE.

Chester.

August 10, 1830.

As I had just arrived from the young cities of the new world, I determined to have a peep at one of the oldest cities of this part of the old world. The contrast is certainly striking; for, though Chester is now somewhat of a modern-antique, in consequence of the new portions of the town having been built after the fashion of these days, yet the middle of the city is antiquity itself. Such houses! I dined in one wherein it is not only possible but probable that portions of the Roman legions, some dozen and a half centuries ago, met and revelled, and talked of their own beautiful Italy, canvassed the political measures of the Cæsars, and devised plans for protecting the barbarous inhabitants of Chester from the still more barbarous Welsh, that were for ever prowling like wolves around their walls. Things were certainly in keeping at this inn. The furniture was musty and massive—the pictures that hung round the walls discovered a truly Chinese contempt of the modern discovery of perspective; and there was no doubt that both the landlady and the mutton she gave me to eat had come into existence in the times that had long since passed away. Some of the streets ought, in fact, to be wholly inhabited by ancient withered men and women—walking mummies—curious specimens of the productions of a by-past age; for it really seems incongruous to see healthy, curly-pated children, or anything savouring of freshness and vitality in their precincts. The old part of the city is entirely walled around, which now forms a pleasant walk for the inhabitants. Upon the walls I picked acquaintance with quite an original character. He was as inquisitive as if he had been born east of Long Island Sound; and as soon as he found I was all the way from the wilds of America, he entered upon a regular course of cross-examination, and seemed not a little surprised at finding me partially civilized. He then proceeded, in the style and tone that a pedantic schoolmaster would use to a small urchin, to impart to me the most novel information. He stated, for my edification, that the very wall on which we walked was built by the Romans; that these Romans were from a country called Italy; and that under the command of one Julius Cæsar they came over in ships, and conquered a great part of the island of Britain, which, as he added, "is now called England;" the whole of which, as he seemed to expect it, I received as the latest news I had heard, and expressed the requisite quantity of surprise thereat. It was really amusing to see the unhesitating manner in which he took it for granted that, coming from where I did, it was altogether impossible I should know anything of the matters of which he was discouraging; and when we came to the little tower on which Charles the First stood and saw the defeat of the royal army on Rowton moor, he proceeded, in the same strain, to detail the particulars of that event, and how Charles lost the throne, and how Oliver Cromwell became protector, &c. &c. for all which information, as in duty bound, I expressed myself exceedingly obliged to him. He replied, "Not at all, sir;" but gravely and complacently added, that "it was fortunate I had met with some one who could tell me about the place;" to which I responded, "very fortunate, indeed," and we parted. So you see what notions many people here entertain of the state of things in America. Upon other matters he did not seem a very ignorant man; yet he appeared to think that I had learnt the English tongue as I might learn any other foreign language, and asked me what kind of language was spoken in America!

The scenery around Chester is very pretty. The naturally fertile land is in the highest state of cultivation, yet nevertheless thickly studded with clumps of fine trees; through it the beautiful little river Dee winds its way, with many a graceful curve, while the old Welsh mountains rear their lofty heads in the back ground, as if to protect the smiling valley from the sweeping winds and fog and blight of the western ocean. But as there are few things pleasanter in reality and duller in description than pretty scenery, I shall put a stop to any further bursts of descriptive eloquence, and simply and literally sum up my proceedings in the words of the old song:

"'Twas summer, and softly the breezes were blowing,
And sweetly the little birds sang from the tree:
At the foot of a rock, where the river was flowing,
I sat myself down on the banks of the Dee;"

where I enjoyed (and others may) a delicious day-dream, until the calls of appetite hinted that something more tangible than draughts of fancy and fresh air was indispensably necessary, according to our present worldly and carnal construction, for the preservation and continuance in due order of the animal functions. After victualling, I looked my last upon Chester, and wended my way northward.

It is a strange thing tossing and travelling about the world, sojourning short snatches of time here and there, making yourself familiar with unknown faces and fresh scenes, and then passing on your way and seeing them no more. It is pleasant in some respects, but, like every thing else in life, disagreeable in others. There is something of pain in shaking hands, probably for the last time, even with your fellow-travellers for a few hours on a stage top, if you have passed your time pleasantly together. You just begin to feel an interest in them when the coach stops, they are set down at their native town or village, a friendly nod of the head is exchanged, and you are whirled onwards. True, such links are very slight, but still you feel when they are snapped; and perhaps this may, in some degree, account for the unsociability of the English in travelling, so much complained of and ridiculed by foreigners. They are an outwardly cold and not easily excited people, and in journeying prefer silence to sociability that must soon be brought unpleasantly to a close. Some, to be sure, have the knack of good-humouredly making and breaking acquaintanceship, with the utmost facility and unconcern; but I, for one, never liked them the better for it.

There is nothing exaggerated in Washington Irving's description of the English people's passion for gardening. You may travel for days together through the country, and not see one house without this seemingly indispensable useful and ornamental appendage. The meanest thatched cottages have their gable-ends covered with neatly trained fruit trees, while the front is partially hid by clusters of rose-bushes, or the fragrant jasmine and honeysuckle. Roses and jasmines and honeysuckles may sound romantic and extravagant; but they are in fact the commonest and cheapest things in the world, and are easily attainable even by the poorest of the poor. Nature is a bountiful provider, and it only requires a little labour and attention to place the homeliest dwellings in a nest of sweets. The extreme neatness and good taste with which the peasantry lay out their small spots of earth are such as could scarcely be expected from rude and uncultivated minds. Hunt, Cobbett, and other oracles of truth, tell us of the utter misery and wretchedness of the agricultural labouring classes throughout England. I cannot say how far they may be correct, or rather, incorrect, for I have as yet had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the mode of life of these poor people. No doubt they suffer many privations; but it is hard to reconcile the idea of squalid poverty, and the sullen and reckless despair which generally accompanies it, with the neat, trim state of the gardens of the English peasantry, and the considerable portion of their little patches of ground set apart for the cultivation of flowers, and purely ornamental purposes; while the troops of fat, flaxen-headed, rosy-cheeked children, loitering along the hedge sides or rolling on the grass in front of their doors, indicate anything rather than delicate appetites or lack of the means of satisfying them. But we soon left cottages and gardens and flowers and children far behind, and entered upon a tract of country as sterile and barren as ever set cultivation at defiance—the moors of Yorkshire. Here even a highland cow might despair of a dinner, and nothing animate or inanimate is to be seen upon their surface, excepting gangs of a peculiar breed of ragged, black-faced, and, I must say, blackguard-looking sheep, who seem to be able to exist where nothing else will. As soon as the grouse season commences, these extensive moors are alive with birds and bird-slayers. In these regions, though the middle of summer, the air in the morning was raw and chilly; and two Americans, (Pennsylvanians,) who were travelling to see the country, looked and talked as if they were on the point of perishing with cold. These gentlemen complained bitterly of the thinness of the slices of bread and butter at the inn where we breakfasted, which I take to be strongly indicative of two forthcoming volumes of very unfavourable travels. As there was the same charge for one slice as fifty, a Yankee would soon have discovered what the men of Pennsylvania did not—that in direct proportion to the thinness of the bread, there was a clear gain to the consumer in the article of butter. But, however, when people are busy at finding fault, it is as well to go through with it; and a consistent book of travels, that is, all praise or all abuse, like Cooper's Travelling Bachelor or Fearon's veracious sketches, is decidedly more amusing than that drivelling affectation of candour, which, afraid to boldly condemn or defend, goes on mixing a grain of praise with a grain of blame, until, at the end of the chapter, the reader finds himself in a hopeless state of indecision, not having acquired any definite ideas on the subject matter in hand, which is a dead loss of time, and no kind of preparation at all either for argument or conversation. This style of writing ought only to be cultivated by "on the fence" politicians, like the ingenious editor of the —, who, by long practice, has acquired such precision in the art of balancing, that he is enabled to write on all questions in a way that would puzzle a conjurer to find out to which side he leans. Good by—my next shall be from the place where cockneys most do congregate.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

GOOD THINGS SAID AND DONE AT THE SPRINGS, DURING THE LAST SEASON.

FRIEND MORRIS—For the benefit of your fair readers, whom the tyranny of parents and husbands has kept vegetating at home all summer, contrary to law and gospel, I send you the following items respecting the most remarkable characters that sojourned at these resorts of beauty and fashion during the last season. Being on the spot when they occurred, I can vouch for their authenticity. Your constant reader, PETRONEL FLAGE.

Jack Moustache, a dandy of the first dimensions, having one day very significantly sworn to Miss Aurelia Flamb, the great heiress, that he never loved but one in the whole course of his life, occasioned the following, by a young gentleman who don't wish his name to be known to any body but the public:

Jack makes his brags of his constancy,
He never loved but one, not he,
Jack speaks the truth, the honest elf,
And that one was his own dear self.

"What is the reason," said the lovely, lively Delia Delices one day to the same young fellow, "what is the reason there is nothing said in the Bible about 'a certain woman,' as well as 'a certain man?'" He answered the lady's question in the following extempore:

"A certain man's" a phrase in scripture common,
But nothing's said about a certain woman;
The reason all may see that are not blind—
A woman's never certain of her mind.

Whereupon the lady, in imitation of the dey of Algiers, who was not "afraid of his ears," gave him a great blow with her fan, which would have annihilated him had it not been for his corsets.

Fillagree Flibbertigibbet, who had been three years abroad cultivating his whiskers, on reading in the newspapers that their royal highnesses the dukes of Sussex and Cumberland had complied with the wishes of the new king of England, and sacrificed their moustachios, foreseeing the downfall of the dynasty of whisks, did, in a fit of desperation, seize a magnum bonum razor, and with a single flourish, disforest his whole physiognomy. Finding afterwards that the information of the royal dukes having sent in their adhesion was premature, the unfortunate gentleman disappeared, and has not since been heard of. Great fears are entertained for his life.

A dashing widow, of great beauty, et cetera, accidentally fell from a boat into the deepest part of Saratoga lake, whereupon three of her admirers, all of whom had the dyspepsia, jumped in, determined to rescue her or perish. What renders this affair very remarkable, the lady floated on the surface, without the least danger, whereas the gentlemen would all certainly have gone to the bottom, had not one of them climbed to the top of her hat, and the other two taken refuge in her sleeves.

"What is marriage like?" was the question at a game of "What is it like?" at Ballston one evening. The young gentleman, who don't wish his name to be mentioned, when it came to his turn, answered in the following extempore:

Marriage is like a flaring candle light
Placed in a window of a summer night,
Attracting all the insects of the air
To come and sing their pretty wickets there;
Those that are out butt heads against the pane,
And those within butt to get out again.

The following lines were handed about in manuscript, author unknown. They were charitably applied to a worthy man, who was very liberal in giving away part of what he cheated other people out of:

Paul with his charity his conscience calms,
He steals a pig and gives the tail for alms.

A club of jolly members of the temperance society, being determined to apply with the proper spirit to their undertaking, used to meet three times a week to drink champagne, and make epigrams on each other. Only two of them leaked out, of which we took a copy. The first was made on Lawyer Brief, an honest fellow, who had never been corrupted by the business of his profession, and who sometimes fell asleep at or under the table:

Here lies a lawyer, and an honest man,
Heaven works a wonder for us now and then.

The other was upon Sam Scapegrace, who one night took a rash oath that he would never drink again while he breathed the breath of life:

Sam Scapegrace once to me devoutly swore,
That while he breathed, by heaven! he'd drink no more;
But Sam meant nothing more, as I am thinking,
Than that he would not breathe while he was drinking.

The following lines got into circulation at Saratoga; but, as may be imagined, the author was too wise to own them. A young man in spectacles, thick-soled shoes, and an ante-diluvian coat was suspected:

Says Tom, "I'll never wed but for a prize,
Young, rich, and beautiful, and good and wise;
Not fond of dress, yet always trim and neat;
Never perfum'd, yet like a rose-bud sweet;
Well bred, as she in town had pass'd her life,
Yet modest, frugal, as a country wife."
"You'll die a bachelor, my friend," I said,
"Or must bespeak her—there's none ready made."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE VILLAGE MUSICIAN.

BY JAMES HALL.

WE are sorry to be obliged to mutilate so amusing and clever a story as this, but it is too long to be extracted entire; and we must even beg the author's pardon for liking him so well that we cannot forbear taking a few extracts.

The village musician is Johnny Vanderbocker, a neat square-built Dutch lad, who whilom was a great favourite in Herkimer, New-York. The first time Johnny was enabled to think of two things at once, was when he became deeply enamoured of a beautiful girl of nineteen. Lucy Atherton, the young lady in question, had beauty enough to compensate for the loss of wealth, and a sufficient portion of the family inheritance of pride to enable her to hold her head quite as high as any belle in the village. Indeed she made it a point to take precedence wherever she went; and as she did it without the appearance of ill-nature, and without displaying any self-important airs, it seemed to be universally conceded to her. She was the reigning beauty of the village—the prettiest, the gayest, and the most graceful of the maiden train who danced to the music of Johnny Vanderbocker's violin. It was a treat to behold her laughing face, her lovely form, and her light step, as she flew, with joyous heart and noiseless foot, through the mazes of a contra-dance. Now it happened to Johnny occasionally to shut his mouth and open his eyes, just at the dangerous moment when Miss Atherton was engaged in these captivating performances; and he must have been the most churlish of the Dutchmen not to have been fascinated. She was in the habit, too, of leading off the sets, and the choice of the air was generally dictated by her taste. On such occasions she would address our hero with the most winning grace, and in tones of the sweetest euphony, ask Mr. Vanderbocker for "that delightful tune which he played so charmingly." Accustomed to the plain appellation of "Johnny," from every other tongue, the title of Mister, conveyed in such honied accents, fell pleasantly upon his ear; and whether the fair lady was actuated by self-respect, or by a respect for Johnny, the effect was to make him her fast friend. Often would Johnny surprise the company, by keeping his eyes open for whole minutes together, at the lovely visage of Lucy Atherton flitted before him. The fire would flash from his eye, and the blood rush from his heart to his elbow, as he gazed in ecstacy at the loveliest dancer in the village. Then would he close his eyes, and having laid in an agreeable idea, feed upon it in secrecy, as a stingy boy devours a morsel in some hidden corner. But he kept his own counsel so closely, that none could have suspected the object of his thoughts, or have pronounced with any shadow of reason that he had any thoughts at all—except upon one occasion, when Lucy Atherton, having gone through a scamper down with uncommon spirit, he exclaimed with great emotion, that she was a "dreadful nice dancer." Yet with all this devotion of heart, Miss Atherton's image was unconnected with ideas of wedlock. He had seldom seen her except on holidays, when she shone as a bright particular star in the constellation of village beauty, and her name was engraven on the same tables with quiltings, fiddle-strings, minced-pies, egg-flip, and spiced ginger-bread. The idea of a wife entirely unsettled his thoughts, which commonly moved on from point to point, with as much regularity as the hands of a watch. "A wife!" quoth he, casting a look of silly bashfulness all around, as if afraid of detection. "A wife!" exclaimed he a second time, laughing aloud at the absurdity of such a proposition. "A wife!" muttered he again, and then the image of Lucy Atherton came dancing before him. "Me and Lucy will just suit," said he to himself; "she dances prime, and I can out-fiddle the world."

And Johnny, decked in pink silk neckcloth, purple watch-ribbon, and scarlet velvet waistcoat, was actually inspired with confidence to offer himself, his fiddle, a snug house, three hundred dollars in silver, and a bakeshop, all to Miss Lucy Atherton. Of course, the honour was civilly but peremptorily declined; and merely adding, "You must excuse me, sir, I have other engagements," the lady left the room.

"That means she is going to marry somebody else," thought Johnny. "What a fool I was not to speak first."

And he retired, not a little puzzled that a young lady of sound discretion, and not worth a cent, should refuse a neat cottage, a bake-shop, and three hundred dollars, with the slight incumbrance of himself and his violin, merely because she made a previous engagement with another gentleman.

Had there been a mill-pond at the front door of her world undoubtedly have drowned himself; but it would have been rashness to have left the treasure vacant, and his bake-shop unoccupied, so he determined to mount his horse and take a short ride. It was nearly night when Johnny wended his way homeward; and being particularly unwilling to ride alone in the dark, he trotted up alongside a closely muffled traveller, and wished him cheerfully "good evening;" the traveller nodded stiffly, without turning his head; Johnny gazed wistfully at the tired nag, the Mackinaw blanket, the leggings, and other fixens, as we say in the west, and wondered who it could be who was too proud to return a civil salutation.

"You seem to be travelling, Mister," said he.

"You have guessed right," replied the traveller.

"Have you travelled far?"

"Tolerably."

Now this was very perplexing. "Tolerably" might mean ten, or twenty, or a hundred miles; but it could not apply to a long journey. He thought he would try again.

"Well, Mister, if I mought make so bold, where did you come from?"

"Just back here," was the laconic reply.

"From Oneida?"

"No, further back."

"From Cataragus?"

"No, further back."

"I guess may be you come all the way from Buffalo?"

"No, further back."

Johnny scratched his head in amazement,

"Why I don't know as any body lives any further off than that. If I mought make so free, what's back of Buffalo?"

"Ohio."

"O-o-h! sure enough. So you live in Ohio?"

"No, further back;"

"Well, what's back of that?"

"Indiana."

"And do you live there?"

"No, further back;"

"And what's back of that?"

"Illinois."

"Oh, you live in Illinois."

"No, further back."

"I guess you don't live at all," exclaimed Johnny, trembling all over. "Well, Mister, if it's no harm, what's back of Illinois?"

"Missouri."

"Do you live there?"

"Yes."

To make a long story short, this traveller proves to be Lucy Atherton's lover, come to claim her hand. Johnny, in very christian-like temper, accepts an invitation to the wedding. But he hung up his violin.

"Never," said he, "shall any other woman dance to music of mine; I have played my last tune, and I shall now do as my father did: make bread, and lock up my dollars in the old chest."

THE PARSEE, THE JEW, AND THE CHRISTIAN.

BY KRUMMACHER.

A Jew entered a Parsee temple, and beheld the sacred fire.

"What!" said he to the priest, "do you worship the fire?"

"Not the fire," answered the priest: "it is to us an emblem of the sun, and of his genial heat."

"Do you then worship the sun as your god?" asked the Jew. "Know ye not that this luminary also, is but a work of that Almighty Creator?"

"We know it," replied the priest; "but the uncultivated man requires a sensible sign, in order to form a conception of the Most High. And is not the sun, the incomprehensible source of light, an image of that invisible being who blesses and preserves all things?"

"Do your people, then," rejoined the Israelite, "distinguish the type from the original? They call the sun their god, and, descending even from this to a baser object, they kneel before an earthly flame! Ye amuse the outward but blind the inward eye; and while ye hold to them the earthly ye withdraw from them the heavenly light! 'Thou shalt not make unto thyself any image or any likeness!'"

"How do you designate the Supreme Being?" asked the Parsee.

"We call him Jehovah Adonia, that is, the Lord who is, who was, and who will be," answered the Jew.

"Your appellation is grand and sublime," said the Parsee; "but it is awful too."

A Christian then drew nigh and said,

"We call him FATHER."

The Pagan and the Jew looked at each other and said,

"Here is at once an image and a reality: it is a word of the heart."

Therefore they all raised their eyes to heaven, and said with reverence and love "OUR FATHER!" And they took each by the hand, and all three called one another brothers!

THE STARS.

There is a prettiness in the following article, that commends the whole to the eye and ear of one accustomed to feel. It is what those who cannot write, and are too stupid to comprehend, usually denominate "twattle." The mind of an educated man seeks condiments to its grosser aliments, and he who has not a relish for chaste, tasteful composition, is only making an affectation of an appetite for the solid productions of the mind. He is like the juggler, who swallows pen-knives and scissors, not for the sake of nourishment, but to excite astonishment. He who is always wrinkling his brow over extracts from Smith, Say, and Ricardo, with a view of puzzling others with what he does not understand himself, is like the bibber, who gets intoxicated with a tumbler of whiskey, and abuses those who may sneer at his appetite. The man of true taste studies varieties in his entertainment, cultivates and gratifies a refined appetite, and rises from his meal with his guests a wiser and a better man. Let us finish ours with the following I. C. champagne, imported from the Boston Constellation:

"Those young-looking rascals that peep from out the blue above us—who have winked down upon our forests and folies for so many centuries—who nightly come out from their homes to light up the sable countenance of old night—who and what are ye? Are ye shining worlds, and have ye bright eyes and broken hearts in your realms, such as shine and break here? Move ye on your immeasurable path, thoughtless of earth and its graves—its greatness and its perishability? Whence come ye and whither do ye go? Reck ye of time, or do ye move amidst the endless spaces and interminable paths of eternity? I see your bright faces reflected in the lake—your silvery hue resting on the leaves of the forest—but who and what are ye? And who and what is the inquirer? The dust will cover him; but ye will shine on. Ambition disappointed—love ruined—the gray of age on him—still will ye shine, and gild the headstone of his grave, when he that once lived shall be forgotten. The monarch and his sceptre will crumble—the oak grow old and fall—the river cease to follow its bed—empires wax and wane—but still ye will shine on unruffled, serene, glorious, beautiful, as now. Not one ray will flee from your glittering brows, though it will fall on other eyes, on unborn millions—on other forests and lands now unknown to those who, in mockery of science, trace out your paths through the infinity of heaven. Bright stars, look not in mockery upon me! but gaze on human power, on human genius, and read to both the lesson of human frailty.”

United States Gazette.

A FRONTIER INCIDENT.

Some time in the spring of the year 1815, Samuel Cecil, residing on Station Camp Creek, then thought to be in Wayne county, Kentucky, but now Tennessee, was absent in the mountains. His wife being out of meal, started to a neighbour's to borrow some, but first securely closing and barring the door, leaving three young children in the house, the oldest a girl and two younger boys, for safety during her absence. She took two of the oldest children with her to help her carry the meal, and bear her company. Shortly after her departure her husband returned, unbarr'd the door, and being warm and fatigued, laid down and fell asleep. The three young children getting at liberty, pursued the tracks of their mother. She shortly returned, found her husband at home fast asleep, and the children missing; she awoke her husband and informed him of the circumstances; they immediately pursued the track of the children, followed them to the crossing of Station Camp Creek, but could make no discovery. The neighbours in this thin settled part of the country being informed of the circumstances, united in the hunt for nights and days; the waters, eddies, and drifts, the mountains, cliffs and valleys, were all explored and searched by the mother, father, and neighbours, but all in vain. The bereaved parents were almost inconsolable. At one time they thought the children in attempting to cross the stream, were drowned and had drifted; then that some ravenous beast had devoured them; at another time, that they had perished with hunger, cold, and thirst; or that some wicked persons, or perhaps some skulking Indians, might have stolen or kidnapped them—but all was mystery and uncertainty with the grieving parents and anxious neighbours.

About eight or ten days ago, the oldest boy of the three children, now a young man, presented himself at home before his parents, announced his name and told the circumstances. Imagine to yourself how lost in astonishment and anxious feelings were the parents; they listened with eager ear to hear of the other two. When kidnapped he was only four years old, and could tell but little of the circumstances; all he knew was, that seven of the Cherokee Indians came across them, and took him, his sister and brother, and bore them off; that the youngest brother, unable to bear the fatigues, and for want of milk, or proper food, perished on the road; that they were taken to the Indian country, thence carried to the Arkansas, beyond the Mississippi. From his sister he learnt his name, and something of the country from whence they were taken, and, by inquiries, had been enabled to reach his father's and mother's house. His sister was living, and was married a few days before his departure to a Spaniard, a great distance off.

KATHLEEN O'MOORE.

She hung on my bosom, and vowed to be true,
As I kissed off a tear-drop, and murmured adieu,
Then, slow and sad-hearted,
From Kathleen I parted,
From Kathleen O'Moore.

I tore myself from her, and left her in tears,
With a pang at my heart, yet remembered for years,
Though hope was repeating
A promise of meeting
With Kathleen O'Moore.

'Twas eve, and the moon brightly smiled on the spot
As I lingered to gaze yet again on the cot
That held the dear treasure
I loved without measure,
My Kathleen O'Moore.

And hope fondly whispered with flattering tone,
That I shortly might call the dear creature my own;
But hope has deceived me,
For fate has bereaved me
Of Kathleen O'Moore.

A richer swain woo'd, and she smiled on his plea,
And she gave him the hand she had plighted to me,
And left me to languish
With heart-rending anguish
For Kathleen O'Moore.

THE DRAMA.

THE OPERA.

HAVING expressed ourselves strongly but justly, in several previous articles, touching the merits of the Park theatre in its musical department, and in so doing having been influenced by no motive of a personal nature, but by an honest desire to do our duty fearlessly and with zeal to our readers, we conceive that any observations of a contrary description ought to receive double force, and meet with that attention on the part of the management, which strict impartiality alone deserves. We confess that the able and efficient conduct of Mr. Simpson has given us an establishment of which we have a right to be proud; that the Park theatre is one of the prominent objects which we, with natural pride, point out and recommend to the notice of strangers, as a pledge that New-York is the metropolitan seat of the fine arts, and that we can distinguish and encourage merit. More than once have we acted the cicerone to our drama, and quitted our gratified friend on the wharf of one of our rivers, next morning, with the recommendation of "Go thou and do likewise." We now shall notice some errors, and submit to the manager's good sense the propriety of correcting them. The music played by the band on ordinary nights, is worn out—the public are wearied of it: we allude to that which is called act music, some of which has been a tenant of the Park orchestra for upwards of twenty years! Having a fine band, why not use it? Observe the musicians themselves, in playing this common stuff; they take up their instruments carelessly, and at any moment—nay, blindfolded, tardy individuals, could join them at any given bar: books are useless; they lie on the desks it is true, but they are not needed by half of the performers. Another error is, the continual and hacknied use of three or four overtures to operas, most of them in use at the theatre. We will enumerate the Caliph of Bagdad, the Marriage of Figaro, and Masaniello. But the greatest instance of mistaken and decided bad taste we have to point out, was on the late production of the melodrama called Valmondi—which, as regards music, is mere trash—although superb as a spectacle. Every evening the overture of Der Frieschutz is played, and thus its value is lost to the opera. Overtures are now written as part of the pieces which they herald to the public, particularly the one in question, and the manager acts in direct opposition to rules long established and strictly adhered to at both the great patent theatres in London, by allowing this to take place; added to which, he destroys the weight and effect of that very music when he presents regular opera. As well might he cut out three or four speeches and situations from the School for Scandal, and add them to some paltry farce, or patch some Cobourg or minor theatre melodrama with an act from Metamora. Let not the manager suppose that the public are unmindful or reckless of such improprieties. A proof of the contrary was duly given on the evening of Mrs. Austin's benefit, when sundry hisses were justly bestowed upon the band for omitting to play the overture of the Barber of Seville. Where excellence exists in any department as in that of music at the Park, the people have a right to observe, and will remark on the least deviation from propriety. It is a high compliment to the manager.

LITERARY NOTICES.

An Address delivered before the Philolexian and Peithologian Societies of Columbia College, by Gulian C. Verplanck, one of the regents of the university of the state of New-York, pronounced August the second, 1830, and published at the request of the societies. G. C. and H. Carvill.

It was not, we believe, until within the last few years, that the practice became common, in our colleges, for the literary societies formed by the students within their walls, to invite graduates advanced in years and honours, or distinguished men without reference to the place of their education, to deliver addresses before them at fixed periods. The society, called the Phi Beta Kappa, which has some innocent mysteries of its own, and some equally innocent and perhaps well founded pretensions to superior merit among its members, seems to have set this good example. It has its annual orators and poets; although we observed with regret that at the last celebration at New-Haven, the bard, who was no other than our own Fitz G. Halleck, as clever and sensible a man as was ever instigated by those pagan devils, Apollo and his nine young women, to make metre, was advertised as among the missing. In consequence, the people assembled on the occasion had no poetry with which to wash down the substantial prose delivered to them by Mr. Grimke. The latter was excellent, however; and perhaps it was better that the digestion of the great moral truths it inculcated was not interfered with by flights of the imagination, or vagabond waggery, which our minstrel can no more avoid, when he stumbles upon a droll association, than Jack Shepherd could keep his hands out of a gentleman's fob, when he saw a convenient opportunity of making him carry less weight.

We are to enter however the solemn precincts of academic groves and halls, and must proceed in a grave vein in the few remarks we have room to offer on the subject in hand. These annual addresses are calculated to do great good, to give dignity to the youthful societies by whose call they are invoked, confidence to their literary pride, and ambitious emulation to their members; character to the institutions to which they belong; and credit to the nation of whose patriots, philosophers, legislators, lawyers, and scientific and literary men, they are and must be the nurseries. We have seen two attorney-generals of the United States hearkening to the request of young people in the vestibule of the temple of knowledge, and with all the warmth which the freshness of old recollections excited, and the accuracy which experience had taught, gratifying the neophytes by accepting their invitation, and a delighted audience, by unlocking the stores of their several treasuries of knowledge and of thought. We allude, it is unnecessary to add, to Mr. Berrien and Mr. Wirt.

As a mere intellectual exhibition of power, the address delivered at Hamilton college by Governor Cass, on a recent occasion, will probably rank highest among the productions of this kind. He took for his subject the steady progress of moral and mental improvement (their advance is simultaneous) through the convulsions the world has undergone in its peopling and in its wars; and with sound learning, apt perception, and happy eloquence, avoiding superstition on the one hand and false philosophy on the other, displayed the advance of the human intellect, its tendency, and the obligations its development imposes on the rising generation. Old illustrations or allusions become novel when touched by his original mind; and the torch he carries into the catacombs of antiquity is lit at a new fire.

Mr. Verplanck was called upon by the two societies of Columbia college to deliver the first address of this kind before them. The alumni of this most venerable institution formed an association several years ago, agreeing to keep alive their old and hallowed reminiscences by an annual meeting of such as were within hail, and by appointing an orator for the occasion. His excellency Governor Clinton, Professor Renwick, and Judge Irving have successively performed the duty, or rather the pleasing task assigned to them by their brethren of the college; and how well they discharged it, the printed discourses which have been widely circulated and read, bear testimony. There is, however, a peculiar usefulness in allowing the young gentlemen who belong to the societies, in which they take a personal pride, strengthened by the political as well as literary rivalry which generally prevails, where there are two in the same seminary, to select their own orator, and have the management themselves of the arrangements on the occasion of the address.

Mr. Verplanck has been most happy in the argument selected for his theme; and certainly the college which furnished him with such superabundant materials for his purpose, may lift her classical and towery head high among all the others of the land, when the muster-roll of her illustrious sons is called over by the lips of eloquence; and the long train of her dead worthies is made to pass before eyes privileged to gaze upon the walls, where the "holy shades" are still "adored," of those who were the fathers and benefactors of our country.

In returning thanks to their orator for his address, the committee of the two societies properly speak of it as "eloquent and classical." It is both. Had we time to comment on the style, we should characterize it as pure, while it is full and flowing, and polished ad unguem, while it bears no visible marks of elaboration. The brief extracts we shall make must speak for themselves, and our business is with the matter of the discourse.

It opens by adverting to the powerful effect produced upon the character of the Roman citizens, by keeping, in religious ceremonies and secular celebrations, the memory of the illustrious dead before the eyes of the people; a practice dwelt upon by Polybius as constituting one of the great elements of national power. Well and truly Mr. Verplanck remarks, that cold generalizations, however good and necessary, are infirm in their effects upon the generous feelings, in comparison with examples vividly presented, conjured up, as it were, on the very arena of their youthful wrestling for the prize of renown.

"A simply stated fact, a date, a mere name, is then sufficient to excite the flush of patriotic sympathy, or the thrill of generous enthusiasm."

"For these, the most exalted uses of History and Biography, of literature and eloquence, America has already rich and abundant materials. Here the ordinary history of centuries has been crowded into the space of a single life. Here the humble colony of one generation has, in another, risen into a powerful state, and expanded to a great empire in a third. This rapid course of events could not pass along without developing the energies of minds worthy of the times, and equal to their greatest occasions. Their scene of action was vast and magnificent; they were animated and sustained by stronger as well as purer motives than heathen philosophy ever knew; whilst science had armed their minds with powers, to which the knowledge of the chiefs and rulers of past ages was as that of children. It is one of the best and most exalted duties of the men of the present day, to make the characters and lives of these fathers of our country, known and familiar to the youth of our land, and to accustom them to draw the lessons of wisdom, and the examples of virtue, from our own annals: 'Heroum laudes et facta parentum, legere,' and from them to learn, 'quod sit cognoscere virtus.'"

Whether a son of Columbia College has been extravagant in vindicating her claims to distinction from the number of great, and wise, and good men she has nurtured, may be judged of by the few, the élite, whom he had time to mention. We hear of armies of buried wise men, who read and wrote, and were unquestionably studious and somewhat pragmatical in their day and generation, each of whom had his apotheosis in an acrostic, and his immortality guaranteed by a picture, in some of our older literary establishments. But of those whose influence upon the movements of mankind, in the process of their enfranchisement from antiquated errors, has been most immediately and emphatically felt, we believe Columbia College (depreciated as she has been, because she admits of no quackery, and insists upon accurate acquirements) will furnish a most honourable proportion. Her president, Dr. Cooper, was, when the struggle for freedom began, a "high-toned, English-university tory, of the last century." What had this to do with the "march of mind?"

"To these halls we should scarcely have looked for any of the earliest champions of American rights. Yet why not? In them classic lore had unfolded to the student the grand and exalted sentiments of ancient liberty; here the discipline of mathematical reasoning—a discipline, if possible, still more valuable than the conclusions which that reasoning establishes—had trained him to think and to judge for himself; and here he had been directed by the great masters of English philosophy, by Bacon and Locke, to venerate, to feel, and to assert the rights of private judgment and conscience. Yes—learning may be, and too often has been, the slavish handmaid of power; hoodwinked by early prejudice, lured by interest or dazzled by ambition. But these are not the true natural results—they never can be—of any study which otherwise enlarges the understanding and elevates the soul. Those who so believe, do but vilify heaven's best gifts to the human race. Well hath it been said of such reasoners, by a philosophical and republican poet—

'Oh fool! to think the man whose ample mind
Must grasp at all that yonder stars survey;
Must join the noblest forms of every kind,
The world's most perfect image to display,
Can e'er his country's majesty behold,
Unmoved or cold!
Oh fool! to deem
That he whose thought must visit every theme
That he, if haply some presumptuous foe,
With false, ignoble science fraught,
Shall spurn at freedom's faithful band;
That he their dear defence will shun,
Or hide their glories from the sun,
Or deal their vengeance with a woman's hand.'"

Mr. Verplanck might have stated, had it occurred to him, as a most pointed illustration of the poet's theory and of his own, that the boy Hamilton was actually engaged, while listening daily to the doctrine of the tory president, in carrying on with him a controversy in the public papers, in which the latter did not know his antagonist, and the lad, in the people's opinion, certainly had the best of the argument.

As belonging to this early and bright period of the college history, he mentions the names of Jay, and Livingston, and Morris, and Benson; Van Cortlandt, and Rutgers, and Troup, and Hamilton.

We mean no flattery when we say that he has sketched, with a masterly hand, the intellectual portraits of Hamilton, Jay and Livingston, for whom alone he had room upon his canvass. Our readers, if they have still in prospect the pleasure of perusing the whole address, will have probably seen these delineations extracted in the daily public journals. For convenience, as well as of necessity, we therefore pass over them. The tribute paid to the memory of Tompkins, whose brief and brilliant career belongs not only to the annals of the state but of the Union, is fine and just; as is that to Harrison, the Father, as he was latterly esteemed, of the New-York bar. The notice of Clinton we choose to extract, as coming from one who, placed in political opposition to that statesman, could have afforded during his life, as he does on this occasion, to do homage to the zeal for accomplishing grand objects of utility, and the power of doing so, which have made its subject immortal.

"The memory of De Witt Clinton, the first graduate after the peace of 1783, is another brilliant and treasured possession of this college. After the numerous tributes which have so recently been paid to his memory, and especially that luminous view of his character as a scholar and a statesman, as the promoter of good education and useful improvement, contained in the discourse lately delivered from this place, by Professor Renwick, to the alumni of Columbia college, any thing I could now say on the same subject would be but useless repetition. Else would I gladly pay the homage due to his eminent and lasting services, and honour that lofty ambition which taught him to look to designs of grand utility, and to their successful execution, as his arts of gaining or redeeming the confidence of a generous and public-spirited people. For whatever of party animosity might have ever blinded me to his merits, had died away long before his death; and I could now utter his honest praises without the imputation of hollow pretence from others, or the mortifying consciousness in my own breast, of rendering unwilling and tardy justice."

The notices of Bishop Moore and Dr. Bowden will be recognised as true, by every child of the college who sat under their instructions. A passing tribute to the memory of Bruen, late pastor of the Presbyterian church in Prince-street, is as beautiful as it is brief:

"Thence I might lead you along among the tombs of the learned and the good, who, in their days of youth and hope, filled these halls; and who now rest in peace; pausing ever and anon, to mourn over some one of those whom we have revered or loved, until we stopped together at the still fresh grave of young Bruen.

Dead before his prime
Young Lycidas! and hath not left his peer."

The sketch of Mason, which, like the larger ones we have referred to, has already been widely circulated through the public prints, is the last for which the speaker had room in his exhibition; and is masterly, so far forth as he had liberty to fill up the outlines. The application, as it may be called, addressed to the gentlemen of the two societies, after a review of the characters of these worthies, is worthy of the text on which it was founded.

The orator of the societies alludes happily to the names of many alumni of the college of our city, who are yet amongst the crowd of living men, but who must be remembered when we, who now jostle with them in daily intercourse, have joined the caravans that set out every instant for the bourne whence no traveller returns. 'These are my ornaments,' Columbia college may say with honest pride; and when she shall count her jewels hereafter, the author of this address will not be forgotten, as an enlightened and practical patron of sound and liberal education; an accomplished scholar; and a philosophical expounder both of the spirit of equitable human laws, and of the evidences of the truth of that law which is from on high. She may claim to have contributed her share in ripening the faculties which are thus exercised. The genius of her pupils is the endowment of God. She has been singularly favoured in having given culture and direction to the energies of so many, whose memory calamity cannot stain, nor oblivion efface—

'Nec annorum series, nec fuga temporum.'

Family Library, No. IX.—Life of Lord Byron. By John Galt. J. & J. Harper. 1830.

Another life of Lord Byron! We have not yet found time to read Mr. Galt, but we have looked at the titles of his chapters, and to judge from them, we should call this volume rather a description than a biography; an analysis or attempt at analysis of the character of Byron, as illustrated by his writings and his actions, rather than a history of his life; as such, we think it the more likely to be interesting and valuable. So much has been written and printed about Byron's person and adventures, that it is next to impossible to furnish any new facts concerning him; but after all that has been said and sung, his mind remains a mystery; and perhaps there are few men better qualified than Mr. Galt to bring that mystery to light. We are glad to see the flourishing condition of the Family Library; one of the most useful and important compilations that has ever issued from the press. The next volume, as we are informed, is to contain a life of Mahomet, written expressly for the work by one of our own countrymen. We read the work in manuscript, and were highly pleased with it. After that is to come a history of Demonology and Witchcraft, by Sir Walter Scott, than whom, we venture to say, there is no author better able to handle the subject to perfection.

The Atlantic Souvenir, for 1831. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 1830.

In compliance with, in our judgment, a very silly custom, which seems to have for its object the hastening on of time—as if it were too long—and the anticipation of festivities—as if they were not best when fitted to their own set seasons—the Atlantic Souvenir for 1831, has already been published. We cannot conceive of a solitary reason for this. How much more appropriate would not its coming forth be made by delaying it until the first day of the new year? How much more intense would be the curiosity to view its beauties, and how much more eager the desire, and probably the disposition as well as the power to purchase it? As it is now managed, these annuals have lost all their charms long before the season for exchanging presents has arrived; and other novelties, less worthy, perhaps, occupy their place. This is particularly to be regretted in relation to this truly beautiful production. Many popular names enrich the catalogue of authors who have conspired to adorn its pages with some of their happiest effusions. This will not be doubted when we enumerate Paulding, Wetmore, Stone, Leggett, Barker, Smith, Willis, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs. Sigourney, &c. among the contributors. One of the tales—if not the best, certainly one unsurpassed by any other composition in the volume—has been transferred to the first page of this number. The copperplates are generally excellently well executed, and the type, paper, and binding are all calculated to convey the most favourable ideas of the improvement made in these arts by our countrymen. Carey & Lea deserve rich rewards for their unceasing efforts to gratify the taste of the literary coteries.

While on the subject of the Annuals, we must be permitted to express our deep regret at the melancholy termination of the existence of our townsman, Francis Herbert, Esq. It is reported that he starved to death in our streets; and that so obdurate were the hearts of our citizens, despite the humour, the bonhomie, and the sprightly wit of this most excellent man, there were none to give him bread or water!

Encyclopedia Americana, vol. iv. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 1830.

The fourth volume of this popular dictionary has made its appearance. It completes the letter C, and carries the work forward to EVE. Time has not, of course, allowed us to examine the contents; but if they are equal in value to those of the preceding volumes, they will continue to elevate the favourable estimation in which this publication is already held.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Fair.—The annual exhibition of the "American Institute" was held last week, and furnished to thousands of gratified spectators the most indubitable evidences of the progressive, nay, rapid improvements made by our domestic manufacturers. Fabrics of the most costly and luxurious character, no less than those which minister to the mere necessities of life, were exhibited; and their execution might well challenge, both for effect of appearance and more durable tests, comparison with the products of the most skillful foreign industry. Is it not to be regretted that one of the main pillars of our social fabric should be made the mark for political shafts, and thus be seriously injured? We are no advocates for high tariffs, and illiberal restrictions on commerce; we would see all branches of home industry, whether directed to the plough, the wave, the field, or the spindle, equally encouraged and protected; and we believe that the enterprise, the intelligence, and emulation of the people, may be safely entrusted with the regulation of each; but surely political hostility should not be enlisted against any one of the three, as we see most incautiously and even wickedly done, by opposite partisans, against both commerce and manufactures. Such indifference or wanton enmity to the public weal, bespeaks the most abject absence of all those ennobling feelings and enlightened sentiments which are the ornaments, as they are the result, of political freedom. True Americans participate in no such degradation. They must and do rejoice in the unrestricted advancement of every art which can give employment to the industry of the people, elicit their ingenuity, or elevate them in the scale of knowledge and humanity.

Credit should have been given to the "Token for 1831," for the extract entitled a "Village Musician." It was omitted through mistake, and the error was not discovered until the page on which it is printed had gone to press.

HELEN TREVOR.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.—THE MUSIC BY CHARLES E. HORN.

MODERATO CON ESPRESSIONE.

The moon ar-ray'd in all her pride, at smil-ing o'er the pur-ple fell; When He-len sought the sil-ver tide, That wan-der'd through the flow'-ry dell, That wan-der'd through the flow'-ry dell. "Haste, sol-dier, haste," she wild-ly sung, "The bri-dal waits poor He-len Tre-vor;" Her wak'-ning chords sad ec-ho strung, And mourn-ful sigh'd, "poor He-len Tre-vor."
"Speed, soldier, speed, the war-boop's past, And thou shalt leave thy Helen never!" Speed from the trumpet's deadly blast! Wild echo dreaming, murmur'd "sever."
"The silent stars had sunk to rest, And dark and drear that silver flood; The moon had drow'd her golden crest, When Helen on its margin stood: "Wake, soldier, wake, thy Helen save; With sullen moan the waters sever," The birch weeps o'er fair Helen's grave, And echo's note is hush'd for ever."

THE SCORPION.—The following illustration of a fact mentioned in natural history occurred a few weeks since in London. A gentleman connected with the custom-house found in a case of sugar, in the London docks, a small scorpion, measuring about two inches from one extremity to the other. He took it home and put it upon a cold plate under a glass, where the little reptile appeared to be almost torpid, but on warming the glass it became full of life. It was then stated by a gentleman present, that he had heard that the scorpion, if it found itself in danger of meeting with a painful death, would sting itself, and cause its own immediate destruction. To ascertain the fact a circle of about three inches in diameter was drawn about the scorpion and covered with cotton dipped in spirits of wine. This being ignited, the scorpion made every possible effort to escape, but finding it impossible, and beginning to feel the effects of the fire, it instantly turned up its tail, and, with considerable force, struck the sting into its head. It was dead in an instant.

PREJUDICE.—The following forcible and beautiful delineation of prejudice is ascribed by Hugh Worthington, a late English divine, to the celebrated Dr. Price: "Prejudice may be compared to a misty morning in October; a man goes forth to an eminence and he sees at the summit of a neighbouring hill a figure, apparently of gigantic stature, for such the imperfect medium through which he is viewed would make him appear; he goes forward a few steps and the figure advances towards him; the size lessens as they approach; they draw still nearer, and the extraordinary appearance is gradually, but sensibly diminished; at last they meet, and, perhaps, the person he had taken for a monster proves to be his own brother."

THINKING.—To think is the highest exercise of the mind; to say what you think, the boldest effort of moral courage; and both these things are required for a really powerful writer. Eloquence without thought is a mere parade of words; and no man can express with spirit and vigour any thoughts but his own. This was the secret of the eloquence of Rousseau. The principal of the Jesuit's college one day inquired of him by what art he had been able to write so well. "I said what I thought," replied the unceremonious Genevan—conveying in these few words the bitterest satire on the system of the Jesuits, and the best explanation of his own.

TAKEN BY SURPRISE.—At the time when Mr. Peale was exhibiting his beautiful picture of the "Court of Death," in Boston, he sent the late Rev. Dr. Osgood a ticket, on which was inscribed, "Admit the bearer to the Court of Death;" the old gentleman never having heard of the picture was utterly confounded. "I expected to go before long," said he, "but I was not prepared for so abrupt a summons."

PERSIAN COINS.—One of the advantages of the late war between Russia and Persia will be the formation of the largest collection of Persian coins ever made, from the contribution paid by the Persians to Russia, and presented by the emperor to the academy of sciences, which previously possessed, in its extensive Asiatic museum, the richest collection of Persian coins of ancient times and of the middle ages.

HIGH AND EXCELLENT.—"Once," said a quaker, in a dispute concerning the propriety of titles, "I had the honour of being in company with an excellence and a highness. His excellency was the most ignorant and brutal man I ever saw, and his highness measured just four feet eight inches."

HONESTY IN SWITZERLAND.—It is customary in the canton of Wallis for those who have found any thing lost, even money, to affix it to a large crucifix in the churchyard; and there is not an example on record of an object being taken away except by the rightful owner.

Defaced tortoise-shell combs may be cleansed by rubbing them with pulverized rottenstone and oil; pulverized magnesia afterwards rubbed on with the dry hand, makes them brighter.

Be not astonished when you see men of virtue in disgrace, and dignities worn by those who have no right to them. Open your eyes and consider the innumerable stars which never lose any thing of their brightness, but the heaven's turn, and now the moon, now the sun, is eclipsed.

LOVE OF EASE.

How two gentlemen suffered from it; one losing his money—the other his wife.

Of the money one I will tell you first. Every body loved him, but every body said he loved his ease too much.

"Confound their meddling souls," said he; laying a most emphatic emphasis on the curse.

"What's the matter?" asked I.

"I must go up in that infernal steam-boat to-night," he growled in answer, and threw down a letter on the table.

We were sitting together at his lodgings; he was a wretched man—he was obliged to be a night on board the steam-boat.

"I must go up to that confounded land sale."

"It will save you a great deal," I added. "I'm surprised at your indifference."

"It is not my indifference, my friend—it is not (to mar an old quotation) that I love money less, but that I love ease more; in me you see an example of a victim to indulgence—the habits intended for my pleasure have become my torment. I have sunk into their slave."

"You give them a fictitious value," said I.

"I know it," added he, "Probo meliora," mon cher. I know what is right, but there is a fatal inclination pressing on to wrong; the love of ease is the ruin of our family—we can't help it—it's in the blood."

"In the fiddle-stick," said I. "I'll tell you what it is in; in your own want of exertion—in your own submission, without an honourable struggle, to a swinish passion."

Here was a young man indeed a martyr to it—he had a large estate in the country—he determined to sell the whole—he was unable to attend to it—he liked the city—his pleasures were there—and his friends, and his comforts, and his happiness. And in the country he was alone, he had no employment, and there were none of the conveniences of the town, and the journey up there was long; to go and stay there even a fortnight was impossible, he would rather be executed at once; he might as well have been, as the sequel will show, for his fortunes were.

He was determined to sell the whole tract at auction, and it was this sale he was obliged to go in the steam-boat to attend. On the day appointed he was there; it was a great exertion for his indolence, but he was there. The sale was made—there was some delay in the execution.

"I shall die in this place; they say it will be a fortnight before the deeds are made out, and the other papers. I can't stay," thought he, "I'll leave it to my agent;" and he left it to his agent—all his business—and his agent literally managed it for him. The agent was small, and had but one eye, and a mouth like a toad—and colour nearly too; he was so offensive to the eye, he excited the imagination; you thought of mischief and the father of mischief—and our young friend thought so too. But he thought "I can't stay a fortnight," and he could sue him should he prove a rogue. He was not certain he had property; but it was probable he had something. O yes! he could sue him; but the little dark gentleman (for he wore a full suit of black) thought "let him sue; I haven't much, and what I have is privately conveyed. I may make something out of young Laziness here, and if I can I will." He had another worthy neighbour with whom there was an extraordinary sympathetic conformité du naturel, for they both had hit upon the same scheme against our unfortunate city friend, who was idly and luxuriously amusing his bachelorship in town; but his bachelorship at times was forced to look a little serious. Two months had passed since his respectable friend the lawyer was to make out the deeds and send down the papers, and since the purchaser was to give a mortgage on his purchase—and since the following dialogue had passed between the lawyer and the purchaser:

"You've bought a large tract there," said the lawyer, "from a young citizen; he's a pretty careless sort of a gentleman," continued he; and there was an expression in his face that told his soul in a moment—his eyes glistened at the imagined feast of knavery before him.

"Yes," replied the other; and his features corresponded with his companion's—they understood each other, though both were silent; and, although before each feared to speak, now all fear vanished.

"I think we know each other," said the lawyer. "To be plain in the business, I think you and I could make something out of this youngster."

"I think we could," answered the other calmly, "with a worthy and honest co-operation. I have myself thought much upon it."

"I'll tell you a scheme," said the lawyer. "For three-fourths of the property you are to give a mortgage: now suppose you give me the first, and let him take the second. I will then get the whole by foreclosure as first mortgagee, and he may take the remainder as second—and we'll divide the tract. What say you, my old boy?"

"But," said his friend, "you must show a receipt to the court."

"So I will, one fourth cash, and the rest by mortgage, (number two)—but nobody will know the number."

His companion paused. "You're the prince of devils," said he, in ecstasy; "though it is against my conscience; so amiable and unsuspecting, and so young."

"All true," replied the lawyer; "but every man in this world should look out for himself; and if he chooses to neglect his affairs, every one—every one, sir," repeated he emphatically, (you might have thought he believed what he said,) "has a right to take advantage of his negligence."

His worthy friend was convinced, and they commenced the execution of their scheme, which our unfortunate young bachelor discovered—when alas, it was too late. He attempted prosecution, and he gained his suit—but in the Irish way; he gained a loss. The costs were to be paid, and there could be nothing got of the defendant's property; it had been warily secreted by a previous conveyance. He took the benefit of the act—and it was indeed a benefit to him; but it made the poor injured young gentleman despair. He was obliged to commence some employment; there was not one he was fit for, from want of habit; and the manual occupations which he was fit for, his pride and folly represented as beneath him. For a while he struggled, then yielded to utter recklessness and despair; and his face soon was distorted, and his colour tainted, and his form bloated with intemperance. In one year he was dead.

"What was his name?"

"I'll not mention it. My story is not much in his favour."

"Well—of the gentleman who lost his wife?"

"I'll tell you to-morrow."

LITERARY NOTICES.

An Ode: pronounced before the inhabitants of Boston, September the seventeenth, 1830, at the Centennial Celebration of the Settlement of the City. By Charles Sprague. Boston. 1830. 8vo. pp. 22.

Among the most successful native competitors for poetic renown, may be ranked the author of the poem before us, Charles Sprague, Esq. of Boston. This gentleman is already well known to our readers. In the Mirror of January sixteen, 1828, will be found a brief biographical sketch, in which the writer (Mr. Leggett) took occasion to say that "the prize poem, spoken at the Park theatre, in 1821, is surpassed by but two prologues in the English language, Pope's and Johnson's; and many, indeed, consider it superior to the latter." This production of Mr. Sprague, the first that brought the public acquainted with him as a child of song, has found a place in the memory of all lovers of the tuneful pine, among the admirable things that the memory delights to hoard; and the general regret is, that one who has vigour to soar so high in the region of poetry, should so seldom "wing his eagle flight."

The poem (or as the author has termed it, the ode), which now claims our attention, was written for a special and memorable event. On the seventeenth of September, in the year 1630, was commenced the first settlement of the town (now city) of Boston. Two hundred years have rolled away since that highly important event, the second centennial celebration of which took place in September last, on which occasion this ode was written and delivered by Mr. Sprague. It consists of about five hundred lines, of various lengths, which are divided into thirty irregular stanzas. The first stanza is an invocation to the Deity, and the second an apostrophe to the — bright ascended dead,

Who scorn'd the bigot's yoke;
Whose daring hands the flag of faith unfurl'd,
To float sublime,
Through future time,
The beacon-banner of another world.

In the third and fourth stanzas the poet alludes, with much pathos and feeling, to the hardships encountered by the pilgrims in their daring enterprise, when driven by oppression from their homes and the country that gave them birth; the cold and cheerless season of the year, the perils of the ocean, and the cruelties that awaited them from the natives of the western wilderness:

A fearful path they trod,
And dared a fearful doom;
To build an altar to their God,
And find a quiet tomb.

But the exile, it seems, was not entirely alone, nor wholly unblest; for the sweet accents of woman spoke comfort to him in his darkest hour;

She through the midnight watch was there,
With him to bend her knees in prayer;
She trod the shore with girded heart,
Through good and ill to claim her part;
In life and death with him to seal,
Her kindred love, her kindred zeal.

After briefly and poetically representing the pilgrims as landed on the "ice-bound rock," commonly called "Plymouth Rock," the poem proceeds in the following beautiful lines:

In grateful adoration now,
Upon the barren sands they bow.
What tongue of joy e'er woke such prayer,
As bursts in desolation there?
What arm of strength e'er wrought such power,
As waits to crown that feeble hour?
There into life an infant empire springs!
There falls the iron from the soul;
There liberty's young accents roll,
Up to the King of kings!
To fair creation's farthest bound,
That thrilling summons yet shall sound;
The dreaming nations shall awake,
And to their centre earth's old kingdoms shake.
Pontiff and prince, your away
Must crumble from that day.
Before the loftier throne of heaven,
The hand is raised, the pledge is given—
One monarch to obey, one creed to own,
That monarch God, that creed His word alone.
Spread out earth's holiest records here,
Of days and deeds to reverence dear;
A zeal like this what pious legends tell?
On kingdoms built
In blood and guilt,
The worshippers of vulgar triumph dwell—
But what exploit with theirs shall page,
Who rose to bless their kind;
Who left their nation and their age,
Man's spirit to unbind?
Who boundless seas pass'd o'er,
And boldly met, in every path,
Famine and frost and heathen wrath,
To dedicate a shore
Where piety's meek train might breathe their vow,
And seek their Maker with an unshamed brow;
Where liberty's glad race might proudly come,
And there set up an everlasting home?

The production before us abounds in beauties, but our time and limits will only permit us to make one more extract, and refer the reader to the pamphlet itself, which cannot be read without interest, pleasure, and profit. After several votive stanzas, intended "To keep the memory of the pilgrims green,"

the poet suddenly, but not abruptly or unnaturally, reverts to the original occupiers of these extensive realms, and forcibly appeals to our sympathies in their behalf. Alluding to the unparalleled prosperity and happiness of our own people, on the soil from which the Indians have been driven, he asks,

Shall not one line lament that lion race,
For us struck out from sweet creation's face?
Alas! alas! for them—those fated bands,
Whose monarch tread was on these broad, green lands;
Our fathers called them savage—then, whose bread,
In the dark hour, those famished fathers fed:
We call them savage, we,
Who hail the struggling free,
Of every clime and hue;
We, who would save
The branded slave,
And give him liberty he never knew;
We, who but now have caught the tale,
That turns each listening tyrant pale,
And blessed the winds and waves that bore
The tidings to our kindred shore!
The triumph-tidings pealing from that land,
Where up in arms insulted legions stand;
There, gathering round his bold compeers,
Where He, our own, our welcom'd one,
Riper in glory than in years,

Down from his forfeit throne,
A craven monarch hurled,
And spurned him forth, a proverb to the world!

We call them savage—O be just!
Their outraged feelings scan;
A voice comes forth, 'tis from the dust—
The savage was a man!
Think ye he loved not? who stood by,
And in his toils took part?
Woman was there to bless his eye—
The savage had a heart!
Think ye he prayed not? when on high
He heard the thunders roll,
What bade him look beyond the sky?
The savage had a soul!

I venerate the pilgrim's cause,
Yet for the red man, dare to plead—
We bow to heaven's recorded laws,
He turned to nature for a creed;
Beneath the pillared dome,
We seek our God in prayer;
Through boundless woods he loved to roam,
And the Great Spirit worshipped there;
But one, one fellow-throb with us he felt;
To one divinity with us he knelt;
Freedom, the self-same freedom we adore,
Bade him defend his violated shore;
He saw the cloud, ordained to grow,
And burst upon his hills in woe;
He saw his people withering by,
Beneath the invader's evil eye;
Strange feet were trampling on his father's bones;
At midnight hour he woke to gaze
Upon his happy cabin's blaze,
And listen to his children's dying groans:
He saw—and maddening at the sight,
Gave his bold bosom to the fight;
To tiger rage his soul was driven,
Mercy was not—nor sought nor given;
The pale man from his lands must fly;
He would be free—or he would die.

And was this savage? say,
Ye ancient few,
Who struggled through
Young freedom's trial-day—
What first your sleeping wrath awoke?
On your own shores war's larum broke;
What turned to gall even kindred blood?
Round your own homes the oppressor stood:
This every warm affection chilled,
This every heart with vengeance thrilled,
And strengthened every hand;
From mound to mound,
The word went round—
"Death for our native land!"

Alas! for them—their day is o'er,
Their fires are out from hill and shore;
No more for them the wild deer bounds,
The plough is on their hunting grounds;
The pale man's are rings through their woods,
The pale man's sail skims o'er their floods,
Their pleasant springs are dry;
Their children—look, by power oppressed,
Beyond the mountains of the west,
Their children go—to die.

O doubly lost! oblivion's shadows close
Around their triumphs and their woes.
On other realms, whose suns have set,
Reflected radiance lingers yet;
There sage and bard have shed a light
That never shall go down in night;
There time-crowned columns stand on high.
To tell of them who cannot die;
Even we, who then were nothing, kneel
In homage there, and join earth's general peal.
But the doom'd Indian leaves behind no trace,
To save his own, or serve another race;
With his frail breath his power has passed away,
His deeds, his thoughts are buried with his clay;
Nor lofty pile, nor glowing page
Shall link him to a future age,
Or give him with the past a rank:
His heraldry is but a broken bow,
His history but a tale of wrong and woe,
His very name must be a blank.

Cold, with the beast he slew, he sleeps;
O'er him no filial spirit weeps;
No crowds throng round, no anthem notes ascend,
To bless his coming and embalm his end;
Even that he lived, is for his conqueror's tongue,
By foes alone his death-song must be sung;
No chronicles but theirs shall tell
His mournful doom to future times;
May these upon his virtues dwell,
And in his fate forget his crimes.

Before closing this article we are bound, as true critics, to discover some faults, on pain of having called in question either our discernment or our impartiality. We dislike the fourth line, at the commencement of the poem, in the invocation to the Deity:

"Pure One, be with me, Thou!
Thou, in whose awful name," &c.

The sixth line of the second stanza is still more objectionable. The poet is invoking the spirits of the "bright ascended dead," to come and shed their influence round the place where the ode was delivered, and he calls on them to "Come, as ye came of yore."

Now it really appears to us that this was an unreasonable request. To put these disembodied spirits to the trouble of assuming material forms, chartering vessels, crossing the Atlantic, and landing again on the "ice-bound rock" of Plymouth. However, any one has power to "call spirits from the vasty deep;" but will they come?

In the fourth stanza, where he draws a contrast between the pilgrims and the children of Israel, showing the superior advantages enjoyed by the latter in their journeyings to the promised land, he says of the former:

"Nor power above, nor power below, Sustained them in their hour of woe."

This sentiment is not orthodox, to say the least of it. According to our poor thinking, they never could have surmounted such perils, toils, and afflictions, had they not been sustained by a "power above;" by one who has said, "Without me ye can do nothing."

The last line of the ninth stanza would be much improved in euphony by a slight transposition that would remove the accent from the word set and place it on up, thus,

"And there set up an everlasting home."

But these are trivial defects, and would have found no place in this article but for the reasons stated. The Ode is a brilliant production, and one that will add some fresh sprigs to the laurels which already shadow the brow of Mr. Sprague.

Life and Correspondence of John Paul Jones, including his Narrative of the Campaign of the L'Iman. From original Letters and Manuscripts in the possession of Miss Janette Taylor. 8vo. pp. 555. New-York. 1830.

It has probably fallen to the lot of no individual of ancient or modern times to be so much misrepresented as Paul Jones. For nearly sixty years his character and actions have furnished a theme for controversy, and a fruitful subject for exaggeration, misconception, and falsehood. He has been in turn befooled by novelists, vituperated by partizans, exalted by admirers, and belied by writers of all possible descriptions, until a true notion of himself and his exploits has become to all appearance as unattainable as the elucidation of that most sublime of all humbugs, the authorship of the Letters of Junius. Volumes innumerable have been written and published, (and probably read,) from the ponderous octavo to a sixpenny pamphlet, all professing to give the most veracious account of his history and character, and yet the puzzle remains as profound and perplexing as ever. While he lived he was in some countries looked upon as a pirate, and utterly destitute of honour or honesty; in others men called him a glorious madman; and even in America, for whose freedom he toiled and fought and bled during a large portion of his busy and adventurous life, there were, and probably are, many whose opinions would be more in favour of the energy than the purity of his mind and conduct. It is time that these misconceptions should be done away, and happily the means of accomplishing this desirable object are at length afforded.

Paul Jones appears to have been an indefatigable writer. It was his constant practice, from a very early age, to keep journals, in which all his own doings and designs were minutely recorded; and his correspondence with almost every person of note in France and America, from the time of his engaging in the cause of the United States, was amazingly extensive. In fact, he seems to have had as strong a passion for writing as for battle, and to have coveted literary as eagerly as martial renown. By a variety of accidents, portions of his papers have been scattered about in various parts of the world, and from time to time recovered; and finally his niece, Miss Janette Taylor arrived in this country, having in her possession a number of original documents, and authenticated copies of others, which, with those already here, probably form as complete a collection as it is now possible to get together. These materials were some months ago placed by Miss Taylor in the hands of a gentleman of known abilities, and the result is the volume now lying in sheets before us; for this early perusal of which, by the way, we owe to the editor our grateful acknowledgments.

It must be apparent to every one that the magnitude and difficulty of the task undertaken by the compiler consisted principally in the selection and arrangement of the immense body of materials laid before him; the object of the work was to present a just and accurate view of the character of Jones, and a faithful account of his services in the cause of freedom, with the vexations and difficulties with which he had to struggle in the prosecution of his innumerable designs. To this end it was most proper to let him speak for himself, and the compiler has, in consequence, wisely limited his own additions to such occasional remarks as were necessary to give the proper degree of connection to the narrative; and has, also, inserted such portions only of the letters and papers of those individuals and public bodies with whom Jones was connected, as were required to explain or confirm his own statements. It will be found, therefore, that a large proportion of this volume is of the admiral's own writing; and it affords a clear, satisfactory, and convincing refutation of the numberless idle stories which have been so long related of him, that it required no small share of courage as well as sagacity, not to receive them with full and implicit confidence.

It was our intention to draw up from the "Life and Correspondence" a very brief summary of the history of Admiral, or as he was oftener called, the Chevalier Jones, and to extract liberally from its pages, but want of time and space compels us, though reluctantly, to abandon this purpose; and indeed so far as the public is concerned, this is less to be regretted, for so interesting is the matter of the volume, that we feel confident of its commanding an extensive and general perusal. In it we think full justice is done to his character; hereafter he will be considered, and truly, as a man of wonderful activity of mind and body, of great resource and energy, and withal of high and honourable feelings. That he had his weaknesses, is also unquestionably true; but they were the weaknesses of genius; and if apology be needed for them, that apology may be found in the limited nature of his early education, and the peculiar circumstances in which he found himself. The most prominent among the defects of his character were irritability of temper and an undue sensitiveness on the subject of his fame; and it must be confessed, that the trials to which he was exposed were enough, both in number and magnitude, to excuse even greater failings than these. It is to be remembered that his passion for active employment amounted almost to a disease; that he was perpetually harassed and thwarted in his plans, by the timidity of some and the waywardness of others, and that those who were most anxious and willing to aid him in his projects, were themselves often compelled to submit to disappointments, which took from them the power of fulfilling their engagements to him. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that his letters so often breathe the language of complaint or even petulance; he felt that his purposes were honourable, and his mortifications were many and severe. But the compiler has himself given us just a description of his character that we cannot do better than extract that portion of his work, and hastily conclude with bearing our feeble testimony in favour of the skill and fidelity with which he has performed his arduous and important undertaking.

"In the personal appearance of Paul Jones there was nothing, if we may credit the statement of those who remember him, and among these, of ladies, who are perhaps the best judges, nor is there anything in the busts or pictures taken of him, that would have particularly attracted attention. He was of the middle size, if not rather under; naturally active in body, and capable of undergoing much fatigue, as is evident from the record of his life which has been presented. His bust, by Houdon, of which several copies remain in this country, is believed to be the best representation of his features ever made. Their character is that of decision and self-will.

His occupations, from boyhood until long after the period when the social habits of men are generally developed, were such as to include us from forming an estimate of what these would naturally have been, under other circumstances. His attachment to his near relations, of whom he saw so little from the period of his childhood, and nothing after a hasty visit paid to them when he was in his twenty-fourth year, is sufficiently shown by his correspondence, and the last act of his life. It became, of course, necessary for him to adopt the manners of the different courts and circles into which he was introduced; and, though he could not have been a polished courtier, it is as obvious that he was not rude and inapt. The frankness, and even the innocent vanity which may, perhaps, have characterized his demeanour on such occasions, are certainly allied to good nature, simplicity of heart, and a love for the family of man. The testimony of many of his officers, and the crews that served under him, rendered in different publications since his death, is not wanting to prove that, though a practical as well as a theoretical stickler for discipline, he was sincerely liked and revered among them. The late Commodore Dale, in relating anecdotes of his cruise under him, and their whole intercourse, always spoke of him as "Paul" simply, and as a friend whom he had loved and lost. In these different relations, therefore, and in the constant expressions of his craving desire to mitigate the woes, and break the fetters of mankind,

"Where'er degraded nature bleeds and pines,"

we can detect no elements of an organization, which could have made him, as tradition has reported, "an unpleasant companion in a stage-coach."

"That his temperament was ardent, impatient, and irritable, may not be denied. That he was enabled to subdue its first impulses, on occasions where important interests were at stake, should add to his fame the glory of victories, often more difficult than those which he gained on the ocean. We shall not take into account a few letters written under the combined pressure of disease and undeserved disappointment, when we say, that he never forfeited his own self-respect, nor was it ever mislaid or "frighted" from its propriety. In relation to his personal differences with individuals, idle stories have been in circulation, some of which have not become entirely obsolete; but they are all, where their truth might reflect discredit upon Jones, utterly without foundation, as a simple comparison of dates will prove. His treatment of the eccentric Landais, was precisely such as the conduct of that officer called for, after Jones truly understood his character, and the persecution against him had been dropped. Yet it was such as it is difficult for a man of common passions, not under subjection to high-souled principles, and an unequivocal consciousness of rectitude and superiority, to observe, at all times, without making some demonstration of anger, or exhibiting some signs of pain.

"His natural temper being duly considered, the education which Jones received, or rather acquired, will much more readily account for what may be deemed his infirmities, than for the successes he attained, and the honours he won with such chivalrous daring and wore with such chivalrous pride. He must be allowed to have possessed intellectual faculties much above those of ordinary men; and such as were precisely wanted for the services which our young republic required him to execute. The energy, accuracy, and propriety of his style of writing, show that he thought, as well as expressed himself, with an order and regularity which can never belong to an undisciplined mind. At the same time, he thought earnestly and solely with a reference to the point which he wished to carry; and went into negotiation as he went into battle, with no wish to waste any ammunition, or lose any time in manoeuvring. He was, of course, according to the manners of his age, a better partizan-warrior than diplomatist.

"The elements which constitute a hero were liberally mixed up in his character. He had courage, humanity, liberality; a romantic admiration of women; the art of commanding; the power of conceiving projects fraught with danger to the foe; of planning the details, and bringing them, by the mastery of his own practical genius, to a successful result; ambition that was checked in its speculative mood by no other restraint than that of principle; and the inextinguishable love of glory, which gave its own golden hues to all his doings, sufferings, and aspirations. And surely that for which he fought remains, though the light has long since faded away from his vision.

"He was, as has been remarked in the course of this compilation, precisely one of those men whom America wanted, and whom Providence in its wisdom raised up for the exigency." The very defects of his education, and even of his temper, were advantages to a cause where positive energy was invoked. He must and will be honoured among the foremost patriots whose services in battle the people of this republic are bound to hold in hallowed remembrance. It must be borne in mind, that the seeming frequency of his allusions to his own successes, in the foregoing pages, arises from the necessity of throwing together the correspondence of a series of years, addressed to individuals and public functionaries, and bodies widely separated by space and in political intercourse. It can scarcely be said, that he has exaggerated the utility, and certainly not the merit of his enterprises or performances. No naval commander, who sailed under the stars and stripes during the revolution, and "brought the red cross low," can claim more respectful notice in our annals, than the sailor boy from the shores of Solway Firth; who knew how to fight for the "rights of human nature," but was mistaken when he thought he could maintain his own independence, and reap laurels, in the service of a female autocrat, and under the orders of her luxurious and spoiled favourite, whose origin was still more humble than his own.

"Franklin and Jefferson duly appreciated his value. They gave him every proof of their entire confidence, and have left behind them their testimony to his courage, intelligence, and unquestioned fidelity. The latest evidence of this, too lately given to console even the dying moments of one whose blood and whose talents were devoted without reserve to the liberty of man, was furnished by Mr. Jefferson, when he recommended the admiral as a proper agent to redeem American captives from bondage in Algiers. Another name, no less illustrious, may be cited—that of one thrice happy, and thrice honoured; and whose crowning glory places him in a moral attitude which no living individual can hope to attain. Can history supply a parallel?"

Lafayette was the friend of Paul Jones. He was willing to have co-operated with him in one of the enterprises he had projected. He bears record to his high and stainless character as an officer, and as a man.

It is probable that the extravagant stories and ridiculous legends, circulated orally and in print, have excited a curiosity in relation to the life and character of Jones, which does not attach to that of many others, whose gallantry was equal to his own, but whom circumstances did not place in so prominent a point of view, or about whom there was less mystery, and less lying. He was one of those gallant men, whose exploits are worthy of being recorded; and whose example has been so well imitated, that the cause of freedom is almost by a millennium in advance of what might have been prudently anticipated a hundred years ago. In his fond devotion to that holy cause, Columbia was his muse; the doctrines of the fathers of our independence were the articles of his creed; and, by what has been narrated or quoted, in relation to his latter moments, it has been seen, that then, like a true religionist of whatever sect, turning his face towards the star, the region, or the temple of his idolatry, he looked last to the United States of America, the youngest of nations, before he died. When he fought under the flag which is now respected on the all-encompassing ocean, wherever its pulse agitates the meanest stream which pays to the sea its lawful tribute, he knew of but one land of freedom. Under that pictured constellation, commanding a meaning far more useful and sublime than eastern sages ever read or chronicled in their observations of the firmament; under this banner, which he first had the happy privilege of raising with his own hands, he sailed, as from the birth-place, and as bearing the ensign of Liberty. The ocean which he traversed, to maintain the holy cause in which he had embarked, was one and indivisible, save by fragile barriers, which could only make stagnant a portion of its waters, inculcably small, and the loss of which the fountains of the great deep would instantaneously supply.

"To this constellation he looked for his guidance, in the various courses on which he steered in his voyage of life. Can we better conclude this compilation of his shreds of autobiography than by hoping, that no one of those stars may ever 'shoot madly from its sphere;' and that this banner may float, during all time, the truly blazoned emblem of 'armed and awful' freedom?"

"For ever float that standard sheet!"

And while it does float, there will be no true servant of his country, whether intrusted by her with authority in her marine, or doing his duty therein in the humblest office, who will not revere the memory, rejoice in the glory, and sometimes sigh for the crosses and disappointments of John Paul Jones."

The Common School Manual: a regular and connected course of Elementary Studies, embracing the necessary and useful branches of a common education. In four parts. Compiled from the latest and most approved authors, by M. R. Bartlett.

Dewitt Clinton, the liberal and enlightened patron of all efforts made to promote the cause of education in this state, and the most zealous friend to our common schools, suggested to the author the plan of this work. Its object is to supply a system of instruction for a complete English education in a plain, practical, and progressive series of lessons, collaterally arranged. The pupil is systematically led from the most simple elementary instruction in a knowledge of letters, of orthography, of reading, of arithmetic, and so on to the other and higher branches of grammar, geography, history, &c. There is, in the first place, a primer of forty-eight pages, embellished with cuts. The lessons are short and simple, and preparatory to what is termed the first part of the system. This is contained in a neat duodecimo of one hundred pages, in which the elements of language, spelling of words from one to four syllables, reading, and counting, are taught in lessons marked out for each half day.

The second part consists of two hundred and seventy pages. Pronunciation, conversation, and poetry; arithmetic carried on to the rules of interest; grammar as far as prosody; and also geography.

In the third part, of three hundred and seventy pages, the higher branches of the same departments are introduced. Thus in reading, the pupil is initiated into biography, conversation on governments—in arithmetic, mensuration, elements of geometry, and book keeping. The declaration of independence and the constitution of the United States are presented to the scholar with very appropriate critical questions.

The fourth part contains five hundred pages, and is devoted to geography, history, and the natural sciences.

This brief abstract will sufficiently unfold the tenor and scope of the work, and when we add that the execution of the excellent plan is such as to have received merited and exalted marks of approbation, both from the eminent and lamented projector of the system, and from numerous other scholars and men of learning enjoying the first reputation, we have advanced an argument in its favour which must recommend it to the serious examination of all those who are interested in the advancement of elementary instruction.

A neat pamphlet, detailing the objects and contents of the four volumes, has been printed, and may be had at Mr. Sleight's bookstore, Clinton-hall.

Pocahontas, or the Settlers of Virginia, a National Drama, in three acts. By George Washington Custis, Esq. of Arlington-house. Philadelphia edition. 1830.

The story on which this drama is founded is familiar to most of our readers; and, in the language of a short preface to the piece under consideration, is truly "a tempting one for the dramatist." But we must hesitate before we subscribe to the conclusion of the sentence, that "more could not have been made of it than has been done in the present instance;" for, notwithstanding its run at the Philadelphia theatre, and the aforesaid preface assures us that "few pieces have been more successful than this," we are not prepared to speak very highly of it as a production creditable to our dramatic literature.

We are fully aware that in the construction of a modern melo-drama, stage effect is the principal thing to be consulted, if the author writes for money or popular applause. Indeed, we have somewhere heard, or dreamed, of even a five-act tragedy, which owed much of its "unparalleled success" to the same charm! Still, however, we cannot help entertaining some old-fashioned notions, with respect to probability and keeping, as connected with incident, situation, character, and above all, language, all of which we conceive to have been, in many instances, barbarously outraged in the production before us. Let one suffice. Is it consistent with our ideas of probability, or in accordance with the Indian character, for the aborigines of Virginia to adopt the same refined and courtly language (with the single exception of bad grammar, of which a word directly,) that was used by the cavaliers of England in the golden reign of "good queen Bess?" Yet such language (always bating the above exception,) has Mr. Custis put into the mouths of all his Indians. Indeed, in reading this play, we find it difficult to know the speaker's character or nation; and, were we not assisted by some local allusions, should frequently be compelled to refer to the cast for information on the subject.

As regards stage effect, we must confess that the author has exercised considerable tact and ingenuity. Some of the incidents are well managed, particularly that one, to which all the others are subservient, where Pocahontas saves the life of Smith, by throwing herself between the executioners' uplifted clubs and their intended victim. Also the first scene of the third act. The turbulent river, the rocks and cliffs, the ships, and the canoes, the martial pageantry of both parties, the great oak, Madoc's tomb, the skirmishes, single combats, surprises, and rescues, the trumpets, guns, and blunderbusses; and, above all, (as they should be,) the thunder and lightning, we as critics have nothing to do with, except to inform the reader that there is a quantum sufficit of such indispensable embellishments sprinkled through the pages of this national drama.

Matacoran, the Indian prince, is the only well-defined character in the piece, if we except the heroine; the others are merely outlines, very indistinctly marked; and the author has generally succeeded best where he has adhered closest to the novel from which he drew his materials. On the whole, as a melo-drama it is, in most instances, tolerably well managed; but, as a literary production, it will hardly add any thing to the reputation of the author. Among its prominent defects, the most obvious and common rules of grammar are frequently violated. Let us open the book at random for examples.

Page twenty-five—"Is it thou? Why you have really spoiled," &c. "Confess thy treachery or you die." Page fifteen—"I may afford ye protection." Page forty-two—"Is there ought thou would wish to say." Page twenty-eight—"For not like we do the English," &c. Page twenty-nine—"It was her whose image," &c. "It was her who inspired," &c. Page thirty-two—"Good rest to ye." "The guardian spirits keep ye." "Give ye good night." This error is of frequent occurrence. Independent of these there are many typographical errors, for which the printer alone is accountable.

Burritt's Universal Multipliers for computing Interest, simple and compound; adapted to the various rates in the United States, on a new plan. To which are added Tables of Annuities and Exchange. By Elisha Hinsdale Burritt, A.M. Second stereotype edition. Hartford. D. F. Robinson and Co. 1830.

The highest recommendation to be given to these tables is contained in the apology offered by the author for publishing them, viz. that they are original, and comprise more in less space than any others which have yet appeared in this country. The importance of such a compend to men engaged in all departments of business is too obvious to need amplification.

THE REFUSAL.

BY IOLANTE.

No, dearest one, not mine the hand
To bind thy free and tameless heart
In fetters which thou canst not break,
When changeful fancy bids us part.
Be it my task alone to bear
The daily strengthening chain,
And thou mayst wreath its links with flowers,
But never share its pain.
The slender fibre which unites
The young peach blossom to the bough,
Is not more fragile than the tie
That binds our hearts together now.
Yet better to be thus, for when
The tempest comes, as come it will,
It can but rend the fading flower,
The branch may flourish still.

THE DRAMA.

CINDERELLA.—This musical novelty is postponed at the Park theatre, in order, as we understand, to give sufficient time for ample preparation. On the authority of a gentleman lately from England, whose taste and judgment are undoubted, and who witnessed several representations of the piece at Covent Garden, it is considered one of the best operas ever produced on the British boards. The dialogue is short, pithy, and full of humour, and the low comedy parts light and highly amusing. The scenery and transformations are likewise described as admirable: among the most prominent is that of a fountain which separates and discovers Cinderella sleeping; the effect of this piece of machinery is said to have been astonishing. The music is composed entirely of selections from Rossini, comprising the whole that is worth retaining from La Cenerentola, added to morceaux, selected with fine taste, from Maometto Secondo, Armida, and Guillaume Tell. The extraordinary success of this piece, which tended to show Miss Paton's talents to the greatest advantage, is attributed to the perfect way in which the opera was cast, and the minute attention paid to every particular. On its attracting crowded and fashionable houses, our informant states that the opera La Cenerentola was put up at the Italian Opera House with Malibran; but that, in despite of the public favour that lady enjoys, the decided preference was given to the Cinderella of Covent Garden, Paton being very well able to bear a comparison with Malibran, and the band, chorus, acting, scenery, and selection of music, being evidently superior. The execution of the overture of Cenerentola was universally given in favour of the Covent Garden orchestra. This is a triumph for Mr. Lacy, the best compiler and conductor of the day, and reflects no little credit on Mr. Charles Kemble, the manager of Covent Garden, and Mr. Woodark, the leader of the band, who is a connexion of that gentleman; and it establishes one fact beyond question, that in a country as old in musical taste as England, if an entertainment be provided in the native tongue equal to that which foreigners can furnish, it will obtain patronage, and beat down, by the aid of proper feeling, the inclination which John Bull shares in common with us to admire, or pretend to admire, that which we do not understand.

On perusing the British musical journal called the Harmenicon, a work of the first authority, we find that in a review of the music of Cinderella it passes the highest encomiums on that opera, and confirms our statement.

MISS CLARA FISHER.—This pleasing and popular actress has been playing most of her favourite characters, commencing with the opera of Clari; and adding several excellent comedies and farces, among others that of Perfection. We are always happy to greet her return to the Park boards, where she is deservedly a favourite.

A WINTER SKETCH.

BY W. G. CLARK.

COME out beneath the sky! and if thy heart
Warm with thine upward thoughts, thou wilt not heed
The silent coldness of the perfect scene!
Look where the palace of the unbounded sky
Upstairs its fretted roof and glittering wall,
Where, like the gay lights of a festival,
Burn the unnumbered stars. How pure,
How holy is the hour! Far off the winds
Do seem to murmur on the pale blue hills,
That in the distance rise. From vale to vale
The scream of fox, or the deep boding cry
Of melancholy owl, remote is heard
Piercing the general calm. Gaze soft around
Thou who wouldst parley with thy throbbing heart,
Loud bounding in the hush about thee spread;
And as thou gazest, pause, to hear the faint
But voiceful dropping of the frozen dew
On the white snow hard by. Far off the west
Some clouds are lingering 'gainst pale amber skies
Not parted yet from twilight; and, unroll'd,
Their fleecy skirts like motionless waters lie,
Becalmed 'neath moveless ships. Far off
They blend into the varying northern cope
Where transient spires of thin-wrought light ascend
In quivering tissues, flickering and high.
It is an hour for thought! The landscape sleeps!
On the near hill-tops stand the silent pines:
Their green and giant arms white wreaths depress—
The coronals of the cloud. The earth, the sky,
Wear a deep spell of purity and peace:
On many a hearth the watchful house-dog lies
In fitful slumbering; upon many an eye
Rests the down-folded lid; on many a brain
The dewy glories of sweet visions lie.
On cottage trees some late and lingering leaf
Inconstant rustles to the unsteady air
With melancholy music. Flocks are fed—
And slumbering ruminant in many a fold.
Soft quiet wraps the time. Yes, 'tis an hour
When o'er the mountains and the vales of earth,
And wastes of surging waters, vexed with storm,
The spirit's wings mysteriously should move,
Bringing contentment on its untorn plume,
And glorious triumph that its course is free.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA,
To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER FOUR.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

THE vice-consul had sent his boat and young man alongside of us the moment we had hauled in, so that our register was made and birth assigned us at once, whereupon we landed, and proceeded to the consulate. Here I found that I should be under the necessity of obtaining a passport previous to my being allowed to visit the city; and as it would be several hours in the formality of making out, I should lose the steam-boat for this day, and might therefore make up my mind to enjoy it at Cronstadt. After settling the affairs of the ship, and learning the news, we took a few general directions and sallied out to see what affinity Russia lions bore to those we had left at home.

Our first attention was directed to the public works; but, previous to giving you a description of them, it is proper that you should know that vessels drawing over about seven feet of water cannot cross the bar at the mouth of the Neva, and consequently ascend to St. Petersburg. For the accommodation, therefore, of the larger class of merchantmen trading here, and for the protection of his infant navy, Peter the Great found it necessary to establish a good harbour somewhat lower down. Accordingly, as early as the year 1710, he fixed upon the south-east end of the island of Catlini Ostrof, about eighteen miles below the capital, for this purpose; and his successors have steadily followed up his plans, till the port and its defences are now nearly complete. Having no natural protection, thick double walls of hewn granite are run out into the gulf, joining at the ends with another running parallel with the island, thus nearly forming a quadrangle, with an opening in front wide enough to admit two vessels abreast, and enclosing an area of water sufficient to float at least seven hundred sail, and as completely protecting them from the heavy wind and sea as if completely moored in a New-York dock. This is called the "Merchant's Mole," and is exclusively occupied by foreign vessels. In addition there are wide canals, and several smaller moles formed by the same materials for the men-of-war, and commodious enough for any navy that Russia may have to lie here for half a century. There were several ships of the line, frigates, &c. repairing and in ordinary. As naval models they certainly do credit to the shipwrights, but being principally of fir, they soon decay, and are rendered totally useless. The emperor, becoming sensible of the little service to be expected from vessels of so light timber, has ordered those to be built in future, and those now on the stocks, to be constructed out of oak, so that he may look forward to the possession of stronger and more durable ships. But they have what we should consider a queer way of making sailors here. A tall mast with yards, ropes, and sails, is erected ashore, and recruits drafted from the peasantry in the interior, the same as for the land service, brought down to Cronstadt, and regularly piked aloft and exercised in naval tactics and seamanship. No doubt the government would prefer a completely practical to this half theoretical method of forming its seamen, but there being very few vessels owned and manned by native citizens, and little employ for the ships of war abroad, it is a drill that the officers of necessity have adopted, to give the numerous recruits for the service even this small insight into the duties of their profession. Crews thus formed must, of course, at first be very inefficient, especially in bad weather or an engagement at sea; and before Russia can ever be formidable on the ocean, she must have bred more of her numerous subjects by fisheries and commerce to the watery element, and of this, from her inland situation and frozen harbours, I consider there is little probability for a long time to come.

The fortifications are strong in proportion to the harbour, and far more extensive. Thick bastions of earth are thrown upon the land side; granite ramparts face the water, garnished with a numerous artillery, and several forts rise from the gulf in the immediate vicinity, bristling with cannon, quite sufficient, I should suppose, if well served, to instantly disable any number of vessels that could be brought to bear against the place. The streets cross each other at right angles, and those near the water are mostly well paved. The government buildings are of brick, plastered outside, very commodious, and make a neat and handsome appearance, and form a large proportion of the town. Those of the private citizens are generally of wood, painted a light brown, and not exceeding one and two stories. There are fine Russian churches, the principal of which is called the cathedral of St. Andrew, and with its tall spire has rather an imposing appearance. I noticed a few shrines in addition, with lamps burning before them, and also a German Lutheran and church of England chapel, both of which have settled clergymen, who regularly officiate in their native languages. The hospital, and indeed all the government establishments, appear in fine order, and abundantly provided with materiel for kill and cure. Russian sailors and soldiers form the great majority of the place, and its population is said to be not less than forty five thousand; add to these the great influx of the crews of foreign vessels during summer, and one would not look for much refinement among the inhabitants. The regulations of the port and military police, however, are so strict as to enforce good order; and, so far as I am informed, nothing like a serious riot ever takes place.

Back of the town we found a pleasant public garden, with a wooden tower standing on an artificial mound; the view from the top is extensive, but not of sufficient variety to much interest one, the island being totally flat, and with the exception of a few white birches, quite destitute of wood, and the wide range of waters outside of the moles were scarcely studied with a single sail. After satisfying ourselves that his imperial majesty's land and water did not materially differ from that we had often seen in different quarters of the globe, and immortalizing our names by placing the initials among hundreds of others on the parapet of the tower, we recollected that the hour had nearly approached at which we had promised to grace the dinner board of the vice-consul, and accordingly adjourned to his residence. Mr. Lenattzen is the deputed authority of the United States' consul, who finds it necessary constantly to reside at St. Petersburg. We found him extremely attentive and efficient in his official duties, and he proved equally agreeable as a host, treating us to most excellent claret, with five courses in the French style, and the society of his charming little family of flaxen-haired daughters.

EXCERPTS.

The most manifest sign of wisdom is continued cheerfulness: her estate is like that of things in the regions above the moon, always clear and serene.

He submits himself to be seen through a microscope, who suffers himself to be caught in a passion.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

RELIGION OF THE SEA.

BY GREENWOOD.

"In every object here I see
Something, O Lord, that leads to thee!
Firm as the rocks thy promise stands,
'Thy mercies countless as the sands,
Thy love a sea immensely wide,
Thy grace an ever flowing tide."—J. Newton.

THE ocean is wonderful and divine in its forms and changes and sounds, in its grandeur, its beauty, its inhabitants, its uses, and its mysteries, its variety, in all that strikes the sense and is immediately apprehended by the understanding. But besides all these, and lying deeper than all, it possesses a moral interest, which is partly bestowed upon it, and partly borrowed from it, by the mind of man. The soul finds in it a fund of high spiritual associations. Analogies are perceived in it, which connect it most affectingly with our mortal life, with dread eternity, and with Almighty God himself, the source and end of all. And thus it becomes a principal link in that great chain of purpose and sympathy, with which the Creator has bound up all matter and mind, together with his own infinite being, in one concentrating whole.

The sea has often been likened to this our life. Poetry is fond of remarking resemblances between it and the passions and fortunes of humanity. Our contemplations launch forth on its capacious bosom, and gather up the images and shadowings of our existence and fate, of what we are, and what is appointed to us. Do we see its multitudinous waves rushing blindly and impetuously along wherever they are driven by the lashing wind? They remind us of the tempest of an angry mind, or the tumult of an enraged people. Are the waves hushed, and is a calm breathed over the floods? It is the similitude of a peaceful breast, of a composed and placid spirit, or a quiet, untroubled time. Doubts, anxieties, and fears pass over our minds, as clouds do over the sea, tinging them, as the clouds tinge the waters, with their deep and threatening hues. Does a beaming hope or a golden joy break in suddenly upon us, in the midst of care or misfortune? What is it but a ray of light, such as we sometimes behold sent down from the rifted sky, shining alone in the dark horizon, a sun-burst on a sullen sea?

Then how often are the vicissitudes of life compared with the changes of the ocean. Who that has been abroad on the sea, who that has heard or read any thing of its phenomena, does not know that to the most propitious winds and skies which can bless the mariner, frequently succeed those which are the most adverse and destructive; that the morning may rise with the fairest promises, bringing the favouring breeze and smiling over the pleasant water, and ere the evening falls, or before high noon is come, the scene may be wrapt in gloom, the steady gale may be converted into the savage blast, the gay sunbeams may be followed by the blue lightnings, and the floods above be poured down on the floods below, as if together they were determined, as of old, to drown and desolate the world? And do not these things take place in the voyage of human life? Who knows not how often youth sets sail with flattering hopes and brilliant prospects, which are changed before manhood, into dreary disappointment or black despair? Who knows not how often and how suddenly the sun of prosperity may be covered up from sight, and its glowing rays be quenched in the coldness and darkness and fearfulness of howling adversity? Who knows not that in the midst of joy and peace, the billows of affliction may all at once rise up, and roll in upon the soul? "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me," cries the mourning Psalmist; and again he complains, "Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps. Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves." And there is not, perhaps, in all literature, sacred or profane, a more striking image of dank, weltering, utter desolation, than is contained in the exclamation of the prophet Jonah. "The depth closed me round about," says he, "the weeds were wrapped about my head."

Though no voyage, on the sea or in life, is free from vicissitudes, yet the same changes happen not to all, nor do all suffer the same or equal reverses. Our barks are all abroad on the wide surface of existence, and some experience more severe and frequent storms, or more baffling winds than others. For some, the gales of prosperity appear to blow, as we may say, tropically, so fair and steady is the course of fortune into which they seem to have fallen; while others appear to have encountered, almost at the outset, an unfavourable vein, which has opposed, wearied, and persecuted them to the very end. To that end they all arrive, sooner or later. The ocean has many harbours; life has but one. It is safe and peaceful. There the tempests cease to rage, and all the winds of heaven fold up their wings and rest. There the mariner reposes from all his toils, and he forgets his perils and fears, his watchings and fatigues. The billows are without; they foam and toss in vain. The sails are furled, and the anchors are dropped. "We sail the sea of life," says the poet,

"We sail the sea of life—a calm one finds,
And one a tempest—and, the voyage o'er,
Death is the quiet haven of us all."

Thus discourses the ocean on the great themes of mortality—the eloquent ocean, sounding forth incessantly, in its deep-toned surges, a true and dignified philosophy; repeating to every shore the moral and the mystery of human life.

But it does something more. It is so vast, so uniform, so full, so all enveloping, that it leads the thoughts to a sublimer theme than life or time, to the theme of dread eternity. When contemplations on this subject are suggested by it, human life shrinks up into a stream, wandering through a varied land, now through flowers, and now through sands, now clearly and now turbidly, now smoothly and quietly, and now obstructed and chafed, till it is lost at last in the mighty ocean, which receives, and feels it not. There is nothing among the earthly works of God, which brings the feeling—for it can hardly be termed a conception—the feeling of eternity so powerfully to the soul, as does the "wide, wide sea." We look upon its waves, succeeding each other continually, one rising up as another vanishes, and we think of the generations of men, which lift up their heads for a while and then pass away, one after the other, for all the noise and show they make, even as those restless and momentary waves. Thus the waves and the ages come and go, appear and disappear, and the ocean and eternity remain the same, undecaying and unaffected, abiding in the unchanging integrity of their solemn existence. We stand upon the solitary shore, and we hear the surges beat, uttering such grand, inimitable symphonies as are fit for the audience of cliffs and skies; and our minds fly back through years and years, to that time when, though we were not and our fathers were not, those surges were yet beating, incessantly beating, making the same wild music, and heard alone by the overhanging cliffs, and the over-arching skies, which silently gave heed to it, even as they do now. In the presence of this old and united company we feel on what an exceedingly small point we stand, and how soon we shall be swept away, while the surges will continue to beat on that very spot, and the cliffs and the skies will still lean over to hear. This is what may be called the feeling of eternity. Perhaps the feeling is rendered yet more intense, when we lie on our bed, musing and watching, and hear the sonorous cadences of the waves coming up solemnly and soothingly through the stillness of night. It is as the voice of a spirit—as the voice of the spirit of eternity. The ocean seems now to be a living thing, ever living and ever moving, a sleepless influence, a personification of unending duration, uttering aloud the oracles of primeval truth.

"Listen! the mighty being is awake,
And doth with his eternal motion make
A sound like thunder, everlastingly."

Where are the myriads of men who have trodden its shores, and gone down to it in ships? They are passed away. Not a single trace has been left by all their armaments. Where are the old kingdoms which were once washed by its waves? They have been changed, and changed again, till a few ruins only tell where they stood. But the sea is all the same. Man can place no monuments upon it, with all his ambition and pride. It suffers not even a ruin to speak of his triumphs or his existence. It remains as young, as strong, as free, as when it first listened to the Almighty word, and responded with all its billows to the song of the morning stars.

"Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow;
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now."

It is this immutability which, more than any other of the attributes of ocean, perhaps, impresses our minds with the sentiment of eternity, and gives to it its character of superiority among the works of God. Earth never frees itself entirely from the subjection of man. It constantly receives and covers his fallen remains, indeed, but is made to bear memorials of the victor, even after he is vanquished. All over the world we see the vestiges of former generations; their caves, their wells, their pyramids, their roads, their towers, their graves. But none of these things are on the sea. Its surface is unmarked but by its own commotions; and when it buries man or man's works, the sepulture is sudden and entire; a plunge, a bubble, and the waters roll on as before, careless of the momentary interruption of their wonted flowing. Thus immutable, thus unworn and unsullied is ocean. To what shall it be compared but to the highest subjects of thought, to life, to immortality? It allies itself in its greatness more with spirit than with matter. It holds itself above subjection or control. It seems to have a will, a liberty, and a power.

As these are high associations, they readily lead us up to Him who is above all height. There is a natural connexion between all sublime and pure sentiment, and the conception of Deity. All grandeur directs us to him, because we have learnt that he is greatest. We cannot stop in the creature, after we have received any true ideas of the Creator. And thus God himself comes, as it by an influence of his spirit, into our minds, when we are looking upon the sea, or listening to its roar, and inhibiting the emotions which it is so powerful to excite. Where he comes, he reigns. The conception of God, when it enters, takes the throne of authority among the other thoughts, and brings them into easy subordination. And then we think how inferior and dependent are all might and majesty, compared with his. The eternity of ocean becomes a brief type of the eternity of him who made it, and all its grandeur as a passing shadow of his. It does not, however, lose any of its interest by this kind of inferiority. Nothing is lessened to the pious mind by being esteemed less than the Supreme. It retains its connexion with eternity and God, and is exalted by its glorious dependence. It puts on the aspect, and speaks with the added solemnity of religion; telling us that all its power and magnificence are from the Maker, and that if it is full of beauty, and life, and usefulness, and mystery, it is because the Maker is good and wise and infinite. The sea has been called the religious sea. It is religious, as it suggests religious thoughts and emotions. And as the feelings excited by a noble object in a contemplative soul, are always in some degree reflected back upon that object, the sea will appear to be in its own self religious; to know that it is lying in the hollow of the Almighty's hand; to chant loud anthems to his praise in the noise of its rushing floods, and to send up its more quiet devotions in the breathing stillness of its calms. In short, we know nothing of the sea as we ought to know, we feel nothing of its best and sublimest inspirations, unless we receive from it, and communicate to it, the thoughts and feelings of religion; unless we grow devout as we gaze, and return from contemplating it with the consciousness that we have entered into a nearer union with God.

The moral associations which have now been described as naturally arising from the soul's converse with the sea, are all in a great degree definite. The deep is, as it were, freighted and laden with them, and bears them richly to our receiving bosoms. And when we look out upon the ocean, without fixing on either of these associations as the direct subject of thought, it is the union of several or of all of them, which, almost unconsciously to us, produces such a strong impression within us. But besides these sentiments which can be traced and numbered, there are feelings suggested by that magnificent object, which cannot so well, if at all, be defined. I believe that no one, who loves nature, has let his soul go out on the sea without experiencing emotions which he could not possibly explain, but which were as real as any that he ever felt. All that he can tell of them is that they are elevating and refining. Further than this he cannot communicate them, for they baffle all description and search. It seems to him, sometimes, as he waits and watches on the shore, that the Great Spirit himself moves, as in the beginning, on the face of the waters, and speaks to him holy words, which, though he hears and imbibes, he cannot fully understand; which he knows not now, but will know hereafter. They come like whispers of that communion, intelligence, and consent which pervade creation. They teach us something of our unrevealed connexions, something of the unseen and unimaginable future; and, in so be that we are disposed to bring down all our faith, and trust to that alone which we can touch and define, they gently rebuke us for our coldness, and intimate to us that there are more, many more things in heaven and earth and sea, than are dreamt of in our philosophy.

I have spoken as I was able, and not as I could have desired, of the "great and wide sea." Let the rest be learnt by each one, where it can be learnt much better than from me, from the sea itself. If I have induced a single individual, who has hitherto regarded it as a barren collection of waters, or a medium for traffic merely, to look upon it as something more wonderful, divine, and useful than this, I am satisfied. If his curiosity is at all excited, let him go to the sea-shore and get wisdom. If his devout affections are at all moved, let him go to the ocean and worship.

"His choir shall be the moonlight waves,
When murmuring homeward to their caves;
Or, when the stillness of the sea,
Even more than music, breathes of Thee!"

Every object in nature yields instruction to the teachable and listening mind; but some objects utter a voice more powerful, more commanding, more thrilling than others. If we may find, as one of the best English poets tell us we may, "sermons in stones," in lifeless stones, what eloquent and soul-stirring addresses may we not hear from the living, glorious, beautiful, eternal sea!

SIGHTS FROM A STEEPLE.

So! I have climbed high, and my reward is small. Here I stand, with wearied knees, earth, indeed, at a dizzy depth below, but heaven far, far beyond me still. O that I could soar up into the very zenith, where man never breathed, nor eagle ever flew, and where the ethereal azure melts away from the eye, and appears only a deepened shade of nothingness! And yet I shiver at that cold and solitary thought. What clouds are gathering in the golden west, with direful intent against the brightness and the warmth of this summer afternoon! They are ponderous air-ships, black as death, and freighted with the tempest; and at intervals their thunder, the signal-guns of that unearthly squadron, rolls distant along the deep of heaven. These nearer heaps of fleecy vapour—methinks I could roll and toss upon them the whole day long!—seem scattered here and there, for the repose of tired pilgrims through the sky. Perhaps—for who can tell?—beautiful spirits are disporting themselves there, and will bless my mortal eye with the brief appearance of their curly locks of golden light and laughing faces, fair and faint as the people of a rosy dream. Or, where the floating mass so imperfectly obstructs the colour of the firmament, a slender foot and fairy limb, resting too heavily upon the frail support, may be thrust through, and suddenly withdrawn, while longing fancy follows them in vain. Yonder again is an airy archipelago, where the sunbeams love to linger in their journeyings through space. Every one of those little clouds has been dipped and steeped in radiance, which the slightest pressure might disengage in silvery profusion, like water wrung from a sea-maid's hair. Bright they are as a young man's visions, and like them, would be realized in chillness, obscurity, and tears. I will look on them no more.

In three parts of the visible circle, whose centre is this spire, I discern cultivated fields, villages, white country-seats, the waving lines of rivulets, little placid lakes, and here and there a rising ground, that would fain be termed a hill. On the fourth side is the sea, stretching away towards a viewless boundary, blue and calm, except where the passing anger of a shadow flits across its surface, and is gone. Hitherward, a broad inlet penetrates far into the land; on the verge of the harbour, formed by its extremity, is a town; and over it am I, a watchman, all-hedding and unheeded. O that the multitude of chimneys could speak, like those of Madrid, and betray, in smoky whispers, the secrets of all who, since their first foundation, have assembled at the hearths within! O that the limping devil of Le Sage would perch beside me here, extend his wand over this contiguity of roofs, uncover every chamber, and make me familiar with their inhabitants! The most desirable mode of existence might be that of a spiritualized Paul Pry, hovering invisible round man and woman, witnessing their deeds, searching into their hearts, borrowing brightness from their felicity, and shade from their sorrow, and retaining an emotion peculiar to himself. But none of these things are possible; and if I would know the interior of brick walls, or the mystery of human bosoms, I can but guess.

Yonder is a fair street, extending north and south. The stately mansions are placed each on its carpet of verdant grass, and a long flight of steps descends from every door to the pavement. Ornamental trees, the broad-leaved horse chestnut, the elm so lofty and bending, the graceful but infrequent willow, and others whereof I know not the names, grow thrivily among brick and stone. The oblique rays of the sun are intercepted by these green citizens and by the houses, so that one side of the street is a shaded and pleasant walk. On its whole extent there is now but a single passenger advancing from the upper end; and he, unless distance and the medium of a pocket spy-glass do him more than justice, is a fine young man of twenty. He saunters slowly forward, slapping his left hand with his folded gloves, bending his eyes upon the pavement, and sometimes raising them to throw a glance before him. Certainly he has a pensive air. Is he in doubt, or in debt? Is he, if the question be allowable, in love? Does he strive to be melancholy and gentlemanlike? Or, is he merely overcome by the heat? But I bid him farewell, for the present. The door of one of the houses, an aristocratic edifice, with curtains of purple and gold waving from the windows, is now opened, and down the steps come two ladies, swinging their parasols, and lightly arrayed for a summer ramble. Both are young, both are pretty; but methinks the left hand lass is the fairest of the twain; and though she be so serious at this moment, I could swear that there is a treasure of gentle fun within her. They stand talking a little while upon the steps, and finally proceed up the street. Meantime, as their faces are now turned from me, I may look elsewhere.

Upon that wharf, and down the corresponding street, is a busy contrast to the quiet scene which I have just noticed. Business evidently has its centre there, and many a man is wasting the summer afternoon in labour and anxiety, in losing riches, or in gaining them, when he would be wiser to flee away to some pleasant country village, or shaded lake in the forest, or wild and cool sea-beach. I see vessels unloading at the wharf, and precious merchandise strown upon the ground, abundantly as at the bottom of the sea, that market whence no goods return, and where there is no captain or supercargo to render an account of sales. Here, the clerks are diligent with their paper and pencils, and sailors ply the block and tackle that hang over the hold, accompanying their toil with cries, long-drawn and roughly melodious, till the bales and puncheons ascend to upper air. At a little distance, a group of gentlemen are assembled round the door of a warehouse. Grave seniors be they, and I would wager—if it were safe, in these times, to be responsible, for any one—that the least eminent among them, might vie with old Vincentio, that incomparable trafficker of Pisa. I can even select the wealthiest of the company. It is the elderly personage in somewhat rusty black, with powdered hair, the superfluous whiteness of which is visible upon the cape of his coat. His twenty ships are wafted on some of their many courses by every breeze that blows, and his name—I will venture to say, though I know it not—is a familiar sound among the far separated merchants of Europe and the Indies. But I bestow too much of my attention in this quarter. On looking again to the long and shady walk, I perceive that the two fair girls have encountered the young man, and, after a sort of shyness in the recognition, he turns back with them. Moreover, he has sanctioned my taste in regard to his companions by placing himself on the inner side of the pavement, nearest the Venus to whom I—enacting, on a steeple-top, the part of Paris on the top of Ida—adjudged the golden apple.

In two streets, converging at right angles towards my watch-tower, I distinguish three different processions. One is a proud array of volunteer soldiers in bright uniform, resembling, from the height whence I look down, the painted veterans that garrison the windows of a toy-shop. And yet, it stirs my heart; their regular advance, their nodding plumes, the sun-flash on their bayonets and musket-barrels, the roll of their drums ascending past me, and the life ever and anon piercing through—these things have awakened a warlike fire, peaceful though I be. Close to their rear marches a battalion of school-boys, ranged in crooked and irregular platoons, shouldering sticks, thumping a harsh and unripe clatter from an instrument of tin, and unfortunately aping the intricate manoeuvres of the foremost band. Nevertheless, as slight differences are scarcely perceptible from a church spire, one might be tempted to ask, "Which are the boys?" or rather, "Which the men?" But, leaving these, let us turn to the third procession, which, though sadder in outward show, may excite identical reflections in the thoughtful mind. It is a funeral. A hearse, drawn by a black and bony steed, and covered by a dusty pall; two or three coaches rumbling over the stones, their drivers half asleep; a dozen couple of careless mourners in their every day attire; such was not the fashion of our fathers when they carried a friend to his grave. There is now no clang of passing bell to proclaim sorrow to the town. Was the king of terrors more awful in those days than in our own, that wisdom and philosophy have been able to produce this change? Not so. Here is a proof that he retains his proper majesty. The military men, and the military boys are wheeling round the corner, and meet the funeral fall in the face. Immediately the drum is silent, all but the tap that regulates each simultaneous foot-fall. The soldiers quit the path to the dusty hearse and unpretending train, and the children quit their range and cluster on the sidewalk, with timid and instinctive curiosity. The mourners enter the church-yard at the base of the steeple, and pause by an open grave among the burial stones; the lightning glimmers on them as they lower down the coffin, and the thunder rattles heavily while they throw the earth upon its lid. Verily the shower is near, and I tremble for the young man and the girls who have now disappeared from the long and shady street.

How various are the situations of the people covered by the roofs beneath me, and how diversified are the events at this moment befalling them! The new-born, the aged, the dying, the strong in life, and the recent dead, are in the chambers of these many mansions. The full of hope, the happy, the miserable, and the desperate, dwell together within the circle of my glance. In some of the houses over which my eyes roam so coldly, guilt is entering into hearts that are still tenanted by a debased and trodden virtue—guilt is on the very edge of commission, and the impending deed might be averted; guilt is done, and the criminal wonders if it be irrevocable. There are broad thoughts struggling in my mind and, were I able to give them distinctness, they would make their way in eloquence. Lo! the rain-drops are descending.

The clouds, within a little time, have gathered over all the sky, hanging heavily, as if about to drop in one unbroken mass upon the earth. At intervals the lightning flashes from their brooding hearts, quivers, disappears, and then comes the thunder, travelling slowly after its twin-born flame. A strong wind has sprung up, howls through the darkened streets, and raises the dust in dense bodies, to rebel against the approaching storm. The disbanded soldiers fly, the funeral has already vanished like its dead, and all people hurry homeward—all that have a home; while a few lounge by the corners, or trudge on desperately, at their leisure. In a narrow lane which communicates with the shady street, I discern the rich old merchant putting himself to the top of his speed, lest the rain should convert his hair-powder to a paste. Unhappy gentleman! By the slow vehemence and painful moderation wherewith he journeys, it is but too evident that Podagra has left its thrilling tenderness in his great toe. But yonder, at a far more rapid pace, come three other of my acquaintance, the two pretty girls and the young man, unseasonably interrupted in their walk. Their footsteps are supported by the risen dust, the wind lends them its velocity, they fly like three sea-birds driven landward by the tempestuous breeze. The ladies would not thus rival Atalanta, if they but knew that any one were at leisure to observe them. Ah! as they hasten onward, laughing in the angry face of nature, a sudden catastrophe has chanced. At the corner where the narrow lane enters into the street, they come plump against the old merchant, whose tortoise motion has just brought him to that point. He likes not the sweet encounter; the darkness of the whole air gathers speedily upon his visage, and there is a pause on both sides. Finally he thrusts aside the youth with little courtesy, seizes an arm of each of the two girls, and plods onward, like a magician with a prize of captive fairies. All this is easy to be understood. How disconsolate the poor lover stands! regardless of the rain that threatens an exceeding damage to his well-fashioned habiliment, till he catches a backward glance of mirth from a bright eye, and turns away with whatever comfort it conveys.

The old man and his daughters are safely housed, and now the storm lets loose its fury. In every dwelling I perceive the faces of the chambermaids as they shut down the windows, excluding the impetuous shower, and shrinking away from the quick fiery glare. The large drops descend with force upon the slated roofs, and rise again in smoke. There is a rush and roar, as of a river through the air, and muddy streams bubble majestically along the pavement, whirl their dusky foam into the kennel, and disappear beneath iron grates. Thus it was that Arethusa sunk. I love not my station here aloft, in the midst of the tumult which I am powerless to direct or quell, with the blue lightning wrinking on my brow, and the thunder muttering its first awful syllables in my ear. I will descend. Yet let me give another glance to the sea, where the foam breaks out in long white lines upon a broad expanse of blackness, or boils up in far distant points, like snowy mountain-tops in the eddies of a flood; and let me look once more at the green plain and little hills of the country, over which the giant of the storm is striding in robes of mist, and at the town, whose obscured and desolate streets might beseech a city of the dead: and turning a single moment to the sky, now gloomy as an author's prospects, I prepare to resume my station on lower earth. But stay! A little speck of azure has widened in the western heavens; the sunbeams find a passage, and go rejoicing through the tempest; and on yonder darkest cloud, born, like hallowed hopes of the glory of another world, and the troubles and tears of this, brightness forth the rainbow!

EXTRA POLITENESS.

During an excursion on board a steam-boat on the Potomac, and whilst the company were amusing themselves with dancing, a young lady happened to slip and fall on the deck. A dandy, who chanced to be near at the time, stood motionless; and on being asked why he did not assist the lady in getting up, fashionably replied, that he was waiting for an introduction.

A SKETCH.

It was on a Sabbath, early in September, that a group of citizens was seen gathering in front of the dwelling occupied by the rector of the village. Gloom was upon every countenance; and as the villagers stood, now gazing upon the beautiful church adjoining, surrounded by its neat white fence, its shady trees, and green sward, and now casting a momentary glance upon each other, as if to read the thoughts of those around them, or bending their eyes in mournfulness upon the earth, it was easy to discover that something had occurred which had fastened a deep and settled gloom upon their hearts. There they stood, and although a half mist, half rain, caused them occasionally to raise their umbrellas, yet the movement of doing so was made rather from instinct than reflection, for the melancholy event which had called them together seemed to have driven every other thought from their minds. They spoke of the virtues, the talents, the uprightness, the piety, and the benevolence of the deceased—of his unwavering integrity—his firmness in the cause of truth and religion; and recounted, with feeling and tenderness, the little incidents attending his last illness. He had died while in the discharge of his official duty—he was from home, and he was dead! Often had he expressed a desire during his indisposition that the companion of his bosom might be near him—that he might be permitted to breathe his last words into her ear who had been his partner in the varied scenes of life—and that she might be near, to watch beside his bed, when his disencumbered spirit should take its long and homeward flight to that world prepared for the meek and humble followers of the Lamb.

The door of the mansion was opened, and with downcast eyes and melancholy steps, the villagers passed in to take a last and final look of the lifeless corse. It was in the coffin, dressed in the robes of death; and when the pure white linen was thrown back carefully from off the face, each was enabled, as he passed slowly onward, to catch a momentary glance of its general outlines. The countenance was of such a mild, placid, and yet dignified appearance, as to give only the impression to the beholder of its possessor having fallen into a sweet slumber. It gave evidence that for the true christian death possessed no terrors; and that although worldly anxieties and cares might for a moment disturb the tranquil mind, or unavailing hopes be indulged of again beholding those who were held most dear, yet that spirit of resignation and compliance to the divine will which is so exquisitely incalculated by our holy religion, was capable of overcoming all, and rendering the final moments of its possessor peaceful and happy.

All had taken a last look of the deceased, and tears were in the eyes of many. The coffin was closed—was borne to the door and placed in the hearse. The bell in the neighboring steeple was heard to toll—the hearse moved onward at a slow and measured pace, followed by carriages, with citizens who sought thus to manifest their high respect for the character of the departed; and as the procession gained the rising ground, north of the village, many were seen to look with feelings of regret upon the train of carriages which were thus following to his former home the remains of the beloved and venerated HOBART.

FABLE.

"What is the use of thee, thou gnarled sapling?" said a young larch tree to a young oak. "I grow three feet in a year, thou scarcely as many inches. I am straight and taper as a reed, thou straggling and twisted as a loosened wither." "And thy duration," answered the oak, "is some third part of a man's life, and I am appointed to flourish a thousand years. Thou art felled and sawed into piling, where thou rottest and art burned, after a single summer; of me are fashioned battle ships, and I carry mariners and heroes into unknown seas."

The richer a nature, the harder and slower is its development. Two boys were once of a class in the Edinburgh grammar-school; John ever trim, precise, and dux; Walter ever slovenly, confused, and dolt. In due time John became Bailie John, of Hunter-square; and Walter, Walter Scott, of the Universe. The quickest and completest of all vegetables is the—cabbage.

THE FINE ARTS.

MUSIC ENGRAVING.

Among the demi-miracles which distinguish this "age of improvement," is the elegance to which music printing has lately attained. Not many years have elapsed since the best specimens of printed music, in this country, were no better than so many doubs, struck from a rough plate of pewter, which had been previously punched full of holes, apparently by the head of a tenpenny cut nail, with stems and tails rudely scratched with its point! And then the paper on which it was impressed!—A good musician, who could play at sight, might read the notes as well from the blank as the printed side.

But now, thanks to the enterprise of a few venders, (of whom Bourne undoubtedly stands at the head) a sheet of music is "a thing worth looking at." A modern song, such as is now almost daily published in this city, is not only calculated to impart delight through the medium of the ear, but also through that still more exquisite organ, the eye. It is, in fact, a picture of most tasteful and delicate execution; not only a necessary appendage of every lady's harp or piano, but also an embellishment for her drawing-room—a specimen of the progress of the fine arts—an incontestable symptom of that rapid march of taste and refinement which has caused the moral "wilderness to blossom as the rose."

These observations, such as they are, have been elicited by inspecting a number of new songs presented to us by Bourne, impressed on paper of a most beautiful texture and every variety of colour, and ornamented with elegantly engraved vignettes, characteristic of their several subjects. Let us name them in the order they lie before us.

First, then, we have "The knight with a snowy plume," armed cap-a-pie, "from head to foot—from top to toe," pensively leaning against the cold marble tomb of his beloved and lamented Rosalie. A single glance at this picture reduced the tone of our sympathies to a minor key. Then comes the "Song of Chateaur," chanted by the young Italian to his royal mistress, Mary, Queen of Scots, who sits in a most languishing attitude, listening to the strain which he accompanies with the guitar. "I'll tell nobody" the next; but the reader may discover the secret by inquiring for Mrs. Knight's favourite, "O, I'm in love." Then we encounter "The Milliners," with their caps, hats, laces, and band-boxes. "O why hast thou taught me to love thee?" is now in order, and the lady in the vignette looks exactly as if she could answer the question if she were so disposed. But who have we here? Our favourite Mrs. Austin, warbling the celebrated Italian aria of "Mi pizzica, mi stimola," which is produced in a magnificent style—all except "that foot"—we object most decidedly to that—it's monstrous. A delightful passage in "The Light Barque," soon conveys us to "Jerusalem, my happy home," where we close the day with the "Tyrolean Evening Hymn," written by Mrs. Hemans, and composed by her sister.

But Bourne is not alone in the dispensation of these "melodious blessings." Messrs. Firth and Hall are performing wonders in the same way. They have just published an elegant new song, adapted to the air of "Mi pizzica, mi stimola," arranged for the piano-forte by Mr. Moran. The poetry is from the pen of our American lyric poet, Samuel Woodworth, esq., and the adaptation is most felicitous: had the music been composed expressly for the words, the union could not have been more perfectly conjugal. Our present purpose, however, is not so much to eulogize the well-known tact of the poet, as to call the attention of our readers to the beauty of the style in which the production has been given to the public. The music engraving is of the first order; but the lithographic vignette which embellishes the title-page, is superior to many of those before alluded to. The whole is impressed on a beautiful coloured paper of most delicate hue and texture, and does credit to the taste and public spirit of the publishers, as well as to the artist who executed the plates.

We have obtained permission to copy the words of this song, which are here subjoined.

O SAY, CAN THIS BE LOVE?

AIR—"Mi pizzica."

Why does my heart so strangely start,
Each pulse so wildly play?
Why cannot willing lips impart
What feeling bids them say?
Cease, busy heart! Can this be love?
Why don't the trembler rest?
Why does it throb as if a dove
Were caged within my breast?
'Tis not the throb of anguish,
It cannot fatal prove,
And yet I sigh and languish,
O say, can this be love?

Cease busy heart! Why throbs it so,
With such an anxious thrill?
It seems to have a fever's glow,
And yet, I am not ill!
Warm on my cheek I feel the flame,
Its light illumines my eye;
Still, if my lips attempt the name,
'Tis whispered in a sigh.
'Tis not the sigh of anguish,
So that can nothing prove,
And yet I daily languish,
O say, can this be love?

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Literary Convention.—An assemblage of literary men, from all quarters of the Union, has lately been held in this city, with a view to compare opinions on subjects connected with education, and to devise means for carrying into effect the project of a new University. The most they have accomplished is the appointment of a number of committees, from whom some interesting reports on the different matters committed to them may be anticipated. We sincerely hope it shall not be said of the great efforts attempted to be made by these literati,

"Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus."

Bishop Heber's widow.—The editor of the Albany Argus suggests that probably the story of the marriage of Bishop Heber's widow is without foundation. "The lady herself," says the National Gazette, "has stated the fact to her correspondents in this country, and it was formally announced in the London papers. Though certain, it is not a proper subject of public animadversion. Marriage is lawful—such interference with it is an encroachment on private right and private conduct, which ought to remain unmolested, when they involve no public offence or wrong. Let us not invade domestic life, particularly when we are unacquainted with motives."

Miss Sedgwick's last novel.—The London New Monthly Magazine pays the following flattering tribute to the excellence of this production: "The heroine is an admirable sketch—spirited, frank, active, and essentially lady-like: and, indeed, the tale, independently of all considerations of value arising from faithful descriptions of living character, as a novel, is worthy to class with the best of our own."

Miss M'Crea.—In the Mirror of the ninth instant, we published a short article under this head, copied from the Boston Palladium. We have since received the following letter from a correspondent, whose veracity and means of information may be depended upon. It is dated Baldwinville, October 13, 1830.

"DEAR SIR—The communication respecting Miss M'Crea, copied into your paper from the Boston Palladium, is incorrect in many particulars. I was born and 'brought up' in the town of Fort Edward, my parents being among its first settlers. In the month of June, 1761, my grandfather purchased the lands on the east side of the Hudson river, opposite Fort Miller. Both forts were at this period occupied by a British garrison; and Miss M'Crea, being a relative of the commanding officer at Fort Miller, made her home at that fortress, where she became intimately acquainted with my grandfather's family, and this intimacy continued until a short period before her untimely death.

In the meantime a young gentleman of the name of Jones was paying his addresses to Miss M'Crea, and it was generally understood that a reciprocal attachment existed between them. As the progress of the revolution, however, rendered it expedient for Mr. Jones, as it did for many others, to take a decided stand, either for or against the mother country, he unfortunately chose the side of loyalty, repaired to Canada, received a captain's commission, and subsequently joined the army of Burgoyne. It appears, however, that his political apostasy did not tend to lessen him in the eyes of his mistress, for while in Canada he still kept up a correspondence with her by letter.

In the autumn of 1777, when the hitherto successful army of Burgoyne had reached Fort Anne, Miss M'Crea was at Fort Miller; and my grandfather, (who, with most of the inhabitants of that town, retreated with their families to Bennington or Williamstown,) requested Miss M'Crea to accompany his family, but she refused, saying that she intended to go to Fort Edward. He therefore left her, with several other females, at Fort Miller. Captain Jones was at this time with the British at Fort Anne.

Miss M'Crea proceeded to Fort Edward, or rather to the old yellow house, which is yet standing, where she secreted herself in the cellar for three or four days, with an old woman, whose name is not mentioned. During this time she contrived to inform Jones of her place of concealment, who immediately dispatched a party of Indians to bring her to him, at Fort Anne. He furnished them with a horse for her conveyance, and assured her by letter that she might safely confide in the fidelity of her conductors, to whom he had promised a large reward if they conveyed her in safety to Fort Anne.

The Indians proceeded on their embassy, reached the old yellow house without interruption, delivered the letter, and were soon on the road to Fort Anne with Miss M'Crea, mounted on the steed her lover had sent for her accommodation. The party arrived unmolested at the spring which then flowed under the large pine, on the Sand hill, a few rods from the present junction of the feeder with the Northern canal at Fort Edward. Here, it appears, they met another party of Indians, from Burgoyne's camp, whose cupidity had been excited by a rumour of the rich reward offered by Jones, and who were determined to obtain a share of it. The result of this unexpected and unreasonable demand, was a violent quarrel between the two parties of Indians.

At this unfortunate moment they discovered an American scout crossing the river, within sixty or eighty rods of them. Alarmed for their own safety, the Indians now thought it necessary to leave the road and take to the woods. For the lady to accompany them was deemed impracticable, and so, to end the dispute, and prevent farther embarrassment, one of the savages pulled her from her horse and struck his tomahawk into her skull! He then tore off her scalp, and cut off her bosom, which he suspended to a small tree. Having committed this deed of barbarity, he fled to the English camp with the scalp of his hapless victim! The scout came up, and finding Miss M'Crea in this awful situation, they hastily covered her with earth and leaves.

At this time Burgoyne's army was on its way to Fort Edward, which had been previously evacuated by the Americans. Here the disconsolate lover, Captain Jones, caused the mutilated body of his beloved Janet to be placed in a coffin, and concealed in a baggage-wagon, intending to convey the relics to Fort Miller or to Albany, should Burgoyne succeed in reaching that city.

The army moved on along the east bank of the Hudson, and the next day being very warm, they halted at a small creek three miles south of Fort Edward. During their stay at this place some general officer discovered Miss M'Crea's remains in the baggage-wagon, and ordered them removed immediately, and buried on the spot. A grave was prepared by the side of the road, and a Mrs. Saunders, who was present, put a cap on the head of the corpse, and made such other little arrangements as time and circumstances would permit. This lady, who witnessed the hasty interment, has always resided near the spot since that eventful period.

In the spring of 1822 the body of the ill-fated Miss M'Crea was disinterred by a company of young men of that town, who associated for the purpose. The site of her humble grave having been pointed out to us, by the Mrs. Saunders, before mentioned, we caused her relics to be conveyed to Fort Edward, and placed them in a splendid coffin, which was solemnly deposited in the grave-yard near the old fort. A discourse was delivered on the occasion by the late Rev. Hooper Cumming. I officiated as pall-bearer, and many connections of the deceased were also present, from Ballstown, and other parts of Saratoga county.

Mr. Baker, mentioned in your paper, was at the period of the above catastrophe a boy, in search of some stray cows, and happening to be near the scene of the tragedy, witnessed the particulars as I have related them. The description of Miss M'Crea's person, as given in the Boston Palladium, and copied into the Mirror, is also very erroneous. She was not handsome, and had a blemish in her eyes totally incompatible with our idea of beauty. I am, sir, with great respect, and high estimation of your valuable paper, yours, respectfully, N. P.

Census of Philadelphia.—The population of Philadelphia city and liberties, according to the census returns, is one hundred and sixty-seven thousand six hundred and eighty. It is stated in the Philadelphia Gazette that "the remainder of the county will be published in a few days," and that the total will be one hundred and ninety-five thousand in the city and county.

A Treatise on the Vine.—William R. Prince, proprietor of the Linnæan Botanic garden at Flushing, has just published, under this title, a work valuable to horticulturists, vignerons, and others interested in the culture of the grape.

Illinois Monthly Magazine.—This periodical has been discontinued for want of patronage. The talents, taste, and editorial tact of Mr. Hall merited for his labours a better fate.

Gay Banners.—The following pretty lines are from a little poem entitled the "Fatherless," written by Haynes Bayley:

"Gay banners find gay followers—
But, from their station hurled,
The gay forget them, and pursue
The next that is unfurled."

*This must have been a trying scene to the unfortunate lover, Captain Jones. In Dr. Thatcher's account of the "Battle of Still-water," which took place on the nineteenth of September, 1777, shortly after this tragical incident, he says, "Captain Jones, of the British artillery, had the command of four pieces of cannon, which he conducted with great skill and valour until he fell—and thirty-six, out of the forty-eight of his artillery men, were killed or wounded. His cannon were repeatedly taken and retaken, but finally remained with the British, for the want of horses (on the part of the Americans) to bring them off." Perhaps this desperate bravery was in some measure owing to the fatal termination of his love adventure.

LINES

In imitation of a song from the Lady of the Lake.

Nor faster does the eagle take
His flight towards yonder skies,
Nor faster melts the snowy flake
In ocean's breast, or on the lake
The ripples sink and rise,
Than from that gentle heart shall flee
Each transitory thought of me;
But, maiden, go, and bliss be thine,
Nor waste a thought on me or mine.

Bright be the visions of thy dreams,
And blest each waking hour—
May fancy's ray, and hope's rich beams
Shine not with false and wav'ring gleams,
But noontide radiance pour.

Happy thy home—thy friends sincere—
And all around thee kind and dear!
And dim, while pleasure's sun may shine,
Be memory of me and mine!

But if in after moments, when
These lines shall meet thine eye,
Fond memory, with piercing ken,
Recalls forgotten dreams again,
And thoughts which cannot die,
Then, maiden, then my claim shall be
The guerdon of a tear from thee;
And then thou'lt not forget the time
Thy presence hallowed me and mine!

Or if while wandering yet on earth
You share the common lot;
If all thy virtues—all thy worth,
From the rude ills of mortal birth,
Exempt or shield thee not—
Stay not to breathe th' unheeded sigh
On the false forms that pass thee by,
But let true friendship's light divine
Conduct thee safe to me and mine!

PRINCE JULES OF POLIGNAC.—The father of this prince emigrated, like many other French noblemen, at the beginning of the revolution, and resided for some time at Radstadt

(Grand Duchy of Baden.) On the birth-day of his son Jules, (the present too famous ex-minister of France,) when he had attained his tenth year, he invited all his companions in misfortune, and some other friends, and showed them into a room, where, upon a table a crucifix and two lighted candles had been placed. He then ordered young Jules to approach the table, and, in imitation of Amilcar, (Hannibal's father,) bound him by an oath, that he would always oppose the French revolution and the principles to which it had given birth. This solemn act seems to have powerfully worked upon the mind of the young nobleman, and may explain in some measure his detestation of liberal ideas. With right one can apply to him what the poet says:

"Children, like tender osiers, take the bow,
And as they first are fashioned always grow."

This anecdote is from an eye-witness and playfellow of the prince, who still lives at Radstadt.

MODESTY.—There was once to be a meeting of the flowers, and the judge was to award a prize to the one pronounced the most beautiful. "Who shall have the prize?" said the rose, stalking forth in all the consciousness of beauty. "Who shall have the prize?" said the other flowers, advancing, each with conscious pride, and each imagining it would be herself. "I will take a peep at these beauties," thought the violet, as she lay in her humble bed, not presuming to attend the meeting. "I will see them as they pass." But as she raised her lowly head to peep out of her hiding-place, she was observed by the judge, who immediately pronounced her the most beautiful, because the most modest.

SPLENDOR OF THE ANCIENT FLEMINGS.—At a repast given by one of the counts of Flanders to the Flemish magistrates, the seats they occupied were unfurnished with cushions. Those proud burghers folded their sumptuous cloaks and sat on them. After the feast they were retiring without retaining these important and costly articles of dress; and on a courtier reminding them of their apparent neglect, the burgomaster of Bruges replied, "We Flemings are not in the habit of carrying away the cushions after dinner." A similar story is told of Robert duke of Normandy. "The meetings of the different towns for the sports of archery were signalled by the most splendid display of dress and decoration. The archers were habited in silk, damask, and the finest linen, and carried chains of gold of great weight and value. Luxury was at its height among women. The queen of Philip the Fair of France, on a visit to Bruges, exclaimed, with astonishment, not unmixed with envy, 'I thought myself the only queen here, but I see six hundred others who appear more so than I.'"

GOOD TEETH.—What more adorns the "human face divine," than a good set of teeth? Place before me the handsomest woman in nature's harem, and

Her lips may mock the scarlet gem
In Aboudrahman's diadem:

yet if they disclose not a set of teeth fair as pearls, smiles may cluster about them like bees, and persuasion drop from them sweeter than the honey of Hymettus, yet they have no charm for me. A good set of teeth, as was said by Queen Bess of a handsome face, is a letter of recommendation—ay, it is a letter patent, and the whole world may read it. Young ladies cultivate your teeth.

POPULAR SONGS.—The popular song of "Cherry Ripe," has its parallel in Holland, and the pretty Dutch lasses chirp up to a sprightly air, "Turnip radishes," as merrily as the English milkmaids do their popular ballad; the substitution is an improvement quite in the Dutch taste.

When Claude Lorraine, who it is well known was not celebrated for painting figures, disposed of his pictures, he used to say to the purchasers, "I sell you the landscape, but mind I give you the figures."

POPULAR TALES.

A NOVEMBER DAY IN LONDON.

LORD VAPOURCOURT was the lineal representative of an English family of rank and fortune; and to this accidental advantage he united the natural gifts of a good person, a vigorous constitution, and respectable intellectual endowments. The last had been cultivated by the process usually employed in the education of a British nobleman of the present day. His lordship had devoted his regular seven years to the study of Greek and Latin prosody at Eton college, and by virtue of his privilege, he had taken the usual degrees at Oxford without keeping his terms. After quitting the university, he had passed three years in making the grand tour upon the continent, and had brought back from his travels a competent knowledge of French cookery, and a correct notion of the comparative merits of champagne and rhenish. His father, the old earl, had died during his absence, and the son was called home rather suddenly, to assist in arranging the succession, and to take his seat in the house of peers. As the estate was wholly unincumbered, the necessary forms were soon despatched, and his lordship entered quietly into possession of a clear income of ten thousand pounds a year. Such was the situation of this young nobleman at his first appearance upon the stage of active life, at the age of five and twenty; and his friends and connexions, as may well be supposed, formed the most brilliant anticipations of his future success and of the figure that he would make in the world.

It was soon perceived, however, with surprise, that Lord Vapourcourt took but little interest in the occupations and amusements that ordinarily engage the attention of a young British peer. He did not show himself above once or twice at the Fives Court, and was never known to assist at a regular set-to. He had a capital stud of horses, and a famous pack of hounds, but seldom took them out; and was not a regular attendant upon the races, either at Ascot or Newmarket. What was still more extraordinary, he frequented none of the fashionable gaming-houses, rarely betted, and when he did, not more than four or five hundred guineas at a time. These circumstances gave his character a strong tinge of singularity; and that part of the public whose business consists in attending to that of other people, were pretty soon in deep speculation upon the causes of this strange conduct. It was conjectured at first, that his lordship was in love; but this supposition proved to be erroneous. It was speedily ascertained that he never saw any female society, and had kept himself wholly aloof from the overtures of sundry mammas, who had indirectly laid siege to him soon after he came to his title.

Finding this theory untenable, a few persons took upon them to imagine, that Vapourcourt had come to the resolution of attending to business or to study; and that he would turn out a politician, a poet, or some other odd animal of the same genus. But here again speculation appeared to be at fault, for it was pretty soon discovered, that his lordship had never been in the house of peers, excepting to take his seat, and that he had not opened a book since he left Eton college.

While these different and groundless rumours succeeded each other, respecting the causes of Lord Vapourcourt's uncommon mode of life, the real truth after a while came out; and it was at length generally known in the circle of his friends and connexions, that his lordship was violently attacked with the spleen. It was then recollected that this malady was hereditary in the family. The same anxious persons who had before been so active in discovering the nature of the disease were now equally busy in recommending remedies. A young clergyman, connected with the family, who had just taken orders, and was dying to see the world, advised a repetition of the grand tour, under the direction of a lively and intelligent tutor; and offered his services in this capacity. A leading ministerial peer attributed his lordship's illness to want of occupation, and intimated that there would be no great difficulty in procuring for him an appointment in one of the departments of state for foreign embassies, it being understood that his lordship's four votes in the house of commons should in that case regularly strengthen the hands of his majesty's ministers. Lady Lookabout, who had a pretty, marriageable daughter on her hands, earnestly recommended a loquacious and spirited young wife.

Vapourcourt, as the reader will easily imagine, gave no heed to any of these good-natured hints, and grew gradually worse from year to year, until he might be said at last to vegetate, rather than to live. The malady finally reached to such a height, that in the year 18—, after yawning away the summer at the old family castle in the country, he resolved, from mere fatigue, not to stay for the Christmas holidays, and returned to town about the last of October, when the cold weather was just setting in, and the hunting season opening in all its beauty. The neighbouring gentry considered this desperate measure as a certain proof that his lordship's complaint had now reached a degree of intensity, which was equivalent to actual madness; and concluded unanimously that it must soon terminate in a crisis of one kind or another. Having settled this point, with various others of equal importance, one night over the bottle, a company of thirty or forty of them, all in high and buoyant spirits, took the field the next morning at daylight, superbly mounted, and uniformly dressed in scarlet coats and jockey caps, the hounds in full cry, the weather clear, fresh, and frosty, and scoured the country for thirty miles round in quest of a fox. Meanwhile Lord Vapourcourt, at about the same hour, got into his travelling chariot, drawn by four post horses, where he soon fell into a languid and uneasy sort of slumber, and hardly opened his eyes wide enough to take notice of any thing without the carriage, until it stopped, late at night, at the door of his house in Pall-Mall.

The next morning Lord Vapourcourt rang for his valet-de-chambre at about half past eleven, having slept somewhat later than usual, in consequence of the fatigue of the preceding day's journey. The servant made his appearance, and proceeded to open the shutters; but the rays of the sun showed little or no disposition to take advantage of the circumstance. The air was filled with one of those murky and impenetrable fogs, which sometimes envelope the city of London, and which can be distinctly imagined by those only who have seen and felt them. A sort of dim and smothered twilight gleamed faintly through the windows, but was not sufficient for the usual operations of domestic life, and the servant had accordingly brought in lights to aid his master in the business of dressing.

"What's this?" exclaimed the peer, struck with astonishment at the unusual circumstance, and terrified at the thought that he had rung four or five hours too soon. "What o'clock is it, Johnson?"

"Half past eleven, my lord," replied the servant; "but the fog is so thick that your lordship would not be able to see to dress, and I thought it best to bring in lights."

A deep sigh, succeeded by a wide and almost interminable yawn, expressed the feelings of Vapourcourt, whose habitual malady weighed down his spirits with more than usual oppressiveness, at this piece of news. The disgust occasioned by the state of the weather, was, however, slightly tempered by a gleam of satisfaction, at the idea that the day was further advanced than he had feared; and after a few more long yawns, his lordship at last determined to rise. The servant assisted him in dressing, and then withdrew to order his master's breakfast, having placed lights in a small adjoining cabinet, where Lord Vapourcourt usually passed the morning.

There are few things more oppressive to feeble nerves, than the effect of artificial light in the daytime. There is something rich and cheerful in the clear flame of a wax taper, or a well ordered lamp, when we see them in the evening, illuminating a group of happy faces collected around them; but, in the daytime, they produce a different impression. Their little paltry glare, placing itself in comparison with the clear, transparent beauty of the solar rays, has a sombre, and, in the language of Shakspeare, an "ineffectual" aspect. The morbid feelings of Vapourcourt sickened at the view, and on entering his cabinet he moved instinctively towards the window, in the hope of discovering something more attractive. The prospect without corresponded completely with the gloomy appearance of the apartment. A dense and dingy mass of vapour brooded heavily over the tops of the houses; and although it was now high noon, the rays of the sun produced no other effect upon the fog, than to give it a sort of brassy hue, and to design through it, in a dim and uncertain manner, the outlines of the objects it covered. Another long and dreary yawn indicated the sensations of the hypochondriac peer, at this enlivening spectacle. It was difficult to say whether the aspect of things without, or within, was the more inviting. In the uncertainty which he felt upon this question, Vapourcourt remained for several minutes gazing listlessly at the movements of the fog, which sometimes undulated in large white volumes, like the waves of the sea in a storm, and then cleared away for a moment, and permitted the sun to exhibit a glimpse of his broad, rayless yellow disk, which, from its strange appearance, rather increased than diminished the gloom while it was visible, and was scarcely seen before it was clouded in again by new mountains of vapour, that swelled in successive exhalations from the river. Fatigued at length with standing, his lordship mechanically moved towards a well-stuffed sofa, that was placed near the chimney, and stretching himself upon it at his length, with his head supported by a couple of large cushions, he prepared, after another fit of yawning, not less long and dreary than the last, to await the arrival of Johnson and the tea.

The servant soon appeared, bringing with him the breakfast apparatus, and the morning paper. In a large family, breakfast is commonly a gay repast. If the spirits are at all elastic, they move with fresh vigour at the opening of a new day. The appetite, after an abstinence of several hours, is keen and active, and the view of a table, covered with preparations to satisfy it, diffuses hilarity and sprightliness through the circle. The hissing of the tea urn, a sound not very musical in itself, appears agreeable, when it is felt to be the indication of a refreshing beverage. The hot rolls, the muffins, sliced ham, the eggs, and the conserves, present an ensemble, which, though not to be compared, in the opinion of an epicure, with a real déjeuner à la fourchette, has no small charm for a plain unsophisticated appetite. The morning papers, in the various articles of intelligence and entertainment which they always contain, furnish innumerable topics of conversation, and open inviting prospects for entertainment or occupation during the day. There is doubtless something more grand and imposing in a regular dinner, but for mere gaiety and light-heartedness, perhaps no meal in the four and twenty hours, can be compared with breakfast, considered in its best and proper state. That of a solitary hypochondriac like Vapourcourt presented, of course, none of these attractions. The hissing of the tea-urn disturbed his nerves; the rolls were burned, the muffins cold, the eggs too much boiled, and the formal countenance of Johnson diffused a sort of tiresome solemnity over the table. Vapourcourt, after drinking two or three cups of tea, sent away the breakfast with a feeling of disgust, and mechanically took up the Morning Chronicle.

The political science and patriotic feeling of Mr. Perry were, however, wholly lost upon our hero, who never looked at any part of the paper but the court news and the movements of the world of fashion. Under the head of arrivals, he remarked the following article:

"At his residence in Pall-Mall, the right honourable the earl of Vapourcourt, from Vapourcourt castle."

The least ambitious minds are not wholly insensible to the charms of public notice and attention. Vapourcourt experienced a momentary sentiment of satisfaction, at seeing his name thus presented to the view of the world, and his movements recorded almost as fast as they were made. But the feeling was soon chastened, by the recollection of the gloom that surrounded him. "Had I known that the morning would have been so foggy in London," quoth he, extending his jaws into another boundless yawn, "I should have been tempted to stay another day at the castle. But what matters it," he added, after musing a few moments, "where life passes? Town or country, at home or abroad, 'tis all of a piece. We pass ten or twelve hours in restless and interrupted slumber, rise with a heartfelt languor, and a secret wish that the day were over before it is well begun; we sip two or three cups of weak tea, we read in the papers that the king went to Brighton yesterday, and that the duke of York will hold a levée to-day; we yawn away the morning on the sofa, ride out at three, and like a blind mill-horse, go over once more in the park the same track which we have gone over a hundred times before; look in at the coffee-house or the club, and meet the same originals, engaged for the hundredth time in the same eternal contest whether my Lord A. or Mr. B. ought to sign the public despatches; dine at the same hour upon the same dishes, read again in the evening paper the same news which we had read before in the morning one, and then to bed, to recover strength and spirits to pursue the same course again the following day. Such, forsooth, is life!"

At the close of this philosophical soliloquy, Lord Vapourcourt rose from the couch, and returned to the window, to look again upon the neighbouring streets. The fog was now still more dense and gloomy than before, and had evidently settled down for the day upon the city. The volumes of vapour that rolled over the tops of the houses, were thicker and more frequent, and their colour still more sombre and brassy than it had been. It was with some difficulty that the houses on the opposite side of the street, or the carriages and walkers that passed below, could be discerned at all. At times, when the mist cleared away a little, they were seen looming up into more than their usual dimensions from the effect of the density of the intervening medium, and to an observer of a livelier fancy would have offered a scene of amusing contemplation. A young girl, with a white gown and bonnet, had the look of a schooner-rigged small craft seen at a distance under full sail; and the black Lincolnshire horses, drawing their loaded carts, appeared like huge elephants, with armed castles towering up from their backs. But these, and other such imaginary likenesses, were lost upon Vapourcourt, who perceived nothing but the undiminished gloom of the fog, and was musing with dismay upon the long and dreary hours that were opening before him. At this fatal crisis, the weariness of life, which he had so long experienced, pressed upon his mind with a weight which he had never known before. The whole question seemed to come to a point at once. To stand at the window and gaze forever at the fog was evidently impossible; to return to the sofa and yawn away the rest of the day, was not less so. And yet the present moment was an epitome of life. Every day, every hour brought with it, like this, a recurrence of successive alternatives, either side of which was equally intolerable.

Under the influence of these gloomy reflections, the combined result of a morbid state of mind, and an uncommonly foggy day, it suddenly occurred to our unfortunate hero, that it was possible to pursue a middle course, which would clear him at once and forever from both the horns of this perpetual dilemma. "Why," exclaimed he, "submit to this insufferable burden, when we are at liberty to shake it off at any moment? Why not manfully turn at once to the rope or the river? Why not put a voluntary end to this dreary succession of weary nights and wearier days, called life? Let others drag it out to the last hour, and drain the cup of ennui to the dregs. I have had enough of it already, and will finish it this very night, in the old Roman fashion."

Vapourcourt had a naturally vigorous and resolute character, and, with a better education, would have played a very different part in the world. Such as he was, he was still capable of acting with promptitude and firmness, when driven by extraordinary motives, imaginary or real, to feel the necessity of it. Having taken the violent resolution just mentioned, he was not deterred from executing it, by any merely mechanical or constitutional apprehensions. He deliberated coolly with himself upon the best manner of carrying it into effect, and finally concluded that the easiest and least scandalous process, would be to wait till evening, and then walk quietly down to the bridge, and throw himself into the river.

Having settled this question, our hero rang the bell, and ordered dinner at five o'clock, which was three hours earlier than usual. The rigid aspect of Johnson expanded, and his dull narrow eyes brightened with a gleam of surprise at this extraordinary command; but, accustomed to obey in all cases without explanation, he retired in silence to give the necessary directions. Vapourcourt then proceeded to make some little arrangements in regard to his affairs, and wrote one or two short letters of business, after which he proceeded, very tranquilly, to put on a walking dress, that he might be ready to go out after dinner, and execute his project. These preliminary matters being adjusted, he employed himself, during the short interval of leisure that remained, in traversing his cabinet, and reflecting on the prospect before him. His spirits were now in a finer flow than they had been at any time for years preceding. The little occupation in which he had been engaged, and the vigorous resolution that had been the fruit of his previous meditations, had given a stir to the stagnant current of his feelings, and diffused over them a momentary colouring, not wholly unlike that of cheerfulness. The sun, meanwhile, had partly dissipated the thick vapour that filled the air in the morning, and poured through the windows a rich yellow radiance, like the golden lights in the paintings of Rembrandt, which harmonized finely with the bright colours of the Turkey carpet. The change of weather contributed, with his late uncommon exertion, to relieve the oppression of our hero's spirits. He walked gaily up and down the room, satisfied with himself, and secretly proud of the firmness and promptitude with which he had come to his decision. "Why this," said he, "is as it should be. As Kean says, 'Richard's himself again.' I now feel the truth of a remark which I met with at Eton, in an old Latin book called Seneca, purporting that a man of sense is always the master of his own fortune. It is but showing a little firmness, and you may put to flight an army of blue devils, were they as numerous as those which beset St. Anthony. What says the poet?"

'Throw but a stone—the giant dies.'

My tormentor is half frightened to death, before I have well taken up the pebble; a few hours more, and I finish him forever."

Could his lordship have pursued this train of lively reflection for any length of time, he might perhaps have realized the truth of the poet's assurance in a more rational way, than that which he now contemplated. But the short November day was now drawing fast to a close; the sun set before five, and the fog collected again, and hung with deeper gloom than before upon the city. Johnson now appeared to announce that dinner was on the table, and Vapourcourt repaired to the dining-room to enjoy for the last time his splendid, though solitary repast. Under the excitement of the moment, he ate with more than ordinary appetite; and the attendants, connecting this circumstance with that of the uncommonly early hour, concluded that some event of a singular, but highly agreeable kind, had occurred to enliven the languid tenor of their master's life. They all anticipated that the close of dinner would be followed by an order for the carriage, and that his lordship would go out upon some important and interesting expedition. Johnson, with the political feeling natural to a free-born British subject, thought it probable, that his master meant to make his début in the house of peers, where there was to be that evening a debate upon the foreign policy of the country. A French footman decided that Vapourcourt was going to the opera, where Catalani was to make her first appearance for the winter; and a young jockey, fresh from the country, who had not yet had an opportunity to gratify his curiosity in regard to the wonders of the metropolis, was sure that our hero intended to indulge himself with the spectacle of the feeding of the wild beasts at Exeter Change, which is regularly exhibited every night at nine o'clock. To the surprise of all, Lord Vapourcourt, after eating heartily of various dishes, drinking a bottle of Bordeaux, and reading with uncommon care and attention the fashionable news in the Courier, rang for his hat and cloak, and left the house on foot and alone, for the first time that he had done such a thing of an evening since he came to his title. The servants looked on for a time in mute astonishment; and then, after agreeing that their lord was a queer one, sagely added, that it was after all none of their business whether he went on foot or in the carriage, and adjourned by unanimous vote to dinner.

Lord Vapourcourt, bent on his gloomy purpose, took his way, upon leaving his house, towards Westminster bridge. The fog, which, as I remarked above, had been dissipated for an hour or two during the warmest part of the day, had collected again, and assumed a still greater degree of density than before. It was now of such a consistency that it might almost, in the common phrase, have been cut with a knife. Immense masses of a dank, unwholesome mixture of coal-smoke, and heavy exhalations from the river, filled up the streets, and made it impossible to discern objects at the smallest distance, or to recognise the most familiar places. The lamps were lighted, but produced little or no effect, their rays being choked up within a foot or two of the flame; and they presented the appearance of nebulous stars twinkling feebly through the mist, but affording no means of distinguishing the objects and persons below them. As it was still pretty early in the evening, the streets were full of carriages and walkers, and the noise and tumult which naturally ensued, were truly terrible. With all the care and circumspection of the guides, who moved along as slowly as they could, the wheels of the different vehicles were continually interlocking with a tremendous crash, which was regularly followed by an explosion of oaths and curses from the drivers, and agonizing shrieks of terror from the women and children within, whose lives were endangered by the accident. The confused trampling of horses and creaking of carriages were mingled with the hurried exclamations of the unwary walkers who had come unluckily within the vortex of the whirlpool.

Vapourcourt made his way slowly and painfully through this scene of confusion. The annoying interruptions of every kind, which continually checked his progress, would have been sufficient of themselves to prevent him from thinking too deeply on the plan he was about to execute, or from feeling any compunctious visitings of conscience in regard to its consistency with policy or principle. The minor miseries which he now encountered were indeed substantially of the same nature with those which originally determined him to take the resolution, and tended strongly to confirm it. As he went on, therefore, he became every moment more and more satisfied, that a world of ennui within doors, and fog without, was not fit for an honourable man to live in. It was accordingly with a feeling of real relief, that he finally reached the bridge, where he mounted at once upon the parapet, and, without stopping for any further reflection, prepared to take the decisive leap.

The fog that covered the bridge was so thick that it was impossible to distinguish objects at arm's length; but at this critical moment a sudden gust of wind swept it off temporarily from the spot where our hero stood, and he perceived, at a distance from him of less than three yards, another person evidently bent on the same object with himself. The stranger had already given his body an impulse, which had shifted the centre of gravity from within the base, and thrown the line of direction into an angle of about forty-five degrees with the horizon. The delay of another second would have made it perpendicular on the opposite side, and would probably have been fatal. Vapourcourt, seeing the movement, started aside by a sudden impulse, and grasping the other firmly by the upper part of the arm, drew him rapidly backward. The body oscillated from side to side for an instant, during which the final result was doubtful. The centre of gravity then returned within the base, and the man resumed his upright position on the parapet.

Vapourcourt gazed, with a mixture of surprise and curiosity, upon an individual whose fortunes appeared to coincide in so singular a manner with his own, but there was nothing attractive or remarkable in his outward appearance. He was, on the contrary, rather below the middle height, with an awkward person and a coarse expression of countenance. His cheeks were pale and wan, his eyes haggard, his forehead ploughed with furrows; and his black uncombed hair, staring out loosely in all directions, gave him a wild and ferocious aspect. His dress was of the meanest kind, and his whole ensemble indicated extreme wretchedness. He made no attempt to resist the salutary violence offered by Vapourcourt, but looked as if he felt that he had been detected in doing what he knew to be wrong, and had nothing left but to submit with dogged resignation to his destiny.

A spectator, who in passing accidentally had remarked the different appearance of these two persons thus standing together on the parapet, would have hardly imagined that they had both mounted for the same purpose. In the hurry and excitement of the moment, the circumstance had also apparently escaped the attention of Vapourcourt, who, not recollecting that it was hardly his cue to express much astonishment at the sort of proceeding which he had just been the cause of preventing, addressed the other in the tone of reproof and surprise that any indifferent person would have naturally employed on the same occasion.

"What ails thee, man? Hast thou nine lives at thy disposal, that thou dealest thus freely with the one now in thy possession?"

"I have found one," replied the other, in a low and somewhat sullen voice, "a burden too heavy to be borne, and trust that I shall not be condemned, in this world at least, to sustain the weight of any other."

"What?" said Vapourcourt, to whose recollection this reply brought back the thought of his own project, and of the load of care and weariness that had led him to adopt it, "what, my friend, have you too experienced, like me, the intolerable weight of existence, the dreary vacuity of days, and months, and years, following each other in the same dull, uninterrupted round, without occupation, without interest, without amusement? Have you passed long and sleepless nights in tossing and rolling from side to side, on a bed of down? turned with loathing and satiety, from sumptuous feasts and delicious liquors? sunk with stupor at select conversations and gay assemblies? perished with fatigue and ennui at enchanting operas, and interesting debates in parliament? If you have experienced this—and I cannot doubt that you have, for what else but this could have brought a man to such a pass as that from which I have too hastily rescued you—if you have in fact experienced all this, why then, my friend, I can only say, that I do not blame your resolution, and that to make amends for the questionable piece of service that I have done you in keeping you out of the river, I am now ready to push you into it, and by the same impulse to follow you myself to the bottom."

"Alas, sir!" replied he, "I know not what you mean, and can hardly imagine how a life of leisure and continual enjoyment, can produce disgust. It has been my lot, sir, to work constantly, ten or twelve hours every day, in order to gain a living for myself and my family, and the greatest happiness I have ever known was that of devoting occasionally a leisure hour to recreation in their company. You talk of turning with loathing from sumptuous dinners and tossing restlessly on a downy bed. I have never had the means of enjoying any luxuries of this description; but in better days, when our table was regularly covered with a sufficiency of plain and wholesome food, we always ate it with a good appetite, and slept, without dreaming, on our comfortable featherbeds, from night till morning."

"What then brings thee here?" cried Vapourcourt, in a rather discontented tone, and relapsing into his habitual train of ideas, as he heard the other talk of thoughts and feelings entirely foreign to his own experience.

"If thou art well and happy at home, in the name of common sense, what urges thee to throw thyself into the river?"

"Want and misery," replied the other, bursting into an agony of tears. "My poor wife and children are at this moment suffering for a morsel of bread."

"Bread!" exclaimed Vapourcourt, in a tone of surprise, and wholly incapable of realizing the existence of actual distress—"want of bread! Why, man, thou must be a dolt indeed to take on in this way at so simple an accident. If the baker did not leave bread enough this morning to last till to-morrow, send to his shop, or make up the deficiency with pastry?"

"Nay, sir," answered the man, "do not mock at misfortunes which you never can have felt, and apparently can hardly think of as possible. I have been, sir, an honest and a hard-working man; and by keeping steadily to my business, I continued, as I told you before, to support my family, and all went well with me. But a few months ago I was seized with a severe fit of illness, which prevented me from working, and brought my earnings to a stand. Housekeeping, medicines, and rent, soon swept off our little hoard of previous savings, and we found ourselves reduced to very poor and scanty fare. We submitted cheerfully to this, as a temporary evil, and as I was fast recovering my health, we all hoped that I should soon be able to go to work again as usual. In the mean time, however, the rent of my house, which is hired by the week, must be regularly paid, for the landlord, who is a severe man, will not hear of such a thing as giving a day's credit. Last Saturday night I paid him nearly the last shilling I had, and during this week we have lived upon almost nothing. This evening he called as usual, and finding me unable to settle the account, he declared that if I did not pay him in the morning he would seize the furniture, and turn us all into the street. Exhausted as I was with illness and want, these terrible menaces, which I had no means of averting, for the moment unsettled my reason; a temporary fit of madness came over me, and I rushed out of the house, with the project of throwing myself into the river. You, sir, have been the instrument of Providence in saving me from this fatal catastrophe. The delirium has now passed away, and I see the guilt that I was about to incur, by depriving my wife and children of their natural protector. I shall return home with a feeling of gratitude to God, for his goodness in rescuing me from the commission of so great a crime. I shall apply to some charitable neighbour for a temporary relief. I am now nearly well, and shall soon be strong enough to go to work again. The good Being, who has thus interposed in our favour, will not desert us; and we shall, I trust, after a while, be again easy and happy."

"Nay, man," said Lord Vapourcourt, whose heart was naturally kind, and who had been a good deal touched by this simple story of distress, "if all thou wantest be some temporary relief, thou needest not to go far to find the charitable neighbour that shall afford it thee. If a little, or even a good deal of money, will make thee happy, thou shalt not be long miserable. I will take it on myself to assist thee, were it only for the singularity of the case; for who ever heard before of a family suffering in the heart of London for want of bread? A hundred pounds, more or less, will make but little difference in the Vapourcourt property. My heirs will not miss it. I may as well throw myself into the river two or three hours hence as now, and if by means of this delay I can make an industrious family happy for life, I assure thee, my good friend, that I will submit to it with cheerfulness, and even pleasure, however eager I may be to escape from this world of fog and enmity. So come along, my friend, and let us settle this business without more ado."

So saying, and without waiting to listen to the acknowledgments which his protegé would have poured out from the fulness of his gratitude in a torrent of thanks and tears, Vapourcourt leapt lightly from the parapet, where they had both been standing during this conversation, to the floor of the bridge, and, accompanied by his new companion, returned with a rapid pace towards his own mansion. The sudden gust of wind, which had been the means of discovering to him the dangerous situation of the person whom he had thus rescued from destruction, proved to be the first breathing of a fresh breeze, which had now in a great measure swept off the fog, and displayed the bridge, the river, and the streets, silvered over with a fine yellow moonlight. Whether it was that the change of weather relieved his spirits, or whether he found himself agreeably excited by the work of benevolence in which he was now engaged, it is certain that Vapourcourt for several preceding years had rarely felt his blood circulate so freely, or, as Juliet says, as at this moment. He pursued his way through the still crowded street, without experiencing any inconvenience or uneasiness from the little accidents that fall to the lot of the pedestrian traveller. He was conscious of a curiosity about the condition of his new acquaintance, which he would not have dreamed of in other circumstances, and which tales of distress, much deeper than his, generally failed to move. The man readily communicated the short history of his life, in which there was nothing in the least remarkable. He was a tailor, born, bred, and married in the street in which he now lived. He had never been out of London, and his longest excursion was a walk to the Park. He had several children, the oldest of whom he represented as a fine girl just turned of fifteen, and he dwelt with a parent's partiality on her goodness and beauty. After satisfying the curiosity of Vapourcourt, he inquired, in turn, with due respect, into his benefactor's circumstances, and on hearing his name, burst out into new effusions of gratitude. The combinations of goodness with high rank, wealth, or celebrity, though not unnatural, nor even rare, is so delightful, that whenever it is perceived it excites a sort of rapture, especially in the person who is the object of it. The virtues of the great are like diamonds polished and fitly set; the gem is substantially the same as in its natural state, but the increase of lustre and effect is incalculable.

"His bosom's lord sit lightly on his throne,"

Upon reaching the house of Vapourcourt, which the tailor found to be at no great distance from his own, he requested permission of his lordship to return home at once, in order to relieve the anxiety of his family, and to bring his children with him to join him in offering thanks to their generous benefactor. Vapourcourt, though not very agreeably struck with the latter part of the proposal, was now in a humour to consent to almost anything. He acceded at once to the request, and the tailor went his way, while his lordship entered the house alone. The servants were rather surprised to see him come back so early, before he could well have accomplished either of the several objects, which, as they respectively supposed, had drawn him out; but passive, and even silent obedience, was the rule of the house. Johnson made no remark, as he attended his lord with a light to his cabinet. The latter then took from a secretary a pocket-book, containing a hundred pounds, which he intended to present to his protegé, and placing it on a table, awaited his appearance. Though his frame of mind was unusually agreeable, he was nevertheless still bent on his original purpose, and felt some impatience to be relieved from the engagement which had thus obstructed its execution.

In about an hour Johnson made his appearance at the door of the cabinet, with a look of considerable dismay, to announce that Mr. Stitchcloth and his children were below, and desired to speak with his lordship. A visit of this kind was a thing so entirely at variance with the long established usage of the house, that it appeared to Johnson like a sort of wonder, and although he could not pretend to form any notion of its meaning, it struck him on the whole as an occurrence that boded no good. He confined himself, as was his mood, to silent reflection, and on receiving the order to admit the visitors, attended them to the door of his lordship's cabinet, with his ordinary courtesy. The principal persons in the group were Stitchcloth and his daughter, mentioned above, the other children being still too young to attract notice, and their mother having been too much exhausted by her previous distress, and by the sudden shock of the present happy change in the condition of the family, to make her appearance. The tailor himself was greatly improved in his exterior since his late début on the bridge. He had arranged his dress, and his countenance no longer wearing the forlorn and haggard aspect of misery, had put on a placid and agreeable expression, and the man altogether had the air of a respectable mechanic, rather above the common level. His daughter corresponded, with some little deduction for parental partiality, to a description which he had given of her. She was a fair and blooming maiden, with the freshness belonging to her age, and although there was nothing decidedly distinguished either in her face or person, there was a natural ease in her manner, and sweetness in her countenance, which struck an observer very agreeably, and which were of course improved on this occasion, by the dominant feeling of the moment. The whole party crowded eagerly round their benefactor, and expressed their gratitude in the various tones and phrases natural to their different periods of life.

A scene of this kind was entirely new to our hero, and produced an excitement in his mind which it might not have done in one more accustomed to offices of kindness. The heartfelt acknowledgments of the father, and the lively prattling of the children, who partook the general satisfaction without well knowing what it meant, affected him deeply; but he was more particularly moved with the animated looks and gentle tones in which the pretty daughter expressed her gratitude. Vapourcourt, though for some time past estranged from the world of fashion, had formerly frequented the most brilliant of its circles; but whether from habitual apathy, or some original peculiarity of character, he had not been attracted by any of the reigning coquettes. The natural grace and beauty of this little damsel produced a stronger effect upon his feelings than all the artificial airs of the belles, or the sentimental phrases of the blues. It struck him that a kind and gentle companion like this would enliven his existence, and contribute to his happiness; or rather, without reasoning at all upon the subject, he felt himself, partly perhaps in consequence of the extraordinary excitement of the moment, irresistibly attracted by this seducing object. Like most other persons of similar habits, Vapourcourt was much under the influence of impulse, and no sooner had the notion occurred to him, than, losing sight of the former project of the morning, he proceeded at once to act upon this new fancy.

"Stitchcloth," said he to the father, taking him aside a few steps, "Stitchcloth, what say you to a peer of the realm for a son-in-law?"

"Your lordship is jesting," replied the astonished tailor; "I am sure you would not think of dishonouring a family, which you have so nobly rescued from despair."

"Jesting!" returned our hero, "why, man, I was never so serious in my life. Dishonour your daughter, Stitchcloth! you mistake me quite. The worst fortune I wish her is that of seeing her the true and lawful countess of Vapourcourt before to-morrow morning. Stitchcloth, I like your daughter; I am pleased with her appearance and her manners. I find in her a natural grace and sweetness, which I have looked for in vain in the fashionable beauties of this metropolis. I am wholly independent of the world, and have nothing to consult but my own inclination in the management of my affairs. I have an unincumbered fortune of ten thousand pounds a year; and if you and your daughter consent, I am ready to place it this very evening at her disposal. Ay, Stitchcloth, and I view it in point of fortune as no unequal match, for your daughter, I see, is a good-humoured girl; and a Scotchman, whose name I heard at Oxford, but have since forgotten, says, 'that a naturally pleasant humour is equal to an estate of ten thousand pounds a year.' On that score we are therefore precisely on a level."

To this proposal there was no objection to be made. The tailor acquiesced with becoming expressions of thankfulness, but ventured to inquire whether a matrimonial project would not be in some degree inconsistent with the other resolution of the morning.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Vapourcourt, "I had entirely forgotten. Stitchcloth, no more of that, if you love me; proceed at once and inform Mrs. Stitchcloth that her daughter is to be married this evening. I will entertain the charming Elizabeth in your absence, and endeavour to obtain her consent."

The reader will easily imagine that this, like all the other preliminary points, was settled without much difficulty. The marriage was announced in the Morning Chronicle of the Monday following, in these terms:

"Married, at his residence in Pall-Mall, by special license, on Saturday evening last, the right honourable the earl of Vapourcourt to the amiable and accomplished Miss Elizabeth Stitchcloth, eldest daughter of Solomon Stitchcloth, Esq. the eminent habit-maker of Thread-needle-street. The happy pair set off yesterday morning early, in his lordship's travelling carriage and four, for Vapourcourt castle, where they intend to pass the honey moon."

NAY, DROOP NOT THOU.

BY ISIDORA.

NAY, droop not thou—I cannot bear
The look I sometimes see thee wear;
The careless smile, the burst of glee,
The glow of hope, are meet for thee;
The spring-time of thy life should wear
Fresh gathered flowers, no thorns be there;
The dove of peace should build her nest
Within a pure and sinless breast;
Joy's golden chalice thou shouldst sip,
But care has dash'd it from thy lip!
Yet, could I hope joy's sun would shine
On any being linked with mine?
For all I love are doomed to see
A cloud o'erhang their destiny.
And thou, in duty's path so mild,
In fancy's realms a wayward child,
So pure of purpose, yet so prone
To make each passing ill thine own;
For happiness dependent still
On others' smiles, on others' will,
Thou canst not hope life's path will be
A smooth and thornless way to thee.
Thy golden dreams of youth may pass
Like shapes within the magic glass;
The rainbow hues, which lent their ray
So bright in fancy's early day,
May vanish from thy opening mind
And leave a keen regret behind;
And secret sorrows, hard to bear,
Impress a mournful shadow there.
Yet, strong in virtue, droop not thou,
Let hope again illumine thy brow,
Let reason's gently tempered beam
Succeed to fancy's dazzling gleam.
True to thyself, if hearts there be
Who coldly break their trust to thee,
They cannot rob thee of the power
That soothes affliction's sternest hour.
Not all the petty cares that make
The sum of human ills, can break
The spirit, that in truth secure,
Bends to the ills it cannot cure,
And meekly firm, through every ill
Preserves itself, unsullied still.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA,
To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER FIVE.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

HAVING secured my passport, I embarked at eight o'clock on the following morning for St. Petersburg. The steam-boats plying between the two places formed quite a contrast to the splendid lines long since established on the noble Hudson, and the adjacent bays and rivers, by our ingenious and enterprising countrymen, the Messrs. Stevens and others. In accommodation and appearance they little, if any, surpassed the Hoboken ferry-boats, and for speed they hardly averaged five and six miles an hour. However, surrounded by every thing so entirely new to me, I was little disposed to be fastidious; and taking a cushioned seat beneath the canvass awning, and baring my head to the grateful influence of a bland air that tempered the hot rays of the sun, I was prepared, fast or slow, to enjoy the coming scene. A band of itinerant musicians struck up a lively air as we cast off from the mole, and a motley crowd filled the cabin, and perambulated the deck, jabbering alternately English, German, French, Russian, and some half dozen other languages, and forming a complete Babel.

The coast on the north side of the Gulf hardly emerged from the water, while that to the south rose in gentle undulations, gradually sinking to a dead level as we approached the city, and adorned with pleasant villages, a country palace or two of the imperial family, and summer residences of the nobles and gentlemen of Russia.

You are aware that Peter the Great founded this capital of his empire on flat, marshy ground, at the mouth of the Neva; it therefore shows to little or no advantage as you approach, giving a bare view of the roofs of the houses, the green domes and the minarets of a convent, and the resplendent spires of the admiralty and fortress churches. We landed a full half mile below the town, and were instantly surrounded by a crowd of long-bearded, droshky-drivers, loudly soliciting our acceptance of their vehicles in a language I as little understood as you would genuine Choctaw or Mohegan. I should have been awkwardly enough placed had it not been for the attention of a fellow-countryman, who, having been up several times previous, kindly gave me his arm, and led the way to the only English hotel in the city. I immediately took a lunch, ordered up a droshky, and proceeded to deliver my letters; but, previous to fairly mounting, allow me to describe this most unique, odd vehicle, and its no less singular conductor.

It consists of a cushioned bench of about fifteen inches in width, and five feet in length, with a low circular back for the rider, and a slight-raised seat forward for the driver, all placed on easy springs, with small wheels, the hind ones not exceeding in diameter two and a half feet, and a narrow step hanging down on either side, on which to rest the feet. The ézetotshik, or coaché, is coifed with a low bell-crowned black hat, the brim curling at the sides, with a wide band and bright buckle; he wears a long blue cloth caftan, in the style of a robe de chambre, reaching to the feet, and girt with a sash or broad belt; long boots, a bright red calico shirt, without collar; he has his hair clipped like our present dandies, and from whom, I suspect, they have taken the fashion, and wears a neat, full beard, overspreading the breast, and nearly reaching to the girdle. The horse is generally high-spirited, with a tail sweeping the ground, exceedingly docile, goes in a very bright harness, no blinders, and a leather-bound hoop bending from the extreme of the fills over the neck, and to the top of which is attached a check-rein. For this singular and convenient equipage I was to pay a rouble (twenty cents) an hour; so striding it as a cavalier does his horse, I set off at a furious rate, my fellow bawling "pod-dee, pod-dee," (take care), to every thing he was likely to overtake or that threatened to obstruct his speed.

If St. Petersburg loses in importance as you approach it, it amply compensates when you are once within its precincts; the broad Neva, high banked and railed on either side by a beautiful granite, nearly divides the town; canals faced with the same material run along, and are intersected by spacious regular streets, swept in the neatest manner, with commodious flagged side-walks; large open squares, adorned with triumphal pillars and obelisks, equestrian and other statues, shady boulevards, and public and private gardens, with fishponds and iron railing; block after block of neat dwellings of brick, three and four stories in height, stuccoed outside, and painted a cream or light imitation marble; palaces and other public buildings, occupying whole consecutive squares, surmounted with statues and carved armorial bearings; churches and convents, crowned with green domes and numerous minarets and lofty spires, resplendent with ducal gold—all present a more uniform and general magnificence than can be found in any other European city; yet, if the traveller be struck with the general order and magnificence of this imperial residence, he will be no less surprised at the silence and inaction that pervade its streets. There is nothing of the bustling activity of our own and the English towns, nor of the life and gaiety of the French; indeed it seemed as if the population, en masse, were interdicted the streets, or that the body of the people, as in New-York on a Sunday during the hours of service, were at church. A couple of gens d'armes were spurring their heavy horses at a short trot; a few peasant-carts were slowly winding their way to the government warehouses; a lighter or two, a Swedish brig or Dutch galiot, were discharging at the quays; droshkies, and an occasional barouch or coach and four rolled rapidly along; a company of guards stood smoking their pipes, and gazing at their stacked arms, in front of their barracks; single officers in undress; a few citizens, mostly of the lower class, bowing and crossing, and momentarily pausing before some church or painted shrine, to utter a brief prayer as they passed; a solitary stranger or two, and an almost total absence of females of any rank, complete the representation of a populous city of between three and four hundred thousand souls.

As my friends resided in distant quarters of the town, I had a good two hours' ride in delivering my letters; a circumstance that I did not in the least regret, as it led me at once to a view of its most advantageous points, and I returned to my lodgings not at all fatigued, and highly gratified with this first survey of the neat magnificent capital of the Czars. ***

THE ESSAYIST.

A LECTURE ON LOVE AND COURTSHIP.

BY A LADY.

LADIES, love is my subject! can I be otherwise than eloquent? Gentlemen, courtship is my theme! can I fail to interest you?

To dive into the antiquity of this mysterious passion, we must roll back our ideas to that momentous period when "order was born of chaos;" "when Adam, first of men," was so agreeably surprised upon waking from his dreams, to find he had made such a fair exchange, and in lieu of a rib, had procured one of us!

But not to dwell on this original courtship, let us pass to the examination of the various insinuating ways adopted by the nations of antiquity, as well as the several stratagems practised by the moderns to entrap our too susceptible hearts.

The young gentlemen of Greece were very fertile in devices, and ingenious in contrivances to discover how far their love was likely to meet "a sweet return." Multifarious were their arts to obtain a reciprocity of affection; among these the philtre, or love-potion, stood pre-eminent, and never failed, in one respect, of having the effect that a draught of unadulterated love often produces, viz: it commonly deprived of reason those who drank of it. Various and strange indeed were the ingredients, but I shall omit these, as mysteries dangerous to be divulged.

I shall next observe upon the method pursued by the Calmucs: I say "pursued," since this equestrian people woo à cheval. When one of these amiable savages is inspired by love, and makes his mind known to his innamorata, they mount their horses, and away they go! If the lover overtakes the maid, he wins her; but if she outstrips him in the chase, he is discarded. Now it requires no deep study in Italian politics to feel assured that if the pulse of their hearts beat in unison, the Calmuc ladies take especial care not to ride too fast!

So lynx-eyed are Spanish parents, that until they dispose of their daughters in marriage, they are scarcely ever permitted out of their sight; suitors are thus compelled to pay their devoirs publicly—a woeful restraint, methinks, on the youthful pair, and I fancy I can perceive in the countenances of some of my hearers an expression, which, in fashionable phraseology, votes this method a bore.

How whimsically opposite is the Welsh plan of courtship for there they make love ad libitum; and Cambrian latitude surpasses even Iberian restraint.

In this part of Great Britain, as Protean are the modes as is the god. Some make love like pedagogues, some like rakes; but that I war against—for I have suffered much from its effects, alas!—is that abominable barbarous custom entitled, firting; and, strange to say, although I have given it the epithet of barbarous, it is only in civilized nations that it is tolerated; for who ever heard of a Kamachatkan "whispering soft nothings in a lady's ear?" What traveller describes an Esquimaux philander, or a Catabaw dangler? Or in what latitude (save our own) dwells the savage whose pastime consists in trifling with the female heart?

You may smile, young gentlemen, but let me tell you this practice is at best contemptible, and it is oftentimes dangerous. Bear in mind the fable of the "Boys and the Frogs"—it may be sport to you, but it is death to us.

There is a certain period of life, perhaps, when the effects are not to be so much dreaded, when the arrow falls blunted from the heart, or glances off, having merely made a slight scratch, and caused no dangerous inflammatory symptoms; but I wish that one of those senators who have of late undertaken to correct all abuses, would procure an act of parliament to suppress this dangerous propensity, to which, it cannot be concealed, both sexes are too much addicted, and that a committee would sit, with full powers to examine witnesses, in order to determine the precise age at which firting becomes harmless.

Male coquettes have been so far considered under the head of firting, that although much remains to be said on this anomaly in the human species, I shall not now trespass further on your time, my fair sisters, but dismiss them with a hint that ye

"Beware th' infectious sigh, the pleading look,
Downcast and low, in meek submission drest,
But full of guile."

It would be as curious as interesting to analyse the various modes which exist of paying and receiving addresses; but a few instances, by way of illustration, must suffice.

Some proceed by delicate attentions and tender insinuations; every look is watched, every wish anticipated; like a steam-vessel urging its course against wind and tide, the ass-alous lover will work his way through a closely wedged multitude to reach his fair one's shawl or tippet. He will quit the heated ball-room (the thermometer at ninety) and rush into an arctic atmosphere to call the coach; there will he stand, his teeth chattering like a poor wretch in a tertian ague, till the powdered lacquey announces it at hand, whence he hurries back into the mouth of the furnace to escort thence "the chaste, the fair, the expressive she."

As the wary angler throws in his silken line and delicate hook to catch the finny tribe, so others, by distant hints and gentle inuendos feel their way, and make their passion known; for women, like fish, require different baits, and like them will not bite at the same in all seasons; and it displays, perhaps, the nicest proficiency in "the art of love," to ascertain that which is best suited to our various taste. Some, indeed, like gudgeons, are easily caught—some are to be tickled like trout—some, like mackarel, are attracted by a bit of red cloth—for some the hook must be baited with "siller"—while others will only catch at the substantial good, and therefore when landed on the bank of matrimony, never feel like fish out of water.

Your Miss, just emerged from the "academy," is all for paths, hearts, darts, and flames. The lover, who it is necessary should be of the first order of fine forms, "must sigh like a paviour"—vow she is an angel—pen sonnets to her eye-brows—repeat scraps from Lord Byron and Mr. Moore—and have the most pathetic passages of the last new novel by heart. Then fall at her feet, protest eternal constancy and devotion, and swear he is her willing slave;—but remember, young ladies,

The humblest lover, when he lowest lies,
But stoops to conquer, and but kneels to rise!

We now come to the important point of making an offer—so important, that I have known some who have been years before they could "screw their courage to the sticking place;" others, indeed, we have heard of, who have popped the question upon a very short acquaintance; ay, and have had the knot tied "within a little month," or "ere those pumps were old," in which he led her through the galopade, like Euphrosyne, all smiles. Some bold and dauntless heroes are not to be repulsed—a refusal to them acts as a stimulus—"nil desperandum," say they—at her again—and in love's register are recorded matches, where the suitor, after a dozen rejections, has carried his point at last.

I was once in company with a gentleman who, I imagine, held the post of financier in the cabinet of Venus; this Cyprian Cocker pronounced that "only one man in twenty marries the woman he is in love with." It must be considered, like some of Mr. Hume's, rather a nice calculation; but his logic, his eloquence, and his science in numbers, like this great statesman's, were so conclusive that at the end of a long and animated debate, I was obliged to cede the point.

In reviewing the many incentives that lead to courtship, perhaps, we ought first to descant on beauty. But what is beauty? Who shall decide, when each eye forms its own? Happy for our species that it is so; or otherwise one sex would be continually pulling caps, and the other, cutting throats!

Female charms, like adjectives, admit of different degrees of comparison—thus pretty may be considered the positive; handsome, the comparative!! and beautiful, the superlative!!!

Although the bright blaze of beauty may sometimes be the torch which leads our beaux to the hymeneal altar, yet I fear the dazzling glare of money—filthy money—is too often the loadstar that attracts them. If you hear now o'days of a man about to enter the holy state, the first question asked is—not to whom he is to be united—but to how much? In fact, our sovereign charms are now o'days computed by her sovereign gold!—thus, as Hudibras has it,

"Love-passions are like parables,
By which men still mean something else,
Though love be all the world's pretence,
Money's the mythologic sense;
The real substance of the shadow,
Which all address and courtship's paid to."

I blush when I acknowledge that my own sex are but too apt to be thus led away, and to consider establishment, equi-page, jewels and rank, as the chief good.

"Tis these that early taint the female soul,
Instruct the eyes of young coquettes to roll,
Teach infant cheeks a hidden blush to know,
And little hearts to flutter at a beau."

Numerous are the matches formed on the basis of convenience, but never can these couples be said to tread in the flowery paths of love, though they may escape the thorny ways of disgust, or the barren plains of indifference. Thus the old man conveniently marries his tenant's daughter by way of nurse, "to bind up his temples, and give him his powders." The youthful heir unites himself to his neighbour's only child because the estates are so conveniently contiguous, and there appears no just cause or impediment why the two manors should not be joined together in one rent-roll.

The poor lord finds it vastly convenient to espouse his banker's daughter, because he wants money, and she wants rank; and your Corinthian dame makes a convenience of some wealthy and ambitious commoner, however she may despise the plebeian, because his purse can furnish her with those luxuries and enjoyments no longer hers, when the capital of the column is crumbled into dust.

"But happy they, the happiest of their kind,
Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend."

Yes, my young friends, a well-assorted union is the ne plus ultra of earthly bliss!

And now, for the present, I shall take my leave, concluding with a hint to either sex.

BEAUX—When bent on matrimony, look more than skin-deep for beauty; dive farther than the pocket for worth; and search for temper beyond the good humour of the moment; remembering it is not the most agreeable partner at a ball who forms the most amiable partner for life—

"Their virtues open fairest in the shade."

BELLES—Be not led away by each gay meteor of a spark, or too readily yield your hearts to an elegant and agreeable exterior; for the serpent is often ambushed beneath the fairest flowers. Let not your reason be blinded by love, or your sense enslaved by passion. Above all, seek not to make captives by personal accomplishments alone, "nor trust too much to an enchanting face," for recollect, "charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul." LITERARY NOTICES.

Melodies, Duets, Trios, Songs, and Ballads, pastoral, amatory, sentimental, patriotic, religious, and miscellaneous; together with metrical Epistles, Tales, and Recitations. By Samuel Woodworth. Second edition, comprising many late productions never before published. New-York. 18mo. pp. 283. Embellished with five copper-plate engravings.

HAVING been favoured with an early copy of this forthcoming volume, we take great pleasure in devoting a portion of our paper to a notice of its contents.

It has long been admitted that the poetry of a people is a correct transcript of their national character. Of the truth of this axiom, the work before us is a striking evidence, as it abounds with sentiments of patriotism, descriptions of rural pleasures and employments, and the endearments of domestic relations. It is exactly what American poetry always ought to be—patriotic, moral, chaste, and republican.

The almost miraculous influence of poetry, especially when promulgated in the form of popular songs, has been the theme of so many able pens, that very little remains to be added by ours. Among others the English Dibdin is a splendid instance of the resistless power of a patriotic lyre; and even our country, young as she is, has furnished others of no inconsiderable importance.

Are a people to be aroused to oppose some encroaching tyrant—on the eve of battle, are the strongest incentives to a brave resistance to be suggested to the minds of the soldiers—on the death of some patriot chieftain is the funeral hymn, awakening to still greater exertions his hardy followers, to breathe a new defiance to the oppressor:—In either instance from the lyre of the bard the angelic form of virtue and the stern spirit of liberty have arisen with renewed energies. An American Freneau or a German Korner, entwining the sword of justice with the unfading garland of song, have held it aloft to their countrymen, and thus have revived their drooping hopes, and renovated their holy ambition. Where liberal bounty, rigid laws, and military discipline, have equally failed to tempt or control the popular will, the lyric and the ode have succeeded in alluring volunteer thousands to the standard of their country, and have created a spirit which has conducted those thousands to victory and to honourable peace.*

* Witness the almost miraculous influence of the Marseilles Hymn during the first French revolution. But to come nearer home: the homespun, unpolished, prosaic, but highly patriotic ballads, which, during our own revolution, occasionally found their way into the American camp, where they were chanted by every soldier who could sing a note, did more to animate the army to deeds of glory than all the eloquence of their officers.

But a fact of still later date is more to our purpose, as it refers to the individual whose poetical merits are about to be considered. An officer, who received promotion for his distinguished conduct in the battle of Lake Erie, under the gallant Perry, has repeatedly assured the writer of this article that a few days before that memorable contest, a package of patriotic songs was received from New-York, and distributed among the crews of several of the vessels in the American squadron, who were subsequently in the habit of singing them with the most enthusiastic glee. On asking him the subjects and titles, he named the "Sinking of the Guerriere," the "United States' victory over the Macedonian," "Sinking of the Jawa by the Constitution," and the "Hornet and Peacock;" each of which seemed to inspire the sailors with an ardent longing for a contest with the enemy. These songs were all written by Woodworth.

De Witt Clinton once observed to a friend, that Woodworth's "Patriotic Diggers" threw up more earth at Brooklyn heights than an extra regiment of shovels would have done without that stimuli.

Thus it appears plainly to our minds that to inspiring song, as to a first principle, are mankind mainly indebted for most of the freedom and much of the happiness they enjoy.

The band of poets who have sung through their wearisome and troubled day of life, although proverbially poor themselves, have, by their heaven-directed labours, made an ungrateful world incalculably rich in a species of wealth which gold cannot equal—the wealth of pure, holy, and instructive thought. How largely have they not contributed to the great cause of civilization; their only pleasure arising from the happy delirium of their feelings when weaving the wizard web of song; their most pleasant hope the unstable one of being remembered by their works when the grave shall have closed upon the keenest of all sorrows—the sorrows of a sensitive mind.

We cannot believe that the numerous readers and admirers of verse in this country can possibly be ignorant of the peculiar and most commendable characteristic of Mr. Woodworth's style. But fearing that some may not have read his previous productions, we deem it necessary to state, as our opinion, that his writings exhibit the most striking evidence of poetry and patriotism, simplicity without common-place, and nationality without prejudice.

We subjoin a few extracts which will afford a correct and favourable specimen of his manner. The first which we select is an affecting trifle never before published.

THE ORPHAN MAID.

How hard the maiden orphan's fate,
Whose early joys and hopes are fled,
Who vainly asks the rich and great
For leave to earn her daily bread!
Exposed to frowns, rebukes, and sneers,
In humble menial garb arrayed,
While heartless fools deride her tears,
And spurn the hapless orphan maid.

There was a time—alas! 'tis fled—
When fortune, friends, and kindred smiled,
When sunny rays of joy were shed
Around the gay and happy child;
When, shielded by parental care,
No pang of sorrow dared invade,
Save when she saw the meek despair
Of some poor hapless orphan maid.

But ah! her parents died, and left
Their darling unprotected child,
Of fortune, friends, and joy bereft,
And then the maiden never smiled.
She only asked to toil for bread,
She sought no unrequited aid—
But asked in vain! till hope was fled,
And death relieved the orphan maid!

The domestic little song which follows, and which ranks second to nothing of the kind, except, perhaps, the author's celebrated "Bucket," we recommend to our fair readers of every age, rank, and situation of life. To mothers, in particular, who wish to see their daughters in what Dr. Johnson calls the "school of virtue," the advice contained in this playful effusion, must be highly gratifying. It is entitled

THE NEEDLE.

The gay belles of fashion may boast of excelling
In waltz or cotillon—at whist or quadrille;
And seek admiration by vauntingly telling
Of drawing, and painting, and musical skill;
But give me the fair one, in country or city,
Whose home and its duties are dear to her heart,
Who cheerfully warbles some rustic ditty,
While plying the needle with exquisite art.
The bright little needle—the swift flying needle,
The needle directed by beauty and art.

If love have a potent, a magical token,
A talisman, ever resistless and true—
A charm that is never evaded or broken,
A witchery certain the heart to subdue—
'Tis this—and his armoury never has furnished
So keen and unerring, or polished a dart;
Let beauty direct it, so pointed and burnished,
And oh! it is certain of touching the heart.

Be wise then, ye maidens, nor seek admiration
By dressing for conquest, and flirting with all;
You never, whatever be your fortune or station,
Appear half so lovely at rout or at ball,
As gaily convened at a work-covered table,
Each cheerfully active and playing her part,
Beguiling the task with a song or a fable,
And plying the needle with exquisite art.

There is much sweetness and simplicity in the following pastoral serenade:

AWAKE, MY DEAR JANE.

Through curtains of crimson and azure, my Jane,
Infant day, in its cradle, is smiling again;
Its eyelids are gemmed with the dew-drops of night,
Which glitter and sparkle like pearls in the light.
Jane! sweet Jane! Awake, my dear Jane!

O list to the warblings that float on the air!
The gay feathered songsters are calling my fair!
The blackbird and robin, the linnet and jay,
All join with thy Fanny to call thee away.
Jane! sweet Jane! Awake, my dear Jane!

The lads and the lasses are all on the green,
The shepherds have chosen my Jane for their queen,
The May-pole is reared, and the garlands are twined,
And a balm-breathing wreath is for Jenny designed.
Jane! sweet Jane! Awake, my dear Jane!

Among the patriotic effusions there are many of superior excellence. We have room, however, but for one, and that the shortest.

YES, YES, I GO.

"Yes, yes I go!"—he whisper'd soft,
 "In freedom's cause my sword to wield,
 Columbia's banner waves aloft,
 And glory calls me to the field."
 Then foremost on the foe he prest,
 While war's rude tempest wildly roared,
 Till gushing from the hero's breast
 The purple tide in torrents poured.

He fell, and oh! what fancies stole
 Through memory's vista, bright and warm,
 Till one loved image o'er his soul
 Came like an angel in the storm.
 But loudly swelled the bugle's blast,
 His hand instinctive grasped the steel,
 Again it swelled—but all was past,
 The warrior's breast had ceased to feel.

We would extend our selections, but our limits will only allow us to make a few more remarks, and then refer the reader to the work itself, with the assurance that it will amply repay perusal. Among the pieces which have received the greatest share of public approbation we would name the "Epilogue to Rokeby," the "Ode for the Canal Celebration," the comic tale of "Tit for Tat," also that of "The Whiskers," and the recitation of "Raising the Wind." The address intended to have been spoken at the benefit of the widow and orphans of the late Hopkins Robertson, has been justly pronounced a highly poetical and affecting performance. The well-known patriotic song called the "Hunters of Kentucky," is familiar to all, and the beautiful apologue of the "Wounded Finger," which teaches such a touching lesson of resignation, has appeared in most of our public journals. In the address to "Lydia" we recognise much of that touching pathos, pure affection, and manly fortitude for which the lyrics of Burns are so justly celebrated, and which we might expect from a true poet when singing to a beloved object. In the numerous national songs and odes we discover the devotion of a patriot and the fire of a bard, who loves his native land warmly yet rationally. And, in fine, while regretting that Mr. Woodworth has been under the necessity of devoting that time and thought to the composition of mere "occasional pieces," which should have been given to some continued standard poem, we cannot close this article without commending his volume to the perusal of all admirers of American genius, for it is truly and entirely an American book.

BIOGRAPHY.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT WOMEN.

In a former number we gave a sketch of the life and character of Jane of France, a woman of royal descent, of gentle virtues, and deeply acquainted with grief. We now proceed to give an account of one who belonged to an aristocracy of a higher order, deriving its privileges from no human establishment, but yet not exempt from sufferings.

HYPATIA.

Hypatia was the daughter of Theon, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria. She was born in that city, towards the end of the fourth century, and she gave early indications of superior intelligence. While her infant face was radiant with smiles and beauty, her eyes were sparkling with the beams of her kindling intellect. Her father contemplated with delight these presages, as he considered them, of future greatness; and he fondly hoped that the meridian of her life would fulfil the promises of its early dawn. He determined that her natural talents should be aided by the ablest instruction, and he procured for her the most eminent preceptors in all the various branches of a polite education, while he himself trained her reasoning powers and matured her judgment by his lessons in geometry and astronomy. Thus did he nurse with parental tenderness the buds of genius which he saw expanding in her youthful mind. After her intellectual faculties had somewhat ripened, he imbued her mind with the philosophy of the schools. He warmed her pure heart with the divine precepts of Socrates; he unfolded to her the ethereal systems of Plato; and he conducted her safely through the bewildering mazes of the Aristotelian philosophy. She, however, preferred the sublime theories and practical science of Plato to the metaphysical subtleties of the Stagyrte.

Her genius had now taken a decided direction; her thirst after knowledge had become almost insatiable, and the whole of her days, with part of her nights, were spent in intense application. She ran with astonishing rapidity through the whole circle of the mathematics, embracing within its ample circumference algebra, geometry, music, and astronomy. She then plunged boldly into the gulph of metaphysics; and though many a stronger vessel had been the sport of its contrary winds and had been wrecked upon its stormy billows, yet, with her clear sight fixed steadily upon the light of truth, she steered her frail bark in safety to the shore.

Her capacious mind had now received all the learning which her native city could furnish, and, like many illustrious sages who had preceded her in the walks of science, she determined to go abroad in pursuit of further knowledge. She visited Athens, where she attended the schools of the most celebrated philosophers, and in turn she sometimes explained publicly the doctrines of Aristotle and Plato. After enriching herself with the precious stores of Grecian learning, she returned to Alexandria, leaving behind her a reputation for wisdom, knowledge, and eloquence, which the sophists of Greece might indeed envy, but might strive in vain to rival.

Her countrymen welcomed back with enthusiasm one who came with the accumulated wisdom of ages, and whose genius was likely to shed additional lustre upon the name of her native city. The magistrates, desirous of rendering her talents subservient to the public good, earnestly solicited her to give lessons in the school where Plotinus and his followers had taught. The natural diffidence of her sex caused her to hesitate, but her ardent love of science at length vanquished her scruples: she yielded to the public voice, and succeeded that long line of illustrious philosophers who had rendered the school of Alexandria one of the most celebrated in the world. This flattering distinction stimulated her to a further cultivation of her peculiar powers. She knew that a high estimate had been set upon her abilities, and she felt that in discharging her important duties, a more than ordinary display of talent would be expected. She therefore studied with redoubled ardour to acquit herself in a manner worthy of the great reputation of the school in which she was about to teach, and she did not disappoint the expectations of the public. Her success exceeded her most sanguine hopes. Her followers multiplied daily, and she numbered among them the virtuous Synesius, afterwards bishop of Ptolemais, who, although she constantly refused to embrace the doctrines of christianity, ever retained for her the most zealous attachment. Her fame spread rapidly, through all countries where learning was appreciated or virtue respected, and strangers flocked from all quarters to hear the female philosopher, whose knowledge enlightened, whose charms fascinated, and whose eloquence enchanted them. The young were perhaps attracted to her school by the transcendent beauty of her person; the wise and good by her exalted virtues and her brilliant talents. The persons most illustrious for their rank or merit appeared among her disciples, and a gorgeous train of horses, chariots, and slaves crowded the doors of her academy. She had now risen to the zenith of her fame, and although her light was permitted to shine for a season, yet, as we shall see, it was soon destined to be extinguished for ever.

Cyril of Alexandria, whose name is famous in the annals of the church, gained, by his fastings in the desert and his zeal in the pulpit, a great reputation for sanctity. His mortifications and prayers easily imposed upon a bigoted multitude who, in opposition to the claims of the archdeacon, bore him triumphantly to the patriarchal chair. He availed himself of the popular favour, and gradually extending his influence beyond the pale of the church, he usurped the authority of a civil magistrate. Clothed with the spiritual and temporal power, he soon manifested the haughtiness and violence of his temper. He commenced his sway by oppressing the harmless Novatian sect of christians and their unoffending bishop, and the jews became the next object of his resentment. The toleration of this persecuted race was expressly declared, and their privileges clearly defined, by the laws of the Ptolemies and Cæsars; yet, unauthorised by any imperial mandate, the patriarch, at the dawn of day, led a tumultuous populace to the attack of their synagogues. The jews, surprised and unarmed, were incapable of resistance, and they beheld their places of worship polluted and razed to the ground. Their goods were seized and distributed among the troops, who filled the cup of their sufferings by desolating their homes and driving them into banishment. Orestes, the prefect of the city, a man of liberal principles, could not behold without indignation his jurisdiction thus insulted, and Alexandria deprived of so many of its most industrious inhabitants. He complained to the Emperor Theodosius of this expulsion as an unwarrantable usurpation of power, and a direct violation of the Julian law. The bishop, on his part, complained of the seditious temper of the jews. The emperor declined to interfere, and the complaints of the prefect only served to direct against his own person the resentment of the patriarch. A body of five hundred Nitrian monks, imagining that their religion and the life of their chief were in danger, rushed into the city with a determination to support the cause of Cyril, and attacked the chariot of Orestes as he was passing through the streets; his guards fled from this wild horde of the desert. Orestes was assaulted with a volley of stones, and his face was covered with blood. The loyal citizens of Alexandria hastened to the rescue of their governor. The monks were routed; one of their leaders was seized, and put to death by order of Orestes. His body, at the command of Cyril, was borne in solemn procession to the cathedral, where his funeral eulogy was pronounced by the lips of the patriarch himself. He ordered his name to be changed from Ammonius to Thaumastus the Wonderful, and to be enrolled upon the bright list of martyrs. His sacred remains were then entombed in the church with all the honours of martyrdom. The execution of the guilty monk increased the bishop's enmity to the pagans; and to appease his indignation, he accepted, if he did not promote, the sacrifice of a maiden who taught the religion of Plato and enjoyed the confidence of Orestes. Involved in daily disputes, the governor had frequent resource to the councils of Hypatia, whose friendship he had long cultivated, and whose wisdom and prudence he found valuable guides through his difficult affairs. It was rumoured among the christians that the measures of Orestes against them were suggested by the female philosopher, and that she was the only obstacle to the reconciliation of the prefect and patriarch; this obstacle was speedily removed. One day as Hypatia was returning home from her academy she was torn from her chariot, stripped of her garments, dragged through the streets to the church called Cæsaria, and stoned to death by Peter the Reader, and a band of savage and merciless fanatics. The inhuman monsters did not satiate their thirst of blood till they had severed the flesh from her bones, and committed her quivering limbs to the flames. Humanity shudders at the horrid recital, yet the powerful prelate struck the sword from the hands of justice, and the perpetrators of the atrocious deed escaped unpunished. There is no positive proof that Cyril was accessory to the murder of Hypatia, yet circumstances favour such a belief; and the bloody sacrifice of the virtuous maiden has imprinted a stain on the name of Cyril which the title of saint cannot conceal.

The writings of Hypatia were numerous. A commentary on the algebra of Diophantes, and the conic sections of Apollonius, added to her fame. But her works seemed doomed to the fate of their illustrious author. They perished in the flames of the Alexandrian library.

We ought not, perhaps, to wonder that Hypatia's extraordinary attainments and commanding talents were the cause of her destruction. In a city agitated by civil and religious tumults she discoursed upon laws, and reasoned upon codes of morals. She was accused of being the champion of paganism; and the eye of faction, which is ever turned towards the most elevated objects, fixed its baleful gaze upon the female philosopher. Before her time, Aristotle had been compelled to fly to Chalcis for safety. The life of Plato had been sought by the tyrant Dionysius. Cicero had perished by the sword, and Socrates by poison. Could then female weakness expect to avert a blow which masculine strength had not been able to parry?

The character of Hypatia is easily portrayed; the sublimities of nature are caught by the commonest eye, and where beauty and harmony prevail, where there are no faults to remedy or deformities to conceal, the imagination of the artist is neither taxed nor tortured, but the simple copy flows freely from his pencil. Moral and intellectual greatness are the prominent features of Hypatia's character. All writers have borne testimony to her profound erudition and to the splendour of her talents, to her unrivalled beauty and to the unspotted purity of her morals; yet, with all these great intellectual and personal endowments, Hypatia was entirely without vanity. In accepting the office of public instructress, she may seem, however, to have departed from the retiring modesty of her sex, yet let it be remembered that it was at the earnest and repeated call of her country, and then too with the greatest reluctance, that she accepted the proffered dignity; and that in fulfilling her arduous duties, her modest and unassuming demeanour always guarded her conduct against the slightest reproach. She restrained within the bounds of respect the young men who attended her lessons, and who showed themselves not insensible to her charms, while she discouraged every idea of a tie which would diminish her opportunities of study, fearing, perhaps, not without some reason, that the light of science would fade upon the altar of Hymen.

Her house was the constant resort of learned and distinguished persons, yet her conduct was so circumspect both in private and public, that the lips of scandal were sealed, and the all-blighting breath of calumny never tarnished even for a moment the brightness of her character. In short, to use the language of Goldsmith, "both the christians and heathens who have transmitted her history and her misfortunes have but one voice. when they speak of her beauty, her knowledge, and her virtue." She dressed with simplicity, and frequently threw around her elegant person the cloak which was worn by the philosophers of her time.

The historian Socrates has preserved some details of her system of instruction. She commenced by teaching mathematics, which she afterwards applied to the sciences comprehended under the name of philosophy. She always set out with some well-established truth, and deduced its consequences in a clear and powerful course of reasoning. She never spoke in public without previous preparation, and when enforcing the abstract truths of science, her manner was dignified, mild, and persuasive. But when she discoursed upon the sublime morals of Socrates and the immortality of the soul; when she reasoned upon mind and matter, upon the attributes of the Deity, and the wonders of his creation; or when she declaimed upon the structure of the earth, and the stupendous mechanism of the heavens, her imagination rose with the sublimity of her theme, her thoughts became more glowing, her expressions more fervid, and as the rich tones of her sweet voice swelled through the full cadences of the Greek language, her hearers were thrilled and spell-bound by her enchanting eloquence. It was returning to her peaceful home from an ennobling occupation of this kind that this extraordinary woman was seized and sacrificed by a fanatic mob—another melancholy proof, that talents, however useful, or virtue, however exalted, are no protection against the fury of men blinded by their prejudices or their passions.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Letters from London.—The following letter from our friend C., received by the Corinthian packet, came too late for insertion in the section of the paper to which his communications have been usually allotted. To satisfy the intense anxiety which we know to exist among the readers of the Mirror, and our citizens generally, to possess themselves of all that emanates from his pen, and being unwilling to withhold it for even a few days from the public eye, we have for once broken our rules, and given it a place in our own department. It is characterised by much of the writer's peculiar, piquant, and felicitous manner.

London, September 10, 1830.

DEAR SIR—Here I am at length in the small city of London; but as there has not, as yet, been any firing of guns, lighting of lamps, or other public demonstration of joy manifested, I am inclined to think, either that the inhabitants generally have not heard of my arrival, or else, that they do not care any thing at all about the matter. Though the latter may be the case, I hope it will not appear immodest on my part to suppose that the former is the true reason, as many authors of small volumes of indifferent poetry and worse prose, from your side of the water and elsewhere, seem to have expected, that a sensation like unto that created by an earthquake would be the natural consequence of their entry into the British metropolis, and were, moreover, exceedingly astonished when they found that their presence actually made no perceptible difference in the state of things. But indeed, to hear certain classes of tradesmen talk, you would think that the humblest traveller would, at the present moment, be thankfully received by the great city as a slight addition to her small stock of living souls. Inquire after whom you will, they are "out of town;" and the shopkeepers, ever and anon, solemnly aver, that "there is nobody in London just now." It is certainly the case, that this present month of September is, without exception, the dulllest in the year. All the great men that make London famous are away on the wings of pleasure, and only about a million and a half of plodding, industrious nobodies are left behind. It is the great hunting, shooting, and fishing season; and foxes, pheasants, grouse, trout, and all other animals specified in the game laws, hold their lives upon a very uncertain tenure. In the picturesque districts the hill-sides are covered with landscape-hunting painters, and the valleys filled with ruralizing poets, who, in these half-a-crown per line times forsake garrets and Grub-street for country villas and cottages ornées. The two large theatres are closed—the great actors and fascinating actresses scattered over the United Kingdom, and the collective wisdom of the house of commons is also distributed amongst the principal bathing places and other scenes of fashionable resort. Indeed, the only two lions remaining are baron Rothschild and boatswain Smith, the former of whom, according to report, makes his two or three hundred thousands a day, by his superior information respecting the troubles on the continent; while the latter holds forth in the open air in Smithfield, amid the bleating of sheep, the bellowing of cattle and the squeaking of pigs, to that obdurate, hard-hearted, incurably larcenous and pocket-picking generation, which attend the fair held in honour of St. Bartholomew, now in the height of its glory. The man of stocks and bullion I have not as yet seen. The all-famous boatswain, to judge from appearances, would make an excellent able-bodied seaman, though rather a questionable saint. His voice is such a voice as ought properly to belong to no one but a boatswain—a voice that might be heard above the yelling of a north-north-wester in the German ocean; but unfortunately, his lungs appear to be much stronger than his arguments, for his perhaps well-meant admonitions and exhortations were received with more uproarious shouts and laughter than even the delicate comic humour of the clowns, or the uncommonly witty jokes of the showmen. Surely it is letting zeal outrun discretion for even an irregular minister of the gospel to set up in opposition to the "pig-faced lady," and attempt to divide the attention of a drunken and riotous mob between himself and her, or any other monstrous production of nature or invention of roguery. The cause of genuine religion cannot be particularly benefited by any appeals made to such a congregation at such a time and in such a place. Boatswain Smith ought to peruse the Proverbs, wherein he will find it stated, that there is a season for all things.

But though London be at present destitute of living curiosities, the standard objects of wonder for strangers—St. Paul's, the Bank of England, Westminster Abbey, and other public buildings—still occupy their respective stations; and however these places may be sneered at by fops in comedies, or fashionable ladies and gentlemen in modern fashionable novels, as objects only fit for country cousins to gape and gaze at, they must still have been rather clever men who planned and reared those edifices, and they are at least worthy the inspection of all but such as profess a superlative contempt for sight-seeing. It need scarcely be stated here, that St. Paul's is a stupendous pile. You feel a mixed sentiment of awe, wonder, and admiration, on entering the interior, and gazing up at the immense dome suspended over your head; and I should think it the most unfavourable situation to be delivered of a pun that can well be imagined. No one but a most ineffable puppy would be guilty of a witticism amid such a scene of lofty and solemn grandeur. From the high grounds around London, you see St. Paul's raising its gigantic head above the clouds of dun smoke which overhang the city, and shroud the mass of inferior spires from view. Its height is four hundred and four feet, considerably more, I believe, than your St. Paul's placed upon the top of Trinity.

The bank of England is another astonishing affair. I was shown through nearly the whole of it by one of the upper clerks, and even got a sight of their manner of printing notes—a great favour, by-the-by, though I had not mechanical knowledge enough to distinctly understand or describe the very ingenious process. The most surprising thing, however, is the extreme silence and celerity with which business to the amount of millions is transacted. Thousands are drawn and deposited without a sentence being exchanged, and low stifled sounds, like unto those in a place of worship, are alone heard. The salaries of the persons about the establishment amount to about eight hundred thousand dollars per year, and during the last war the clerks alone formed two very handsome city regiments. Since the small notes have been called in, the number of clerks has been considerably diminished. Five-pound notes are now the smallest that are issued. The Royal Exchange is close at hand, and the incessant murmur of voices within its precincts is a striking contrast to the silence of the bank. Here are to be met specimens of the human race from nearly all the civilized and semi-civilized nations on the face of the earth; and the variety of languages in which they try to overreach each other gives you no bad idea of the morning when the workmen fell out before the tower of Babel. As soon as the hour of four arrives, a jangling of bells commences, which makes "confusion worse confounded." This is done to prevent each man hearing what his neighbour says; business is then, of course, at an end, and they depart forthwith; and thus the men of millions are rung off 'change with as little ceremony as a parcel of noisy school-boys are summoned to school.

The extensive scale on which some of the shops (stores) and trading establishments here are conducted, is not to be approached, I suppose, by any in the world. In them, as in the bank, the same silence and mechanical regularity prevail; business to an immense extent is transacted with less noise and trouble than the selling of a few shillings worth of goods in a retail shop. I have heard some good stories of Scotch and Irish merchants coming up to London to do business to what they consider a very large extent, and their utter surprise at the small impression their wonderful demands seemed to make upon the London merchants. It is, to be sure, rather vexing for a man to come all the way from Dublin, Glasgow, or Edinburgh to give what he conceives to be a tremendous order, and which he supposes ought to lay the house with which he trades under the heaviest obligations to him and his forever, and then to find it looked upon as a bagatelle—a mere matter of course. He enters the counting-house with that business-like importance which it is common for small tradesmen to assume when engaged in transactions larger than they have been accustomed to, and when they think they are about to create a sensation—he states his demand in a pompous and self-satisfied manner, and instead of meeting with that speechless astonishment and eternal gratitude which he expects, is thanked with cold civility for his favour, and told "It shall be attended to." The man immediately thinks that his merchant must have mistaken pounds for pence, and begins to explain and restate his case, when he is snappishly cut short with "Very well, sir—it shall be attended to." From kings to shopkeepers, all human greatness is by comparison. C.

Europe.—The revolution of France is developing its results in the neighbouring kingdoms; and wherever the people have cause of discontent with their rulers they cry aloud for relief, and make their voices heard and their power felt. The sword hath no more terror than the royal mandate—and regular discipline and military array are every where compelled to yield to the valour of patriotism, and the invincible perseverance of resistance to oppression. A spirit has been aroused—and wise are they who listen to its breathings, and catch the tone of sympathy for its aspirations. To oppose it, or attempt to crush it, is—death. How far the enlightened state of the people's minds will enable them to avoid the terrific consequences of former revolutions—when the overthrow of despotic power too often involved that of order, law, and all the legitimate distinctions and supports of society—when the just appeal to arms was too often converted into a thirst for blood and plunder and indiscriminate warfare—how far these evils may be averted, it is not easy to foretell. But the very remembrance of these outrages, and the sense of the immense benefit to be derived from, and forbearance and respect to, the laws, furnish grounds for favourable anticipations.

The election.—This annual source of excitement and restless bustle to many, and of merriment to many more, has just passed over our heads, and most gratefully do we announce the fact that they have been unscathed by the popular tempest. Our ears have indeed been stunned by obstreperous clamours, our eyes enlarged beyond their wonted spheres, by the attempt to grasp in one view the huge capitals syllabing men's names, and the great objects they have in view in condescending to accept offices—provided they can get them; and our fears have been awakened for the liberties of our dear country, nay for our individual safety, by the earnest prognostications held out by all parties of the anarchy and confusion which awaited their defeat. So far, however, the city, and we believe the country too, is quiet. Some one party alone has succeeded, we know not which, but as yet the streets are not unpaved, trees have not been cut down, nor carriages overturned to make barricades—shop-windows still glare with their wonted illuminations—the reckless cartman jogs on in front of his thundering wheels, and the wood-sawyer follows him at snail's pace, with his buck and saw on his back, and his can of oil in his hand—the dandy still struts along with vacant stare, and the ladies still giggle with their provoking smiles as they tease the spruce lads behind the counter—the Mirror, too, has been printed, and we verily believe will be distributed as usual to our numerous curious readers. The evil day is therefore still put off, and we may rejoice in our present, if not in our secure escape.

Penmanship.—This polite accomplishment, so much neglected, and so requisite to give grace and polish to other acquirements, has been particularly overlooked in the education of our females. Why it is so, it were difficult to account, excepting on the supposition that some of the aristocratic spirit of the ancient nobility of France had crept into the humours of our teachers and pupils, which deemed it odiously vulgar to hold a pen neatly, or to manage it intelligibly. A greater evil does not infect the every-day concerns of life than the illegible handwriting of the mass of the people. To correct this is both necessary and desirable, and those teachers who devote themselves successfully to the task deserve encouragement. Among them Mr. Bristow holds a high rank, to which he is recommended both by his own manifest credentials of being an excellent chirographist and teacher, and by the written laudatory testimonials of some of the first men in this city.

A PARABLE FROM THE GERMAN.

NATHAN a prophet, and a teacher of great wisdom, in Salem, was seated one day in the midst of his disciples, and the words of instruction and wisdom flowed like honey from his lips. Gamahel, one of his disciples, said to him, "Master, why do you always speak to us in parables?"

But Nathan answered him and said, "My son, when I was young, I felt in my heart the will of the Lord that I should bear evidence to truth, and become a teacher of the people—and the spirit of the Lord descended upon me. I dressed myself in coarse hair cloth; I went among the inhabitants of the town, and reproved them in harsh terms for their sins; but the people fled from me, and the words of my mouth did not penetrate to their hearts; at least they thought they were not meant for them, but for their neighbours! This stung me to the heart; and, during the night, I fled to Mount Hermon, saying to myself, if they refuse the light which I offer them, let them perish in night and darkness. But see, the morning began to dawn; the dew of heaven descended upon Mount Hermon; night now had fled, and the herbs had spread their fragrance all around; the reflection of the morning's sun was mild and sweet; the dew had refreshed the earth; every creature seemed to enjoy the beauty of the scene; the early sun shone cheerfully upon the reviving plants; I thought I heard in a gentle breeze the words of the Lord—'See, Nathan, it is thus that heaven sends to the children of the earth its most precious gift, the light of day.' I descended from the mountain, and in the valley rested under a beautiful pomegranate tree, which afforded me shade, and at the same time bore blossoms and fruit. I looked at the blossoms and said to myself, how lovely are those flowers! their delicate red resembles the hue of innocence on the blooming cheeks of the daughters of Israel! As I approached still nearer, I perceived also the delightful fruit partially concealed by the leaves, and I thought I heard the word of the Lord as coming from the tree, saying, 'See, Nathan, thus nature promises its sweetest fruit in the simple blossom, and furnishes the fruit itself, while her hand is concealed behind the leaves.'

"Thus," said Nathan, "I returned to Salem in good spirits. I exchanged my coarse cloth for a gay dress; I anointed my head, and taught the truth in a pleasing manner and by parables—for naked truth is too serious, and makes few friends; but when clothed in a simple and cheerful attire, gains many disciples."

CONFESSIONS.

BY EVERARD.

Shepherd.—"Ah, sir, in your young days you maun hae been a verri deevil."

North.—"No, James, I broke my troth to none. Poetry purified my passions; and worshipping the ideal, my spirit triumphed over mere flesh and blood, and was preserved in innocence by the beautiful."

If all the treasures earth can pour
About a brief sojourner's way,
Were gathered on one golden shore
Where radiant sunbeams careless play—
If hope might wave her rainbow wing
O'er a bright paradise below,
Painting life's scenes with hues of spring,
To woman all would I bestow.

I joy to see her early days—
Her cheek of rose—her spirit free;
When the rich light of beauty plays
Where'er her restless feet may be:

I would existence were to her
A glorious and unclouded day,
That pleasure might her pulses stir
Undimmed by darkness or decay.

And yet I linger midst them all
With heart untouched and loveless eye;
Unmoved—unfettered in that thrall
For whose brief reign 'twere sweet to die;
'Twere sweet—if the excited heart
Could drink from love's eternal well,
Which to the bosom can impart
The rapture words can never tell.

And yet, with feelings sanctified,
That leap to see the lovely glad,
I mark my young existence glide,
Sometimes in joy—but often sad:
And thirsting for the pictured one,
The idol of the enkindled mind,
I gaze on all—displeased with none—
Walking in beauty's light—yet blind!

Oh, high ambition! 'Tis thy power
Which lifts the enthusiast spirit up;
Which bids us seek the laurel bower
Where fame enwreathes her glittering cup.
It is a thirst which drives me on
Far from the peaceful fount of love,
As eagles, nurtured in the sun,
Bathe their broad plumes in skies above.

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1830.

NUMBER 19.

For the Mirror.

TO THE PROCELLARIA.

BY PROTEUS.

This bird is said to live altogether at sea, building its nest on some floating mass of weeds, and fearlessly gliding from wave to wave during the roughest storms.

HAIL! pilgrim of the deep,
Whose dark blue waters are to thee a home,
Whether in smiles they sleep,
Or, waked by tempests, dash themselves to foam,
Sending their thrilling voices to the gale,
At morn or eventide, like spirits' solemn wail.

Therefore, strange bird, no change
Of wind or wave thy varying life can harm,
Prepared alike to range
The wastes of sea and air in storm or calm;
But most rejoicing when thy form is cast
Aloft careering wild upon the fitful blast.

Thou build'st thy floating nest
Within the hollows of the mid-sea flood,
And, cradled 'neath thy breast,
Dost warm from embryo life thy ocean brood,
And lead them forth its stormy ills to brave,
And mount the rushing gale and skim the roaring wave.

What are to thee the jars,
The toils, the triumphs, hopes, and loves, and fears,
The wassail and the wars
Of man?—the sole inheritor of tears—
Though loud their swelling consonance and rude,
It breaks not the repose of thy far solitude.

At times thou see'st perchance
Some lone wayfarer of the perilous deep,
O'er the untracked expanse,
In his frail winged mansion wildly sweep;
Or hear'st his death-shriek through the sullen gloom,
As from the wreck he sinks unconfined to his tomb.

To thee the pleasant earth
In all its beauty is an unknown world—
Thou never saw'st the birth
Of the young buds or blushing flowers, nor furled
The dripping pinnons of thy weary wing,
Midautumn's crimson leaves or the green bowers of spring.

Yet on the desert tide
Thou'rt not alone—the nautilus is with thee,
And gaily at thy side
The dolphin gleams, thy rainbow of the sea,
And when the night falls darkly o'er the billow,
The star-fish lights his lamp beside thy heaving pillow.

Afar dost thou retire
From all the pomp of art:—the gorgeous dome,
Gray pyramid, and spire
And tower, are nought to thee—thy chosen home
Is with the stirring elements, whose strife
Nerves thy tempestuous wing with an exulting life.

Even thus would I, apart
From life's vain follies and ambitions, dwell,
Keeping my youthful heart
Serenely gay mid passion's stormy swell,
By hope attended and to virtue wed,
While harmless round my feet temptation's billows spread.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE UNHAPPY HUSBAND, OR FEAR OF CENSURE.

It is a fear which should not always be the master.

Young Mr. Hamden was a great admirer of beauty. He went to Florida, and it was there that he first saw his future wife. He was wandering through the streets of St. Augustine upon one of those pleasant excursions of discovery which can only be made where there is novelty of location.

"She is not of this earth," cried he; "who would have thought my dreams of beauty should ever have proved true?"

He found out her parents. He was rich. What can't money do? He was intelligent, and good, and handsome—and what will not intelligence, and goodness, and beauty do? It was such a pretty name too, Mary Stuart. I doubt her namesake being prettier.

"She has a weak constitution," said her father; "I will tell you plainly." But her lover mused on her charms with such enthusiasm—and he thought of his friends at home. "What taste he has shown in selection," one will say. "She is the perfection of the art," another. "Nothing more beautiful was ever made," my friendly reader, you would have said had you seen his beautiful possession. You can see her now; but could you have seen her then! She would have made you mad.

"She is weak in constitution," said the father. "I'll love her the more," said the lover; "and she must be mine." So she was made his—by legal transfer.

He resolved to spend his life where he at first had seen his wife. "I'll keep her here, and keep her out of danger—where there is no society, and no temptation to the risk of health. She cannot bear the rude storms of the north; nature has made her for a mild sky, and only for her gardens of the south." But ere long, ambition seized the prudent gentleman. "She might as well not be, as be for ever hid," said he; "as well not own, as have the ownership unknown. I'll take her home—there's not one in the nation like her. She'll be a belle as yet has never been." To wish his wife to be a belle!—poor fool and madman!—he had such pleasure on the voyage—visions of glory from his beautiful cargo.

His friends were delighted with his wife—each one had a particular plan for strengthening her constitution. "Poor Mrs. Hamden will ruin her health by confinement, and taking too much care of herself—she should be inured to exposure," said they. Mr. Hamden had what is called a yielding disposition, so he let her go. They took a row upon a moon-light night—the boat upset, and they managed to dip her in the river. There was a sudden check of perspiration, and she was seized with a violent bilious fever. Her husband watched like a maniac her still and emaciated form. "She does not breathe," thought he, in the anguish of despair. "She does," cried he, with his eyes full of tears of ecstasy. Persuasive spirit made her spirit stay—in a month she could walk on the piazza.

He raved at his particular friends, and swore she should not stay another day—and he left her where she was. If he took her away, he thought they would say "we meant no harm—it was an accident—it might have happened to any body—what folly." So in these lions' paws he left his lamb, and smiled and was wretched.

For some time after this sickness and sorrow, they were silent on the subject of their theories, but ere long their insanity returned. "What a pity it is Mrs. Hamden doesn't take more exercise," said they. "Her constitution should be strengthened by strengthening her nerves," said a wise little gentleman, their oracle and leader. So they one day gave her a gun, and it knocked her down; it had been over-loaded. "I'll take her away this instant," said Mr. Hamden in hurried fury, when he heard of the accident—but, before the parting preparations were concluded, his rage and resolution had almost evaporated. "This time I will leave her," said he; "but if you try such an experiment again, you shall never more see her while you live. I leave her with you now, but solely for the sake of old acquaintance." Thus anger ended in breath, which is as bad as smoke. It is strange how much mere utterance weakens passion.

Hamden was obliged for a few days to be absent. He was returning and so near that he could see the house. How hope and fear now varied his expression! Fear fixed it though at last. He might by distance be deceived, but he thought he saw a female form to all appearance lifeless on the ground. "Is it reality," thought he, "or some illusion of the brain my fears have conjured to torment me with?" He felt almost sick with apprehension. He looked steadfastly again, but was still at some short distance; he approached more near—with eyes unmoved he gazed—it was the colour of her dress. Could it be? His heart beat faster, and his cheek grew paler. "Spare me, O heaven," he cried in agony. There is a tone in the human voice would wake a savage into sympathy. "Who has done this?" he exclaimed, and the tears glistened in his eyes. "I saw her dragged," said a voice, "by the stirrups through the dust bleeding and senseless. I stopped the horse at length, but I fear too late." From her temple to her mouth was a deep, disfiguring gash, and the blood oozed down her cold cheek, and clothed her glossy hair. He watched her form, but it stirred not—he wept like a child. "Wake, Mary, into life again!" he exclaimed, as he kissed her pale lips, and took her senseless body in his arms, and pressed her to his heart. "I shall not leave thee, love, again; no power on earth shall part us; thou never canst be as thou wert, but I will love thee still, blest being!" He looked at the wound. "I never again shall hear thy rare perfections praised, or see men's envy that I called thee mine. But they will pity that thy beauty's gone, and stab me with the daggers of my memory." "I will cure her," said a doctor. "You can't," said he. "But still," he thought, "the doctor is ingenious and skilled. He is my friend, and knows, too, what it is to see one's soaring hopes thus by one rude blow, fluttering on the earth; and I have heard there are appliances to cure." He looked upon the torn flesh. "He may at least alleviate deformity—will you take her under your care? She never will be as she has been," said he. "We can't say," said the doctor.

While the lady was under the care of the Æsculapius, the gentleman was obliged to be absent. He was informed on his return he could scarce perceive the scar. He did not believe it. She was sleeping on the sofa. He gazed anxiously, and approached in painful agitation. "As beautiful as ever, by heaven!" cried he in an ecstasy—and he kissed his lady, and then he was inclined to kiss the doctor. And long he lived to hold her as his pride and love; but not to let her go back to his particular friends, though he was often censured for his foolish fears. B.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE ADVANTAGES OF EXERCISE.

MR. EDITOR—In looking over the last volume of your unrivalled periodical, I observe that a writer who signs himself C. has attacked, with no ordinary wit, the habit of early rising. The productions of this author are eminently pleasing and full of humour. They discover a singular talent both for the pathetic and ludicrous, which cannot fail to elevate him to a rank among the best writers this country has ever produced. His satire is strong and keen, and will probably enlist a great number upon his side, whether right or wrong, for the lessons of wisdom are stale and hackneyed, and have lost all the attraction of novelty, while the essays which oppose received opinions, arrest attention, and with the aid of talent, enchain the mind and bribe the understanding. C. therefore should be careful to level his shafts only at the foes of social life. Satire is a powerful weapon in the possession of a good writer, and should scarcely be wielded even in sport against pure and beautiful things. It has been said with truth that there is only a step between the sublime and the ridiculous. I have seen a clever actor in a farce convulse the audience with laughter, by flinging himself into the attitude of a tragedian, who in the play had awakened all the tenderest and noblest feelings of the soul; all high sentiments and elevated characters may be turned into ridicule with the same dangerous facility. The sweetest poetry, by being linked with some accidental association of a ludicrous nature, becomes the theme of mirth; and the softest emotions, the most delicate enjoyments, the purest habits and views of life, being entertained but by few, have the majority against them, who are gratified at an opportunity of degrading them to their own level. I am sure the essays of C. betray the existence of opinions differing materially from those which he has expressed, and I hope hereafter to find him attacking only those habits and opinions which he should like to see abolished. He cannot be serious in the wish to put out of countenance the healthy exercise of the morning. Laying aside the authority of all poets, from whose decision upon practicable points C. would probably appeal, I would refer him, if not to his own experience, to his own observation. Exercise is necessary for the health and spirits. The connexion between mind and body is known to all who, after a long and tedious sedentary occupation, have started forth into the fresh scented air, breaking away from the restraints upon the freedom of the thoughts as well as the physical system, and felt the glowing and thrilling impulses starting through the system, and the spirits yielding to their exhilarating influence. Without exercise a languid weariness benumbs the mental as well as the bodily powers. They lose their agreeable changes, their light elasticity, and resemble the "green mantle of the standing pool." We are so constructed by bountiful nature, that were we not to interfere with her plans, we should in a great measure be strangers to disease, and the ordinary action of our minds and bodies would be pleasure. The breathed air would be sweet, the flowing of the blood would produce an agreeable sensation, and all the functions of life would become the uninterrupted sources of joy. Exercise is one of the methods by which nature intended we should preserve ourselves in this state. Instinct teaches it to the brute creation. The bird flutters among the branches with irrepressible animation; the deer bounds through the forest with the velocity of the wind, in obedience to the stirring principles of his own bosom; and the silver fish darts through the yielding water in the very wantonness of joy. It seems to have been the design of Providence that all things should be thus ever in motion. The clouds roll their light images through the sky like animals, the winds are restless, and the oceans preserve their purity by being in perpetual agitation. The infant, before its reason is sufficiently matured to teach it the proper means of prolonging and sweetening life, is under the same influence; it flings its little arms about, and strives with unceasing gestures, without which it would wither up into feebleness or death. So the child is often rebuked for restlessness, and hears rung in his ears the impatient admonition, "Sit still," by those who forget that he is unconsciously acting in obedience to the wise intention of nature. Only a few living creatures seem careless of this delightful recreation. I have heard that toads live several thousand years locked in the bosom of solid marble, but they may be numbered with the dead, as there is probably no operation in the functions of their bodies. Oysters, snails, and sloths, endure a dark and contracted existence, not much removed from inert matter; and crabs appear on land to move with as little speed as grace; but those accustomed to the water may have occasionally observed this latter gentleman making his way beneath the wave with a velocity that might put the swiftness of many a pedestrian to shame.

That exercise is of the highest importance to health, will therefore be deemed a truism; but at what period it should be taken, and in what form and manner, have sometimes been the subject of debate. The fashionable ride, or walk a little on pleasant days, or spend the evenings in dancing. Riding is better for invalids; persons in full health may find it an agreeable amusement, but scarcely a substitute for more powerful exercise. Dancing also is an amusement both innocent and delightful, and I could never perceive any grounds for the objections urged against it; but upon the health I should suppose it excited but a slight influence. The confinement of crowded, heated rooms, the pernicious dainties which are so freely taken, the late hours to which it leads, are prejudicial both to health and cheerfulness; and she who has participated for some time in these fashionable and delightful dissipations, and has driven home beneath the midnight stars to a pillow which she will not abandon till the precious hours of the morning have all glided away, may mark the rosy freshness of real health slowly departing from her face, and its joyousness more easily repressed in her heart. Men in business too, who keep late hours, have their time of exercise much curtailed. They are probably engaged during the greater portion of the day in pursuits which they imagine of too much immediate importance to be neglected for the vague and remote advantages of exercise. They estimate its value by the money it will bring. At the end of the week they turn over the leaves of their cash-books and ledgers, to see what they have gained or lost, and excluding every thing from their calculations but pecuniary profits, they overlook the sweet blessing of pure health and refined elastic spirits. If the twinge of some demon disease, which has been gradually breathing its silent poison through their veins, warns them of danger, they take a half hour's exercise so violent that to one so unaccustomed to it, is worse than none; or perhaps once a fortnight get upon the back of some Rozinante, and seek to unravel in an hour's leisure all the webs of sickness and selfishness which weeks of paralyzing and narrow confinement have woven around them.

To be useful, exercise must be moderate, uniform, regular, in the open air, and when the mind is free. Few engaged in business can spare sufficient time for this during the day; the air of the evening is proverbially unhealthy. It is in the morning, therefore, that this habit should be practised, and physicians seem generally to agree that walking produces the most beneficial effects; it strengthens the body, and affords opportunity for reflections which, grave or gay, all should regularly practise. The time, therefore, is not wasted, not even in regard to mental improvement; for he who acts or reads without setting apart certain times for meditation, will derive comparatively trifling benefit from either. The mind too is a machine of such wonderful organization, so expanded, that it widens over seas, nations, and spreads out through infinite space, yet so capable of contraction, that it may be condensed to the smallest point; so energetic and violent, that its agitations break down the health, and yet so exquisitely delicate as to be acted upon by the minutest light and shade of passing events. This creation of Providence was never meant to dwindle down into the warped shape and debased uses to which uninterrupted earthly pursuits and sensual gratifications would degrade it; but it should be sometimes loosened from mercenary considerations. It is full of hidden springs, of secret capacities and powers; and even the ramble of an hour through an agreeable landscape touches these with life, reveals new properties of feeling and fancy, opens concealed fountains whose inundations refresh the soil of the most sterile heart, and call forth the verdure of virtue and affection—and what time for this like the morning? You are then neglecting no duty. It is a kind of time which you create for yourself out of the chaos of unprofitable sleep. ☉

AUTUMN WINDS.

BY ISIDORA.

Wandering wind, whence comest thou?
Not from the sweet south isles;
Thou art chill upon my brow,
And thy murmurings, deep and low,
Banish nature's smiles.

Hast thou passed o'er ocean's breast,
Harbinger of ill?

Lulling the sea-boy to his rest,
Who his rugged pillow preest,
Reckless, fearless still!

Hast thou passed the cold dark bed,
Where the lost ones rest?
Waving the tall grass o'er their head,
Whispering of the things which shed
Sadness o'er my breast.

Thou hast seared the bright green leaves,
And strewn them on the earth;
Their fall a painful moral weaves—
Thus some chilling frost bereaves
All of mortal birth.

Wandering wind, thy voice I hear,
Like some remembered tone,
Whispering low, of grief and fear,
Deep regret, the streaming tear,
And chillness like thine own!

LITERARY NOTICES.

WIRT'S ORATION AT THE FRENCH FESTIVALS IN BALTIMORE.—Like every other production of this popular orator and writer, this last effort of his powerful mind has delighted and instructed us. It is replete with a deep and abiding love of liberty and the independence of the people—a lofty sense of political right and wrong, and an enthusiastic attachment for the land which assisted us in our revolutionary struggle—the land of Lafayette. It will be read with universal pleasure by all who regard with sympathy the noble efforts made by the French to recover their long lost freedom, and may serve as a useful model for other compositions which may still be required on the same inspiring theme. The style of Mr. Wirt is free from many of those affectations which deface the composition of far more ambitious but less successful writers—yet it is highly polished, and never sacrifices the sense to the sound. We shall recur to this latter subject of his style in a future number, when other former compositions of his shall be brought at the same time under review, from which a more just and comprehensive estimate may be formed of his powers and qualifications.

FAMILY LIBRARY.—The tenth number of this popular work has just been published by the untiring Harpers. "The Life of Mohammed," to which the present volume is devoted, is a history of no common value. The successive steps by which the artful Arabian impostor arrived at the height of power—the beauty of the language contained in his Koran, from which by way of illustration, copious extracts are made, and more than all, the intimate connexion which exists between the prophecies of the Bible and the career of the great founder of Mohammedanism, render this production extremely interesting.

THE MUSSULMAN.—Mr. Madden, whose travels in Turkey made so deep an impression on the public mind, has put forth a novel under the above title. To its recommendation from the talents of the author, and his perfect knowledge of the scenery and locality about which it treats, it adds the charms of interesting and characteristic incidents, and a plausible and well-developed plot. It is from the press of those judicious and select literary caterers, Carey and Lea.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MISS ROCK'S BENEFIT—MR. THORNE'S FIRST APPEARANCE.

A VERY fashionable and numerous audience attended the representation of the "Devil's Bridge" on Monday evening, when Mr. Thorne, from Drury lane and the English Opera house, London, made his first appearance in America. In England, this gentleman has been much praised as a singer of buffo music, and for the last six years he has held a prominent situation as a vocalist. His voice is a baritone, of good quality and much sweetness, and his execution of light bass songs is said to be excellent. We were therefore greatly astonished at his selection of Count Belino as an opening part; all his powers being in the lower notes of the tenor, and the upper ones of the bass, he could not possibly have made a more unhappy choice. Either Figaro, Artaban, Casper, the Caliph of Bagdad, or any similar character, would have been far more appropriate, and have secured, or we are much mistaken, a greater share of the public approbation. As an actor, Mr. Thorne, is inferior to Phillips, but better than Horn. We understand that the determination to fill those parts in opera which are now vacant, and some of which we have enumerated, has induced the manager to engage Mr. Thorne, and a consideration for the great undertaking of doing justice to the opera of Cinderella has been an additional incitement. Mr. Thorne, we are happy to add, bears the best testimonials, and has been universally received in the first private musical societies in the cities of London, Bath and Edinburgh; in the latter place he is a universal favourite. Mrs. Austin (Claudine) was the most brilliant star of the evening. This lady is increasing in knowledge of the stage; we never heard her sing better; she is clearly far beyond any competition in this country. Mrs. Sharpe was received with enthusiasm, and performed the Countess Rosalvina in her best style. We liked her ballad, however, a good deal better than her bravura. A contra alto voice is not qualified for brilliant passages. Miss Rock acted a young lady, whom we believe they called Lauretta, with grace and spirit. In many parts of opera we think this sprightly and interesting actress would be an acquisition. We hope to see her frequently at the Park. The band were attentive and did their duty.

MR. C. KEAN.

After a successful engagement at the ~~seaside~~, Mr. C. Kean has returned to this city, and performs three nights at the Park theatre, previous to his departure for Boston. There is an originality of conception, a boldness of delineation, and a chasteness of style in the representations of this young tragedian, which have secured him a high reputation with the public of New-York. Those who have not witnessed his Hamlet can form no idea of Mr. K.'s extraordinary powers. It is one of the most beautiful, tranquil, and natural portraits ever exhibited on the American stage.

MASTER BURKE.

This infant Roscius, who has won such golden opinions wherever he has appeared, left Liverpool for this port on the sixteenth ultimo. In looking over our late literary files, we met the following notice respecting him, which we subjoin. "We have a very small portion of taste for precocious talent; we do not like prodigies; nor do we profess to admire infant Richards and Othellos, however extraordinary they may be. We felt, however, that, in justice to Master Burke, who has been for some time performing at the Surrey theatre, and who has proved to be the best substitute for Mr. Elliston that could be conveniently found—we felt, from a recollection which we entertained of his performances at the Haymarket four years ago, that he ought not to be suffered to take his departure for America, whither he is now going, without extorting from us the compliment of a farewell visit. Glad are we that we did so; for we have seldom experienced more unmixed gratification than his performances afforded us. Little Burke's talent is quite distinct from the pretensions of most of the juvenile wonders that we recollect—there is so much less of art, and so much more of nature in him. There is a mental maturity in his conceptions, which is very curiously, and in comedy especially, most laughably, contrasted with his personal insignificance. What his age may be we can scarcely guess, but his body does not appear to have kept pace with his mind. His musical talents are extraordinary; he leads the band with admirable nerve and precision—and looks like our little acquaintance, Tom Thumb, controlling giants. We trust that his American career may be prosperous, and that he may return to us increased in size, and (what is always to be feared in these cases) not decreased in attraction."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE BEGGAR AND THE BIRDS.

"WHAT a miserable world is this!" exclaimed Karoun, the beggar, as he sat one day at the gates of the city of Bagdad, "were I to make it over again, I would exceedingly mend it! My world should contain no kings and certainly no cadis—every one should do that which was right in his own eyes—it should be possible to get money without working for it—and knowledge without learning. Allah! what a miserable world is this. Of what use are the tribes of children, forever interrupting one with their noisy play? Without doubt we should be rid of some thousands—and their mothers: why are women such tender delicate creatures? In my world they should be as strong as horses, and dig and plant, and go to battle like their husband. Then, with regard to gold and silver and precious stones, there should be plenty for every one, or else none at all—and the same of palaces, fine horses, and rich clothes. As to diseases and misfortunes, I would abolish them altogether, just as I would do away with poisons, precipices, storms, earthquakes, and whatever else tends to shorten life. Oh, what a beautiful world I could make of this! I feel inclined however, for a nap at present, so I will remove to yonder grove for the benefit of the shade.

The self-complacent beggar accordingly stretched himself beneath a large plane tree, and presently fell into a sound slumber, in which slumber he was visited with the following dream. He fancied himself where he was lying under a plane tree; but he also imagined he heard an extraordinary noise among the branches. On lifting up his eyes to discover the cause, he found the tree filled with all manner of birds, screaming, singing, whistling, and chattering. They were more vociferous than all the beggars of Bagdad, and grievously annoyed our friend Karoun.

By and by the tree became quiet; the birds ranged themselves on the boughs in companies, according to their kind; and the beggar discovered that it was a parliament of birds, met to deliberate on the state of the feathered world.

The golden eagle sat aloft in silent majesty, and a venerable horned owl opened the business of the meeting by entreating the members to conduct the debate with decorum, and bear in mind that wisdom was never confined to birds of one generation. He was followed by a superb red and green parrot, who scratched his head and spoke as follows: "I conceive that for many ages birds have been grossly used by man, and I hail the meeting of the present assembly that the rights and privileges of all who have claws and beaks are about to be better understood. I do not speak for myself. My fate makes me the associate of man, and the favourite of ladies. I am fed with dainties, and observe all that passes in dining and drawing rooms. For myself I have little reason to complain. I speak as a patriot—why should not all birds have the privileges of parrots? Is it not gross partiality that we alone should have gilt cages?"

The speaker ceased amid tremendous applause. The crow spoke next. "I agree with the parrot," said he, "in blaming nature, but I disagree with him as to his mode of charging her with injustice. The evil lies deeper. There ought to be no gilt cages, no fine plumage, no sweet voices among us. Why is one kind of bird to be exalted over another? and yet this will ever be the case while these vain and useless distinctions remain in force. Why am I to serve the farmer, by clearing his fields of grubs and worms, and be considered a low-lived bird, only because I am useful? while the nightingale must be admired because she—sings. Why does not man write poetry about me? What is the nightingale but a bird like myself? is not she?"

Here he was called to order, and a beautiful dove spoke next. "I do not complain," said she, "of what the preceding orators have complained. My regret is, that distinction does not make amends for conscious weakness. What signify my delicate plumage and tender note, while I want the eagle's wing and hawk's eye?"

Here the owl attempted to speak, but was prevented by a magpie. "My case," said the chatterer, "is harder still. My plumage is beautiful, but no one will own it; I talk, but no one will listen to me. I am a persecuted bird—an envied bird."

Here the magpie was interrupted by a sparrow. "Why am I to be shot for a dumpling any more than the red-breast?"

"And why," said the lark, "am I to be roasted, any more than the nightingale?"

"Why are we to be preyed upon by kites and hawks?"

"All the birds in a chorus."

"Let us rebel," said the tom.

"Let us be kites and hawks ourselves," said the jenny wrens.

"Let us leave man to pick up his own caterpillars," said the sparrows; "the world will come to an end without us."

"It will! it will!" screamed all the little birds.

At this point of the dream and debate, Karoun fancied he thus addressed the congress of birds:

"With the exception of the eagle and owl, who, to do them justice, are sensible, well-behaved bipeds, you are a set, of insolent, foolish, half-witted creatures, not worthy of wearing feathers. Listen now to reason; and since birds cannot blush, hide your heads under your wings for shame. In the first place, Mr. Parrot, if every bird is to live in a gilt cage and hang up in a drawing room, pray where is man to live himself? In the second place, I ask Mr. Crow whether he clears the farmer's fields of worms from love to the farmer or the desire of a good meal? Thirdly, if any of you, after a reasonable enjoyment of life, object to being killed to feed man, why, I ask, may not the grubs and flies also object to being killed to feed you? Fourthly, if you were all of one kind—all eagles, or all kites—would there not be ten times more fighting among you than there now is? And what, I demand, must you live upon? Fifthly, if you object to dying altogether, and yet treble your numbers every year, how is the world to hold you all. And as for you, sparrows, chaffinches, larks, wrens, &c. who is it that steals man's corn, eats his cherries, and picks his peas? Little mischievous varlets as you are, your lives are forfeited fifty times before they are taken! Lastly, I entreat you all, from the eagle down to the tom, to look away from your own individual interest to the interest of that world of which you form so small a portion. I do assure you it is infinitely better on the whole that you should differ from each other just as you do—that some should be strong, some weak, some beautiful, some ugly; some wear fine coats, some plain ones. Now begone, every one of you—and instead of wishing to amend nature, try to mend your own manners."

In a few minutes all was silent. It was now Karoun's turn to be reproved. He dreamed that a tall figure stood by his side, and said in a stern voice—

"Presumptuous mortal! thou hast had no patience with the folly of the birds, yet thine own is far greater. Thou mend the world! Thy mending would be destruction. Were there no disease and no misfortune, how could man exercise the virtues which fit him for paradise? As to death, is it not a blessing to the virtuous? And if thou art wicked, is it not thine own fault? If all possessed riches, who must work? And if no one had riches, who must pay for that work? If every one was wise, who must learn? And if every one were ignorant, who must teach? Thou thinkest the world would be happier if there were no laws or rulers—no such thing! Where there are two battles there would be twenty; where there are five robberies there would be fifty; and for one lazy, discontented vagabond, like thyself, there would be a thousand. Go about thy business, Karoun! and instead of wishing to mend the world, try to mend thine own manners."

This dream made Karoun a wiser man. He gave up being a beggar, and hiring himself to a fisherman, he became a contented and a respectable member of society. Foreign Magazine.

THE MYSTERIOUS FOUNDLING OF NUREMBERG.

The following particulars respecting Gaspard Hauser, the Nuremberg youth, appear in the Nouvelle Revue Germanique, and are said to have been furnished by M. Hitzig, the editor of the Annales de la Justice Criminelle. Many circumstances combine to strengthen the belief that young Hauser is connected with a distinguished family, and that when a child he received the commencement of a classical education. He recollects among other things the two first verses of the ode of Horace, beginning with Diffugere Nives. The journals have mentioned a dame Bonval or Valbon, residing at Pesh, in Hungary, who, they suspect, has some knowledge of Hauser's birth. M. de Pirch, who understands a little of the Hungarian language, determined on uttering a few words of it to him, in order that he might see whether he retained any recollection of it. He found Hauser engaged in writing a Latin theme. He is a well made youth, robust, although of small stature. He has fair hair, curling naturally, a very fair complexion, an aquiline nose, and blue and pensive eyes. I rarely, said M. de Pirch, saw a countenance change so rapidly its expression of the most lively satisfaction and of confidence to the most profound meditation. I addressed some questions to him respecting his studies; I asked him whether he had as yet learned arithmetic, and then, as if by chance, I pronounced the Hungarian words, "Ody, kalda, harom," (one, two, three.) He instantly fell into a deep reverie. I was continuing to speak, but his guardian told me that when in this state Hauser understood nothing. At length, after some minutes, he raised his head and said to me, "I have before heard these words, will you repeat some of them again?" I introduced among others the word saz, (one hundred.) "Oh, that is a great number," said he, and began to reflect. I next uttered, but in a careless tone, the Hungarian oath, Baamanateremlete. He trembled, and in great terror said, "That's the word which the man spoke during the voyage, every time he struck me. It is a villainous word, and ought not to be uttered."

When M. de Pirch used, as it were accidentally, the Polish word Matka, (mother,) the countenance of Gaspard brightened up—"It is mother," exclaimed this wretched orphan, with the most animated expression. He was similarly affected by the Hungarian word signifying father; and when M. de Pirch said to him, in the same language, "Come, my dear—come, my child," Gaspard remembered that it was thus he was spoken to by his female servant, of whom, until this conversation with M. de Pirch, he had lost the recollection.

His present guardian, Counsellor Biberrach, treats him as his son, and since the late attempt made on him two armed persons are stationed in the anti-chamber, and one accompanies him wherever he goes abroad. Walking fatigues him, but he rides admirably. His sense of smelling, and more particularly during the first year that he was at Nuremberg, was more acute than is ever found in human beings. For a long time he had no idea of distances, and would reach out his hands to touch objects which were very far removed from him. His smelling, however, was remarkably acute. One day he was suddenly seized with pain, perspiration flowed from his forehead, and he trembled in every limb. The cause was soon discovered; it was a dead mouse that lay at some distance from him. On another day, when approaching a cemetery, he was sensibly affected by the smell, although at such a distance that it must have been imperceptible to ordinary men. Polish words strike him as forcibly as certain Hungarian expressions. He immediately understood moy kochany, (my dear.) The writer of this notice earnestly hopes that the magistrates of Nuremberg, who have so generously adopted this youth, will exert themselves to remove the veil which covers his earlier history. A ROYAL DILEMMA.

Previously to his elevation to the sovereignty Jerome Buona parte led a life of dissipation, at Paris, and was much in the habit of frequenting the theatres and other public places of amusement. He had formed an intimacy with some young authors at that time in vogue for their wit and reckless gaiety. On the evening after his nomination to the crown of Westphalia he met two of his jovial companions just as he was leaving the theatre. "My dear fellows," said he, "I am delighted to see you: I suppose you know that I have been created king of Westphalia?" "Yes, sire, and permit us to be among the first to—" "Eh! what! you are ceremonious methinks; that might pass were I surrounded by my court, but, at present, away with form, and let's have the same friendship, the same free and easy gaiety as before; and now let's be off to supper." Jerome, upon this, took his friends to one of the best restaurants in the Palais Royal. The trio chatted and laughed, and said and did a thousand of those foolish things which, when unpremeditated, are so delightful. Conversation, it may be supposed, was not kept up without drinking. When the wine began to take effect, "My good friends," said Jerome, "why should we quit each other? If you approve of my proposal, you shall accompany me. You C. shall be my secretary; as for you, P., who are fond of books, I appoint you my librarian." The arrangement was accepted, and instantly ratified over a fresh bottle of champagne. At last the party began to think of retiring, and called for the bill. Jerome produced his purse; but the king of Westphalia, whose royal treasury had not as yet been established on a regular footing, could find only two louis, which formed but a small portion of two hundred francs, the amount of the restaurateur's demand. The new dignities, by clubbing their worldly wealth, could muster about three francs. What was to be done? At one o'clock in the morning, where could resources be found? It was, at last, deemed expedient to send for the master of the house, and to acquaint him how matters stood. He seemed to take the frolic in good part, and merely requested to know the names of the gentlemen who had done him the honour to sup at his house. "I am secretary to the king of Westphalia," "And I librarian to his majesty." "Excellent!" cried the restaurateur, who now set his customers down for sharpers; "and that noodle yonder is no doubt the king of Westphalia himself?" "Precisely," said Jerome, "I am the king of Westphalia." "Gentlemen, you are pleased to be facetious, but we shall see presently how the commissary of police will relish the joke." "For heaven's sake!" exclaimed Jerome, who began to dislike the aspect of the affair, "make no noise: since you doubt us, I leave you my watch, which is worth ten times the amount of your bill;" at the same time giving the host a magnificent watch, which had been a present from Napoleon. A KIND OF CALEB QUOTEM.

Fox, the Brighton manager, was a very odd character. He was a kind of Caleb Quotem in real life. He could combine twenty occupations without being clever in one; a pretty general characteristic of country managers in those days. He was actor, fiddler, painter, machinist, and taylor, besides check taker and bill sticker, on occasions. He prided himself more especially on his talents as a painter. He had executed all his own scenery, (as he executed all his own characters) and accomplished in person the embellishments of the house. Sheridan was down at Brighton one summer, and Fox, desirous of showing him some civility, took him all over the theatre, and exhibited its beauties. "There, Mr. Sheridan," said he, "I constructed this stage—I built and painted those boxes, and I painted all these scenes." "Did you?" said Sheridan, surveying them rapidly; "well, I should not have known you were a Fox by your brush." Bernard.

TITLES OF THE EAST.

The following list of names and titles frequently occurring in connexion with the affairs of the east, together with their etymological import, will not be deemed uninteresting at the present time.

Mohammed, Ahmed—From Hamad; praised, highly celebrated, illustrious, glorious.

Moslem, Musulman, Islam, Islamism—All from the same root, Aslam; signifying to yield up, dedicate, consecrate entirely to the service of religion.

Koran—From Kara, to read; the reading, legend, or that which ought to be read.

Caliph—A successor; from the Hebrew Chalaph; to be changed, to succeed, to pass round in a revolution.

Sultan—Originally from the Chaldaic Soltan; signifying authority, dominion, principality.

Vizier—An assistant.

Hadj—Pilgrimage; Hadji, one who makes the pilgrimage to Mecca.

Saracen—Etymology doubtful; supposed to be from Sarak, to steal; a plunderer, a robber.

Hejira, or Hejra—The Flight; applied emphatically to Mohammed's flight from Mecca to Medina.

Mufti—The principal head of the Mahomedan religion, and the resolver of all doubtful points of the law. An officer of great dignity in the Turkish empire.

Iuam—A kind of priest attached to the mosque, whose duty it is occasionally to expound a passage of the koran. They, at the same time, usually follow some more lucrative employment.

Moollah—The Moollahs form what is called the Ulema, or body of doctors in theology and jurisprudence, who are entrusted with the guardianship of the laws of the empire, and from whose number the mufti is chosen.

Emir—Lineal descendants of the prophet himself, distinguished by wearing turbans of deep sea-green, the colour peculiar to all the race of Mohammed. They have special immunities on the score of their descent, and one of them carries the green standard of the prophet when the grand seignior appears in any public solemnity.

Pasha—The title given to the provincial governors. A pasha is to a province or pashalic, what the sultan is to the empire, except that the judicial power is in the hands of the cadis, the provincial magistrates. The tails of a pasha are the standards which he is allowed to carry; one of three tails is one of three standards, which number gives the power of life and death.

Reis Effendi—This officer may be termed the high chancellor of the Ottoman empire. He is at the head of a class of attorneys which at this time contains the best informed men of the nation.

Seraglio—This word is derived from Serat, a term of Persian origin, signifying a palace. It is therefore improperly used as synonymous with harem, the apartments of the women. The seraglio is, in strictness of speech, the place where the court of the grand seignior is held; but it so happens that at Constantinople this building includes the imperial harem within its walls.

Crescent—The national ensign of the Turks, surmounting the domes and minarets attached to their mosques, as the cross does the churches of the Roman catholics in christian countries. This peculiar and universal use of the crescent is said to have owed its origin to the fact, that at the time of Mohammed's flight from Mecca to Medina the moon was new. Hence the half moon is commemorative of that event.

Sublime Porte—This title, which is frequently applied to the court, cabinet, or executive department of the Ottoman empire, is derived, as the words import, from a lofty arched gateway of splendid construction, forming the principal entrance to the seraglio, or palace. It is a phrase equivalent to "Court of St. James," "Court of St. Cloud," &c.

SHAKESPEARE AND BYRON.

That Byron wrote best when he wrote of himself and of his own, has probably been already made sufficiently apparent. In this respect he stands alone and apart from all other poets, and this peculiarity extended much further over all his works, than merely to those which may be said to have required him to be thus personal. The great distinction, indeed, of his merit consists in that singularity. Shakespeare, in drawing the materials of his dramas from tales and history, has, with wonderful art, given from his own invention and imagination the fittest and most appropriate sentiments and language; and admiration at the perfection with which he has accomplished this, can never be exhausted. The difference between Byron and Shakespeare consists in the curious accident, if it may be so called, by which the former was placed in circumstances which taught him to feel in himself the very sentiments that he has ascribed to his characters. Shakespeare created the feelings of his, and with such excellence, that they are not only probable to the situations, but give to the personifications the individuality of living persons. Byron's are scarcely less so; but with him there was no invention, only experience, and when he attempts to express more than he has himself known, he is always comparatively feeble. Galt.

MRS. FITZHERBERT.

This lady was so deeply affected when informed of his late majesty's death, that she has ever since been confined to her chamber, very seriously ill; and from her advanced age and consequent infirmities, her recovery is considered doubtful. Her maiden name was Smith; her father, a Roman Catholic gentleman, of an ancient and respectable family; and previously to her connexion with the prince she had been twice married; on the first occasion, when only fifteen years of age, to Mr. Weld, the proprietor of Lutworth-castle (the place assigned to the ex-king, Charles the tenth, as a residence,) who died without issue in less than a year after marriage, and his estates passed to his brother Thomas, father of Dr. Weld, whom the pope has lately invested with the dignity of cardinal. The lady was again married before she had reached her twentieth year, to Mr. Fitzherbert; but in little more than three years she was again a widow, and remained single until the period when the heir apparent to the crown saw and was fascinated by her charms, then ripened into maturity, and they were privately married, according to the forms both of the Protestant and Catholic church. The Roman Catholic priest who married them consulted his safety by quitting England immediately afterwards, and he was well provided for in another country. A separation, induced by prudential considerations, afterwards took place; but there seems, notwithstanding, to have been a strong mutual attachment; and after the prince's unhappy marriage with, and separation from, the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, the connexion was renewed. The lady has for many years lived in comparative retirement; she had an allowance of six thousand pounds a year from the king, the continuance of which has been secured to her upon his majesty's death. She has been on terms of intimacy with most of the other members of the royal family, both male and female, and has received from them visits of condolence since the death of their royal brother. GENIUS.

Genius of every kind belongs to some innate temperament; it does not necessarily imply a particular bent, because that may possibly be the effect of circumstances; but without question, the peculiar quality is inborn, and particular to the individual. All hear and see much alike; but there is an indefinable though wide difference between the ear of a musician, or the eye of a painter, compared with the hearing and seeing organs of ordinary men; and it is in something like that difference in which genius consists. Genius is, however, an ingredient of mind, more easily described by its effects than by its qualities. It is as the fragrance, independent of the freshness and complexion of the rose; as the light on the cloud; as the bloom on the cheek of beauty, of which the possessor is unconscious until this charm has been seen by its influence on others; it is the internal golden flame of the opal; a something that may be extracted from the thing in which it appears, without changing the quality of its substance, its form, or its affinities. Galt's Byron.

A ROYAL FAVOURITE.

The favourite valet de chambre of the King of Spain died lately—of apoplexy, it is said, but rumour also assigns his death to his own hand, in a fit of vexation, in consequence of the following incident. The king and queen being engaged in a game of chess together, Ferdinand rose from the table for the purpose of quitting the room for a few minutes, and desired his favourite, Meras, who was present, to continue the game with her majesty. To this the queen objected in the most lively and pointed terms, referring to the offensive impropriety of a common "domestic" being placed on such terms of familiarity with the wife of his master; and she invited the Count de Transtamare (the only other person present) to continue the game in the absence of the king. Meras immediately retired, and was the next morning but one found dead. Literary Gazette.

POPE PIUS THE SIXTH.

He was any thing but a bigot, and had many amiable qualities. When he was a prisoner at Valence, orders were given to the military commander, Colonel M., of the most rigorous character. The colonel softened them down to the utmost of his power, short of positive neglect of duty and disobedience. Of this generous conduct the pope was duly sensible; but almost afraid of noticing it, lest he should commit his benefactor. The night before he died, however, he sent for this officer, and presenting him with a superb silver gilt cup (rescued from the papal treasury) he begged of him to accept it, as a memorial of the donor's gratitude and esteem. Colonel M., from whom I had the anecdote, felt a conscientious hesitation at accepting so valuable a present from his illustrious prisoner, and after expressing his thanks, declined it, on the plea of religion. "Perhaps your holiness," he said, "is not aware that you are making this valuable and almost consecrated present to a heretic. I am of the church of Geneva?" "What has that to do with it?" said the pope, with a flash of animation. Then after closing his heavy eyes, he added in a tone of exhaustion, but with solemnity, "are we not all the children of the same father?" Lady Morgan.

IVANHOE.

The following is from the preface to the new edition of Ivanhoe: "The name of Ivanhoe was suggested by an old rhyme. All novelists have had occasion, at some time or other, to wish, with Falstaff, that they knew where a commodity of good names was to be had. On such an occasion the author chanced to call to memory a rhyme recording three names of the manors forfeited by the ancestor of the celebrated Hampden, for striking the Black Prince a blow with his racket, when they quarrelled at tennis:—

'Tring, Wing, and Ivanhoe,
For striking of a blow,
Hampden did forego,
And glad he could escape so.'

The word suited the author's purpose in two material respects—for, first, it had an ancient English sound; and, secondly, it conveyed no indication whatever of the nature of the story. He presumes to hold this last quality to be of no small importance. What is called a taking title, serves the direct interest of the bookseller or publisher, who by this means sometimes sells an edition while it is yet passing the press. But if the author permits an over degree of attention to be drawn to his work ere it has appeared, he places himself in the embarrassing condition of having excited a degree of expectation which, if he proves unable to satisfy, is an error fatal to his literary reputation. Besides, when we meet such a title as the Gunpowder Plot, or any other connected with general history, each reader, before he has seen the book, has formed to himself some particular idea of the sort of manner in which the story is to be conducted, and the nature of the amusement which he is to derive from it. In this he is probably disappointed, and in that case may be naturally disposed to visit upon the author of the work the unpleasant feelings thus excited. In such a case, the literary adventurer is censured, not for having missed the mark at which he himself aimed, but for not having shot off his shaft in a direction he never thought of."

EXTRACT FROM ADOLPH,
AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.
BY ALPHA.

In heaven there's beauty when the sun appears,
Clothed in his royal garment, clouds of gold;
On earth there's beauty when their trembling tears
The flowers dry up, and all their hues unfold;
There's beauty where mid helmets, drums, and spears,
Proud England's lion-banner is unroll'd;
Or when her battle-canvas is unfurl'd,
Whether to punish or redeem a world.

There's beauty where the soaring bird of Jove,
Columbia's well-adopted type of power,
Spreads his protecting pinions broad above
The stars that dim the foe-man's fiery shower;
There's lasting beauty in the land we love,
Though its rude rocks refuse to nurse a flower;
There's beauty by the cot's sequester'd green,
Like virtue in the world, unprized—unseen.

There's beauty where the sounding timbrels swell,
Where hearts are beating and light feet advancing;
Where he who's cool, if such can be, may tell
The dazzling thoughts that in the eyes are glancing
From each delighted bosom's haunted cell,
And making every feature more entrancing—
But, oh! the moonlight solitude for me,
Upon the vast, deep, strong, but tranquil sea.

How solemn is the midnight world of waves,
So strongly calm, so shorelessly sublime,
With all its hidden wilderness of graves
Unformed—unflowered by the hand of time,
Which no fond heart with gushing sorrow laves,
And but the deep-mouth'd caves' terrific chime
In mockery mourns, and fearful monsters tread
To feast upon the forgotten dead.

Awake, awake! why waste the time in sleep?
O'er the volcanic waves the sun is blazing.
See how he, king-like, mounts the glorious steep,
And dims the sight from its familiar gazing.
And where the horizon's playful waters leap
Is many a ship her wings of white upraising.
Oh, what a morn! even as the Christian's creed,
Holy and glorious! God is great indeed!

And these are of his glory, love and power—
The sea that chain-like binds the thoughts of friends,
Even from the parting to the meeting hour,
From native home to earth's remotest ends;
All, all up from the meadow's humblest flower,
Or meanest stream that through the landscape tends,
To the big wave that lifts the winged steed;
All—all proclaim that God is great indeed!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE MARQUIS D'ARCONATI.

THE following sketch is from the manuscript journal of an English traveller.

In 1810 there lived in Brussels a very extraordinary individual, the Marquis d'Arconati. He belonged to an ancient and opulent Italian family, and possessed an income, it was believed, of eight thousand pounds a-year, a magnificent hotel in the Place Royale, and a large chateau a few miles from town. All the inhabitants were acquainted with the eccentric habits of this nobleman—some pronounced him to be a madman, others would have had him canonized as a saint. During six months of the year, commencing in May, his vast mansion was open to the public, and his weekly dejeuners were well attended; but, strange as it may appear, he was never present at them, but generally appointed some one, often a stranger, to superintend and to do the honours of these repasts. The house, from the cellar to the garret, was filled with curiosities of every description; valuable paintings, rare manuscripts, china vases, watches, clocks, snuff-boxes, and so great an abundance of children's toys made of ivory, ebony, or other precious woods, that the town of Nuremberg could not have exhibited a greater number. These he had collected during his travels in every part of Europe, at an expense, it was stated, of at least eighty thousand pounds. Here I was shown the identical pen with which St. Thomas Aquinas wrote all his works, consisting of twelve or fourteen folio volumes, not a bit the worse for use!—the same piece of cloth that St. Martin cut off his cloak to give to a poor man; it was very filthy in appearance, and hardly large enough to have concealed more than his shoulders; the veritable key of St. Hubert, the patron of sportsmen—the celebrated one in the Ardennes being a counterfeit; this key, when made red hot and pressed upon the occiput of any of the canine species, makes them howl terrifically, but effectually prevents them from ever being attacked by hydrophobia! The real left eye of our lady of Loretto—a superb diamond; as the conservators of the holy chapel stood in need of money, they sold the brilliant orb to the marquis, and introduced a glass one in its stead; but as notre dame stared with an obliquity of vision after this abstraction, the monks also sold the right eye to an English Jew, and now both eyes are glass ones.

During the six months, the household of the marquis consisted of about thirty domestics, most of whom were habited in the oriental costume; his stables frequently contained forty horses. Sometimes he was seen driving a curriole-and-six; at other times, a tandem with three horses at length was his fancy; again he would appear on an Arabian charger, dressed like a mameluke, accompanied by a dozen men in similar uniforms; upon his turban he wore a pearl, the largest I have ever seen, and estimated at ten thousand pounds; this, he said, had belonged to Thomas Kouli Khan. He used to calculate his expenses to so great a nicety, that at the expiration of the six months, exactly forty pounds remained in his banker's hands, and with this small sum he contrived to exist during the remaining part of the year! He was extremely charitable, and one-tenth of his income was set apart for benevolent purposes.

Mr. R., an English gentleman, who was on intimate terms with this extraordinary character, gave me a letter of introduction, which I presented on a Saturday, the thirty-first of October, the last day of his "appearing in public." The marquis bore a strong resemblance to those prints, said to be a likeness of the prince of fabulists, Æsop, the Phrygian; he spoke fluently several modern languages, and with the dead ones he seemed well acquainted, reading to me occasionally his manuscripts in Chaldaic, Syriac, and Persian. "To-morrow," said the marquis, "I intend to retire from the world—perhaps for ever, perhaps only for six months—if you have any wish to see my dwelling during that period, I will show it to you." He then carefully unlocked a ponderous door at the extremity of his apartments, and I found myself in a small chamber of the most gloomy description; every part was hung with black cloth, here and there embroidered with representations of death's heads; in the centre of the room was a superb coffin of large dimensions: "In this," said he, "I take my rest; in this, also, when the time comes, I am to be buried. My food during my retirement will be bread and water, and the whole of my time will be devoted to prayer, in order to atone for my transgressions during the six previous months." In one corner of the room was a small oratory; here were to be seen books of devotion, hair shirts, and sack-cloth, cat-o'-nine-tails, and a pail full of ashes. The little man's eyes seemed to beam with delight as he contemplated these signs of mortification and penance. I hastily took my leave of the Cenobite, wishing him every happiness during the period of his seclusion.

On reaching the Montagne de la Cour, I met Count de R. "I have just been paying a visit," said I, "to the Marquis d'Arconati; what is your opinion of this nobleman?" "My opinion is," replied the count, "that he is quite crazy, and ought to be sent forthwith to Charenton." Proceeding down the Rue de Madeleine, I accosted Madame la Chanoinesse de B—, a pious Irish dame, and telling her where I had been spending my morning, she exclaimed, "the Marquis is a saint—in verity a saint! and at his death this holy personage will be beatified by the Pope and his consistory."

OH! WHAT WERE EDEN'S RICHEST BLOOM.

"The world was sad, the garden was a wild,
And man, the hermit, sigh'd till woman smiled."

Oh! what were Eden's richest bloom,
Her crystal founts, her verdant trees,
Her golden fruits, her fragrant flowers,
Her perfumes sweetening every breeze:

Oh! what were they, and more than they,
Had they been pleasures but for one?
The cup of joy were worse than grief,
If to be drained by man alone!

This saw the heavenly Architect,
Who wisely framed the human mind;
And, as his crowning gift to man,
Gave woman, ever fair and kind.

Woman, whose slightest charms are those
Which fasten the enraptured eye,
Or steal upon the listening ear,
In melting tones of harmony!

For she it is who soothes his grief,
Partakes and doubles every bliss;
And calms each tempest of his breast,
By mingling her soft soul with his.

From pain and anguish and despair,
What can his wearied heart beguile
Beyond the reach of dread and gloom?
'Tis beauteous woman's angel smile.

When, in the rage of passion's storm,
Reason and conscience disappear,
What power below can stay him then?
'Tis lovely woman's falling tear.

When health and hope, united, chiant
Their roundelay of mingled joys,
What wakes a more melodious note?
'Tis sweetest woman's silvery voice.

What swells his soul, and overflows
With rapture's tear his swimming eye,
When true heart beats to heart as true?
'Tis yielding woman's gentle sigh.

What gives known joys increasing zest,
Creating always others new,
Exhaustless of the power to bless?
Sweet, lovely, yielding woman, you!

Oh queen of Eden! linked with thee
To mortal man, on earth is given,
In that sweet union of the heart,
A blessed antepast of heaven!

Oh, may it prove a foretaste true
Of joys in paradise above;
And, as below all love is bliss,
So may all bliss in heaven be love!

ORIENTAL MAXIMS.

Men show particular folly on five different occasions: when they establish their fortune on the ruin of another; when they expect to excite love by coldness, and by showing more marks of dislike than affection; when they wish to become learned in the midst of repose and pleasure; when they seek friends without making any advances of friendship; and when they are unwilling to succour their friends in distress.

The world is too narrow for two quarrelsome fools to live in it.

Avarice is the chastisement of the rich.

Your white hairs are the avant-couriers of your death.

He who has not his hand open, has his heart shut.

True prudence is to see from the commencement of an affair what will be the end of it.

Be of good cheer when your enemies are divided among themselves, but fear when they are united and of one accord.

What is easily acquired does not long endure.

It is not astonishing that the wise man should keep silence among warriors. The noise of the trumpet drowns the music of the lute.

In whatsoever house you enter, remain master of your eyes and your tongue.

Why repent a second time of an action of which we have already repented?

If you wish that your own merit should be recognised, recognise the merit of others.

Never give counsel when it is not asked of you; especially to those who are incapable of appreciating it.

One can live well without a brother but not without a friend.

Two things cause affliction: a sad friend, and a joyous enemy.

We esteem in the world those who do not merit our esteem, and neglect persons of true worth: but the world is like the ocean, the pearl is in its depths, the sea-weed swims.

A hundred thieves cannot steal from a poor man who is naked.

How short life would be, if hope did not give it extent!

The body increases by sleep, the mind accumulates by watching.

Do not shorten the long nights by slumber, nor prolong the short days by wickedness.

The man that watches by night rejoices by day.

To teach a knave, is to put a dagger into the hands of an assassin.

A wicked soul is capable of all the wickedness it can conceive.

Fortune comes with chains upon her feet, but when she retires she breaks them all by the effort of flight.

Riches and courage are of no avail when we are deserted by fortune.

Think on those who have gone before you—consider the empires which have passed away—and of all which has ever been, nothing remains but the traces of virtue.

A man of learning, who makes no use of what he knows, is like a cloud which gives no rain.

The wisest of men is he who has the most complaisance for others.

Two things are embarrassing: to be silent, when we ought to speak; and to speak when we ought to be silent.

The heart of the fool is in his mouth, the language of the wise man is in his heart.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,
To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER FIVE.

London, September 17.

OF all the surprising things about London, the most surprising is the rapid extension of the city itself. Owing to the shape of the little island of Manhattan, New-York spreads but in one direction, and its enlargement appears perhaps greater than it really is, in comparison with other places. I do not know whether it or London increases fastest, in proportion to their present extent—that is, I do not know which will double its present size in the least time, but I should think it would be a pretty near match. If this place continues to go on at the rate it has done for the last twenty years, it will soon be twice the size of Paris, allowing for that city's growth at its present rate in the meantime; for in addition to the new houses that are erected here, the environs being thickly settled, the city every now and then swallows up a village or a small town of two or three hundred houses. Even Primrose-hill, the Parnassus of Cockaigne, and the rural retreat of its citizens from time immemorial, will in a very little time be surrounded with brick and mortar, and taverns and gin-shops will circle round its very base. The formerly country towns of Hempstead and Highgate will in a few years become incorporated with and known but as parishes of the leviathan city; the same as Islington, Hoxton, Somer's-town, and a dozen other villages of former times are now. Houses are built for miles along all the principal roads leading into London—these are speedily intersected by other roads, and the spaces between are covered with houses almost immediately. And yet Dr. Johnson, David Garrick, Goldsmith, and the grandfathers and great-grandfathers of the present generation used to find London a large place; and the political economists, alarmists and croakers of those times were wont to cry out about head's growing too large for the body, and prophecy in merable evils as the unavoidable consequence thereof.

The superior order, beauty, and cleanliness of the modern style of constructing houses, and the great proportion of large buildings, must strike the most unobservant. Regent street is one unbroken succession of princely edifices. I do not mean a straight street, but has a graceful sweep in a semicircular direction, and there is not an acute angle in its whole range; for where it is crossed by other streets, the four corner houses are built so as to form nearly a circle, which, together with its extreme breadth, gives it a most imposing appearance. Yet this street, in its turn, is far inferior to what is called Park Crescent, and the clusters of terraces round the Regent Park. It is quite a pleasure to walk along such public ways and view such buildings. The foot walks are more than broad enough of a street in the old times, and are a clear gain to the poorer classes, being furnished for the accommodation of all at the expense of the rich. This is the west end, the fashionable part of the town. The large squares which were formerly to be inhabited by the fashionables, are now, for the most part, occupied by the middling classes of tradesmen, probably in the course of another generation will be let in tenements! Be they inhabited, however, by whom they may, they will always remain useful ornaments to the city. It is truly refreshing in strolling about the streets of London to turn down some small alley or other, and unexpectedly find yourself in a fine large square amid pure air and vegetation. Some of them are of such an extent and so thickly planted that a man in the middle of them might fancy himself in country, as he is not visible to, nor has he a view of people passing on the side-walks. What miserable poverty does it seem in the citizens of New-York to crowd a street destined to be one of the largest on the face of the globe, the smallest possible compass. It appears as if they exhausted all their ingenuity to do what ought not to be done, and build their houses of all shapes and sizes so as to make the most of their pigmy lots. I do not know who has the management of those affairs, but there must be gross mismanagement, and short-sighted avarice that ultimately defeats its own ends, somewhere. Doubtless the present generation think themselves very knowing and acute; but their grandsons, when they come to find themselves stewed, as in an oven, with every breath of pure air carefully excluded, will curse the folly and grasping cupidity of their ancestors, and, perhaps, in their wrath be led to speak irreverently of the honourable corporations of former times. Really the newspaper press ought to infuse a little more public spirit into the worthy men who construct houses and lay out streets, and teach them, if possible, to look "beyond the ignorant present."

If as much depends, as it is said there does, on first impressions, the many various accounts of London may be very satisfactorily accounted for. A stranger, with extravagant notions of the greatness of the metropolis, enters it at the west-end and finds his expectations exceeded; but I can easily conceive that stranger's disappointment if, approaching it from sea, he lands (as he must do) at any of the streets adjoining the river. He finds them narrow, dirty, confined places, worse than the worst he has left behind him in his native town. His ears are stunned with the swearing of draymen and the noise of ponderous waggons drawn by the heaviest and bulkiest breed of horses in the world, and his life is ever and anon put in jeopardy where two of those waggons have to pass each other; every three or four yards he has to step from off the footpath and wade in the mud in consequence of the said footpath being too narrow for a couple of people to pass abreast—vexed and annoyed he looks up at the tall grim houses on each side which almost shut out the light of day, and exclaims—"and this is London!" Should there happen to be a drizzly shower of rain, and the stranger feels an uncertainty respecting the right road, his stock of pleasurable sensations is greatly augmented. These streets do not contain a low resident population, for they consist chiefly of large warehouses and taverns; but they swarm with porters, draymen, coachmen, watermen, and other varieties of perhaps as finished blackguards as are to be found in the known world.

Eastcheap, where one John Falstaff and the hopeful heir apparent, Henry Prince of Wales, used to hold their midnight revels, adjoins, and is but one degree better than these streets. If they had used the same kind of dray-horses then that they do now, it would have been impossible for Falstaff and a horse to have passed each other in many places—one of the parties must have given way. Since that time what

A gentleman one day having, for want of a better analogy, called man a little world, was challenged to make out the resemblance by a bevy of belles, who were distractedly fond of poetry:

Man is a little world; in faith 'tis true,
The same ingredients go to make the two.
His tears are April showers that steal away;
His smiles the sunshine of an April day;
Like morning is his transient blush of shame,
Like noon his passions bursting into flame;
Like evening's gloom his pale and slow decay,
Like midnight darkness his last dying day;
His head's a hill with matted grass o'ergrown,
His veins are rivers, and his heart a stone.

Another gentleman, who was excessively addicted to music, but who was occasionally overheard in a matrimonial discord with his wife, having one day asserted that harmony was nothing but a series of discords properly arranged, occasioned the following lines:

Says fiddling Tom, all harmony is nought
But discords well arranged and finely wrought;
If this were true, then Tom's cross wife and he Would make a most delicious harmony.

A certain musician, who gave a concert at the Springs, having made himself ridiculous by his vanity and impertinence, was despatched by the following broadside:

Fiddlers most like their empty riddles are,
And should be treated with the self-same care;
The concert over, and the supper come,
Both should be put in cases and sent home.

A young fellow, who passed for a first-rate wit at evening parties, was one night observed to be perfectly silent. An envious gentleman accounted for it on the following hypothesis:

Loosing his list of many a stall-fed joke,
Will stupid sit all night and never spoke;
What wonder Will so very silent sits,
When the poor devil has just lost his wits.

THE MONKEY GENTLEMAN

length threatened to make them pay for spoiling his window. One morning, to the astonishment of every body, the inspired throng was missing, and the mystery was soon explained by the following lines, written on the only pane of glass that had escaped being consecrated to the muses:

Bless us! these tuneful bards, how thick they come!
A swarm of drones, no honey and all hum;
Like clouds of insects still they buzz along,
In one eternal, rapid, stale sing-song.
Line after line the gaily wits dispense,
Married in rhyme, but yet divorced in sense;
The same in syllables, and feet and measure,
The meaning a most rich and hidden treasure,
That through the depths of midnight must be sought
In the same darkness that the author thought;
Their lines, like man and wife, limp side by side,
Yet two opposing with the pair divide;
Or like two barren banks of sickly green,
A thick mud puddle sleeping sound between

The following was written on a jolly, fat, good-natured gentleman, whose circumference far exceeded his altitude:

Fat Jack approach'd a lane, and courteous said,
"Can I go through this gate, my pretty maid?"
The gipsy quick replied, "I think you may—
I saw a load of hay go in to-day."

The following incident, it is said, occurred to a pedantic blockhead, who bored every body at the Springs with his scholarship. I'll not swear, however, that the story was not made for him:

Gradus one day a sporting voyage did take,
To see a friend shoot geese upon the lake,
When they came nigh them, in Greek Gradus said,
"See! there they are!" and straight away they fled.
"Pshaw!" said the sportsman, "wherefore did you speak?"
"Why who the devil thought that geese knew Greek?"

DUKE OF ORLEANS A SCHOOLMASTER.

A short time before the Duc d'Orleans left England, during his last sojourn, he received an invitation for the anniversary dinner of the Society of Schoolmasters. Unable to attend, he addressed a letter to the treasurer, inclosing a liberal donation to the charity, and in which he was pleased to observe, "That, among the motives which made him feel an attachment to schoolmasters, was that of having been himself once a member of the profession. It was one of the many vicissitudes of fortune which had fallen to his lot, that at a period of severe distress and persecution, he had the good luck of being admitted as teacher in a college, where he gave lessons regularly for the space of eight months. He hoped, therefore, that the 'Society for the Relief of Distressed Schoolmasters' would permit him to tender his mite as a fellow-schoolmaster." This donation was afterwards repeated; and the correspondence, which is preserved by the society, is said to be remarkable for the elegance of the hand-writing, as well as for the purity of the language.

La Belle Assemblée.

AN IRISH MANAGER.

Jemmy Whitely was not particular, in poor communities, as to whether he received the public support in money or in "kind." He would take meat, fowl, vegetables, &c. value them by scales, &c. and pass in the owner and friends for as many admissions as they amounted to. Thus his treasury very often, on a Saturday, resembled a butcher's warehouse rather than a banker's. At a village on the coast the inhabitants brought him nothing but fish; but as the company could not subsist without its concomitants, bread and potatoes, a general appeal was made to his stomach and sympathies, and some alteration in the terms of admission required. Jemmy accordingly, after admitting nineteen persons, one evening, for a shad a-piece, stopped the twentieth, and said, "I beg your pardon, my darling, I am extremely sorry to refuse you; but if we ate any more fish, by the powers, we shall all be turned into mermaids!"

MACKLIN'S DAUGHTER.

At Needham I became acquainted with Miss Macklin, the actress, who had retreated to this little haven from the troubled element of public life, to live upon the income she had acquired by her professional labours. She was an admirable reader, (with a true Shakespearian attachment,) and her voice and figure led me to perceive some of the grounds upon which she had founded her popularity. She was not at this time on good terms with her father, which was owing to a domestic occurrence; but their original disagreements, as she informed me, grew out of a reading in Portia—she always said that "mercy was mightiest in the mightiest," but he maintaining it was "mightiest in the mightiest," showed her no mercy, but instantly renounced her.

PARTY TITLES.

Two factions, for nearly two centuries, divided and agitated the whole population of Holland and Zealand. One bore the title of Hocks, (fishing-hooks,) the other was called Kaabeljaures, (cod-fish.) The origin of these burlesque denominations was a dispute between two parties at a feast, as to whether the cod-fish took the hook, or the hook took the cod-fish? This apparently frivolous dispute was made the pretext for a serious quarrel; and the partizans of the nobles and those of the towns ranged themselves on either side, and assumed different badges of distinction. The Hocks, partizans of the towns, wore red caps; the Kaabeljaures wore gray ones. In Jacqueline's quarrel with Philip of Burgundy, she was supported by the former; and it was not till the year 1492 that the extinction of that popular and turbulent faction struck a final blow to the dissensions of both.

NEW FRENCH COINAGE.

The new French money is to bear the head of the new sovereign, surrounded by the legend, "Louis Philippe I. King of the French." The reverse will present a crown formed of a branch of olive and laurel, in the interior of which the date of the year and value of the piece will be inscribed.

LITERARY ITEMS.

"Robert of Paris, a romance of the Lower Empire," is the name of Sir Walter Scott's forthcoming novel. "Tales of a Grandfather, being stories taken from the history of France," are also announced.

Mr. Cooper's new novel, "The Water Witch, or the Skimmer of the Seas," will be published, by Messrs. Carey and Lea, early in December.

HAPPINESS.

BY IOLANTE.

Not in wealth's gorgeous hall,
Decked out in all art's costliest arraying,
Where mid tall columns silvery fountains playing
Upon the ear like music's echoes fall;
The home of pomp, the daily haunt of pride,
Not there, not there does happiness abide.

Not in the humble cot,
Whose walls no ray of fortune's sunshine blesses,
Where the dull weight of penury oppresses
The hearts that wither 'neath their heavy lot;
The home of want, too oft the den of guilt,
Not there has happiness her mansion built.

Not in the quiet nook,
Where the pale student his lone watch is keeping,
While his high thoughts, the bounds of time o'erleaping,
Forgetting earth, on things immortal look;
The home of genius, wisdom's calm retreat,
Not even there has happiness her seat.

Oh! seek her not on earth,
Where all the brightest hopes our hearts can cherish,
Like flowers in desert isles, are doomed to perish
Unknown beyond the spot that gave them birth:
Oh ne'er on earth can ought so fair find rest,
Not here shall happiness reward thy guest.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

French celebration.—The question has often been proposed to us, why is it that New-York does not evince her sympathy in the deep and pervading emotions of exulting joy which have been experienced in every portion of this extensive country, at the emancipation of our ancient allies and friends, the French, from an oppressive and a galling yoke? Why did not her citizens, as they were the first to receive the intelligence of the auspicious event, lead the van and set the example in its celebration? Different reasons may be assigned, not one of them connected with apathy, or indifference to the cause of freedom and humanity. Of these, two may be selected, as sufficient to satisfy every impartial mind: the one was the close approximation of our state election, and the strong political excitement incident thereto, which gave just ground for suspicion that any festive solemnities that might have been proposed, at the moment, would have been partial and exclusive; the other, and not least important reason for delaying the celebration, was a desire on the part of those individuals who were most deeply interested in the event, to see it brought to a sure and final consummation. The throne of the Bourbons had indeed been overturned; the tyrants, who had attempted to defy and scorn the will and majesty of the people, had been consigned to banishment from the land they would have betrayed, and which was soiled by their footsteps; a new government had been established, and the cause of liberty promised to be triumphant; but did not the experience of the past justify fears for the future? Had not light once before dawned on the vine-clad hills and verdant valleys of France? And had not that light been extinguished by internal, as well as external enemies? Was not the intervention of foreigners again to be anticipated, and civil commotions too, so bloody and endless? True—but circumstances have changed. The advancement of knowledge has placed weapons in the hands of the people of almost every country in Europe, which will both incite and enable them to resist any kingly mandate which should call them to contend in the cause of tyranny against the rights of man. And the people of France too, enlightened by the experience of the past, and justly dreading a renewal of former horrors and misfortunes, will neither recur to wild schemes of Utopian perfection on the one side, nor raise their hands in bitter violence against each other in support of a justly degraded family. No: the revolution of France, as it was brilliant in its commencement, and glorious and unparalleled for the resolution, the wisdom, the forbearance, the heroic magnanimity of its chief actors in its development, so will it be efficient in its results, and permanent in its duration. The recognition of the king of the French by the first powers of Europe—the consolidation of his government at home—and the complete overthrow of all transitory commotions excited by the turbulent disposition of a few dissatisfied adherents of the ancient dynasty, give us full and indisputable warrants for arriving at this gratifying conclusion. This then appears to be the most appropriate time for the intended festivities—now, that our elections have been brought to a close, and the event intended to be celebrated has been finally consummated. We are happy therefore to learn, that at a highly respectable meeting, a committee of upwards of two hundred of our citizens have been appointed to carry the desired object into effect. The selection has been made from all parties and ranks, and it is intended to get up the pageant in becoming magnificence. The twenty-fifth day of this month, on which the evacuation of our own soil by its last foreign masters is celebrated, has been selected as the most appropriate for the occasion. It is to be hoped, that when the arrangements are completed, they will be of such an unobjectionable character, that all our population may participate in their observance.

Mr. Hazlitt.—The writings of this author have ever excited considerable attention in the United States, more especially those relating to dramatic literature and theatrical criticisms. The following notice from the Court Journal of September cannot but prove acceptable:

"The literary world has sustained a loss in the death of William Hazlitt, which it will not readily repair. He died at his lodgings in Frith-street, Soho, and was buried (in a strictly private manner) at St. Anne's church, in that parish. In those particular departments of literature to which Mr. Hazlitt chiefly directed his efforts—namely, criticism, and essays on men and manners—he may be regarded as the most distinguished writer of his day—almost of any day.

"An erroneous impression has been conveyed by the newspapers as to the pecuniary circumstances in which Mr. Hazlitt died. Perhaps he was never more easy in that respect than at the time he was seized with the illness which has terminated in his death. He had, within the two or three previous months, received considerable sums from a great publishing house for works lately completed by him, and one of which is just now published, (Northcote's Conversations), and he had also received various other sums to a considerable amount for his writings in periodical works—the Edinburgh Review in particular. It is true Mr. Hazlitt's habits of life were such as to make him dependent on his immediate literary exertions for the gratification of his immediate wants; he never wrote till his pecuniary necessities compelled him to do so; and the consequence was, that dying suddenly, he has probably not left behind him any thing towards the future support of the son who was the only person dependent on him. But this fact in no degree justifies the impressions conveyed by the statement that he 'died in poverty.'

"We may further add, for the satisfaction of the many who may feel interested on these points, that Mr. Hazlitt retained the entire possession of his faculties to the latest moment of his life, and died with perfect calmness of mind, and almost free from bodily pain. His death arose from organic disease of the stomach, of many years standing."

Mrs. Heber.—In vindication of this lady against certain malicious personal remarks, made in relation to her second marriage, we republish the following letter from the American.

"DEAR SIR—I am indebted to you for two letters, the last a most interesting one, written after you had read the "Life." I was very sure that the beautiful touches of goodness and wisdom, commencing in the very earliest of his letters, and increasing in strength and vividness to the latest, would interest and please all my kind American friends. You are right in supposing that there is a considerable mass of correspondence, of all ages, still unpublished; but I think I have omitted nothing which could throw additional light on his almost perfect character—while there are many grave persons who blame me for giving too much to the world."

"You will have heard of the change which has taken place in my name and situation since I last addressed you.

"In giving my children, as their protector, a man of sound judgment, sense, and temper, of strict moral and religious principles, as well as of noble birth, fortune, and possessing an honourable employment in his own government, while their fortunes are legally secured, I trust that they will find essential advantages. A residence of two years in the Ionian islands will, I have every reason to hope, be of infinite use to my eldest girl's health, which was much affected by the severity of our last winter. My beloved children will ever be my first objects, and to bring them up in the faith of their blessed father, my earnest and fondest hope.

"We leave England soon, and, travelling through France, Switzerland, and Italy, hope to reach Corfu in December.

"Count Valsamachi is secretary to the Ionian government, and we must consequently remain in that island till the parliament adjourns, when we shall proceed to Cephalonia, where his property lies, and where he has a country house in one of the most romantic situations in that beautiful island, close to the sea. I take an excellent governess with me, and look to enjoying every opportunity of superintending my children's education myself. The island boasts of little society; but with a happy family circle, such as I trust ours will always continue to be, one is independent of all external circumstances. Believe me, very truly yours, AMELIA VALSAMACHI."

Let the soft lustre of thine eyes,
Disperse thy lover's anxious sighs!
And thy sweet voice which breathes divine,
Be tuned to love as well as mine.

For the Mirror.

WHEN ROSY MORN HER GRATEFUL BEAM.

AIR—"Pensez à moi."

WHEN rosy morn her grateful beam
Is shedding o'er the freshened earth,
Why do I chide the sunny gleam
That wakens me to pain or mirth?
'Tis that in dreams of ecstasy
"Je pense à vous, ma chère amie."

And oft at twilight's placid hour,
While gazing on the evening star,
My thoughts, despite its witching power,
Will turn to something brighter far—
Thou art that brighter light to me!
"Je pense à vous, ma chère amie."

And if, when hopes of storied name
Urge me to seek proud learning's prize,
(Pale watcher at her holy flame,
Should then a thought of thee arise,
Lost in the maze of memory,
"Je pense à vous, ma chère amie."

But, fare thee well! thou must not know
The curbless thoughts that fill my heart—
Though still in sickness, weal or woe,
Of all those thoughts art thou a part.
Ever! in joy or misery,
"Je pense à vous, ma chère amie."

MUTABILITY OF FORTUNE.—A young lady, a native of Martinique, was on a voyage to France, with the design of being educated there, when the merchant vessel, on board of which she was passenger, was captured by an Algerine cruiser, and taken to Algiers. The poor girl was at first overwhelmed with affliction at the prospect of captivity before her; but as passion gave way to meditation, it came to her recollection that an old woman had predicted that she would one day become one of the greatest princesses in the world! "Ah!" exclaimed she, for superstition was in this instance but the handmaid of inclination, "it is doubtless so, I am to be a princess. Well, I must not quarrel with fortune. Who knows what may come out of this?" So strong did this prepossession grow on the young lady, that ere she reached the Barbary shore she was as much a fatalist in point of resignation as any devotee of Islamism could possibly be. The French consul at Algiers immediately offered to ransom his countrywoman; but no, she would not be ransomed, for fear of offending fortune, by resorting to so vulgar a way of recovering her liberty. So to the seraglio of the dey of Algiers the lady went; and, strange to tell, from his highness's seraglio she was sent as a present to the grand seignor, who was so struck with her beauty and manners (for in both she was excelling) that he elevated her to the dignity of his favourite sultana! Such was the singular rise of the late Sultana Nalide, who died in eighteen hundred and eighteen, and was the mother of the present grand seignor.

FRAGRANCE OF FLOWERS.—We were walking in the garden among the flowers; my companion stopped by a border, principally of large carnation poppies. "O," says he, "what beautiful, what splendid flowers; but why do you not destroy those miserable weeds that so thickly and offensively occupy the interstices of the border?" "Wait till evening and I will tell you," I replied. We walked to the same place again in the evening. "O, what delicious fragrance; how delicate, how sweet! and yet so fine, as, like the whispered music of the Eolian harp, it is scarcely perceptible—whence this delightful sweetness?" inquired my friend. "That, sir," I replied, "is the fragrance of that miserable weed, which you would have had me destroy this morning, and in it you have the answer to your question. That is the lovely mignonette, and now where are your beautiful, splendid flowers, the poppies? In the morning they were here in all the ostentation of splendid robes, but where are they now? Scattered over the walks. The sun shone upon them, and the gentle breeze came and they were gone—leaving neither beauty nor fragrance behind. But this little plant, the appearance of which was so offensive to you this morning, now fills the very air with rich fragrance—the one is the glare and ostentation of external show, the other the richness of mind and the sweetness of modesty."

MAXIMS.—True wealth consists in virtue, and not in the possession of great estates; and wisdom consists in understanding and not in years.

The wisest of men is he who has the most civility for others.
